In his remarks this week, he could have been speaking for most of Europe when he said that what he called "the Iraq affair" had "shifted red lines" and made the region dangerous.

Even inside the Bush administration, some officials have acknowledged over the past year that Iran eventually may get a nuclear weapon — or at least the technology and components to assemble one quickly. In the United States, the view that the world might have to coexist with a nuclear Iran was laid out in an ambitious study by two government-financed scholars at the National Defense University in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0127712

"Can the United States live with a nuclear-armed Iran?" the report asked. "Despite its rhetoric, it may have no choice." The report added that the costs of rolling back Iran's nuclear program "may be higher than the costs of deterring and containing a nuclear Iran."

In a sense, Mr. Chirac was trying to make just that point when he said in an interview with three publications, including The New York Times, that a bomb would do Iran little good because it would never be able to use it without facing swift retaliation.

Mr. Chirac also stressed his belief that Iran should not be completely humiliated and isolated, but encouraged to become a positive regional player. "How can we impose sufficiently strong constraints on Iran?" he asked in the Monday interview. Calling the Islamic Republic "a bit fragile," he said, "One has to know what Iran can withstand or not."

The following day, in retracting his statements about a nuclear Iran, he stressed the importance of having a "dialogue" with Iran, which he said had an important role to play in helping to stabilize the region.

In the past several years, Mr. Chirac has tried to navigate a middle course between the United States and Iran.

It was France, in the months after the invasion of Iraq in 2003, that conceived a diplomatic initiative joined by Britain and Germany in which Tehran would freeze its uranium enrichment activities in exchange for political, economic and technological incentives.

The European trio suspected that the United States was moving toward an open confrontation with Iran, much the way it did with Iraq.

But the initiative failed, even after the United States, Russia and China joined in. Sanctions, even in the unlikely eventuality that they can be tightened substantially, are not likely to be tough enough to change Iran's behavior.

Tehran insists that its nuclear program is for peaceful energy purposes. It views United Nations sanctions to punish it for enriching uranium as unjust and a violation of its rights as a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. It justifies its presence in Shiite-controlled Iraq as necessary to preserve its own national security interests and to protect itself should Iraq dissolve into chaos.

On Thursday, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, said that his nation was becoming a "superpower" and that the United Nations sanctions would not deter it from pursuing its nuclear program.

Indeed, the Iranians are well aware that possession of the bomb would immediately transform the country into the dominant power in the Middle East, give it even greater influence over Iraq and allow it to threaten and blackmail its enemies.

Republicans Plan To Block Iraq Debate (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, said Friday that his party would unite to block Senate debate next week on a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq unless the Democrats allowed votes on at least two Republican alternatives.

Mr. McConnell said even Senator John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is the chief author of the bipartisan proposal, and other Republicans backing his plan had agreed to prevent the resolution from reaching the floor Monday if Democrats did not agree to that demand.

"We're in a position to insist on a procedure for considering these matters that we think is fair to us," said Mr. McConnell, who has been negotiating the framework of the debate with Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader. "We can't dictate the outcome necessarily, but we're insistent upon a process that we are comfortable with."

Mr. Reid responded that the Republican leadership was essentially filibustering a debate of Iraq policy to avoid a judgment on Mr. Bush.

"This obstruction is an abdication of their responsibility to the American people on the most important issue facing our nation today," Mr. Reid said in a statement.

Such back and forth is not unusual in the buildup to major debates in the Senate, where the minority party has significant power to influence the process.

DOJ_NMG_0127713

Lawmakers and senior Senate officials said they believed that an agreement would ultimately be worked out, since Republicans do not want to risk being accused of shutting off criticism of Mr. Bush on such a major issue, while Democrats are eager to get Republicans on the record on the troop increase.

Mr. McConnell's threat also reflects the Republican leadership's strategy to force a Senate review of a series of competing resolutions, muddying the outcome with multiple votes, rather than allow the focus to be on a central proposal objecting to the troop buildup.

Mr. Warner on Wednesday night revised his plan — which already had some Republican backing — and gained some new support, leading Democrats to make his version the main one to be considered.

Senate Republicans have also been squeamish about Mr. Reid's decision to debate the Iraq policy in the form of legislation, which would be sent to the president if passed as such. They see such a move as overly confrontational, even though Mr. Reid has said the Senate will ultimately convert the proposal to a resolution to avoid having to send it to the White House.

Republicans say they want votes on at least two alternatives. One is a resolution made public Thursday by Senators John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Joseph I. Lieberman, the independent from Connecticut, among other lawmakers. Mr. McCain and Mr. Lieberman support the president's plan to increase troops.

Their resolution lays out 11 goals the Iraqi government should meet, including disarming militias and distributing Iraqi resources without regard to religious sect. It declares that Congress should ensure that American forces "have the resources they consider necessary to carry out their mission." The resolution does not say what the United States should do if the Iraqi government does not meet the goals.

A second likely alternative would be a Republican-backed resolution opposing any cutoff of money for added troops, a potentially tougher vote for some Democrats who want to retain that as a future option.

Warner To Help Block His Own Resolution On Iraq (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

Sen. John W. Warner will join his fellow Republicans in voting Monday to block the resolution he wrote rebuking President Bush's Iraq war policy.

"Senator Warner supports the Senate Republican leadership's effort to establish a free and open debate on Iraq on the Senate floor, including possible amendments," a spokesman for the Virginia Republican said yesterday afternoon.

Earlier in the day, Mr. Warner told colleagues during a closed-door strategy meeting at the Library of Congress that he opposes the manner in which Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, is conducting debate on his resolution, which condemns Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Senate Republicans are opposed to a vote on the Warner resolution unless they also get votes on two other resolutions. One of those alternatives supports Mr. Bush's plan, and the other would prohibit cutting funds for the war. Republicans also want each resolution to require 60 votes to pass.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, told reporters yesterday that he expects to have all 49 Republicans in the chamber -- nine votes more than are needed for a filibuster -- to vote Monday to block the nonbinding resolution.

Mr. Reid said he has been acting in good faith to get a vote on the Warner resolution.

"The American people deserve better than a filibuster on the president's flawed plan," he said. "Senate Democrats will continue to negotiate with the Republican leadership to bring the plan to a vote."

Meanwhile, a National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) released yesterday raised new uncertainty about the prospect for withdrawing American troops from Iraq.

Iraqi leaders will be hard-pressed to craft a lasting political settlement or improve their security capabilities in the next 12 to 18 months, according to the collaborative assessment by 16 spy agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0127714

The assessment states that growing and entrenched polarization between Shi'ite and Sunni Muslims, inadequate Iraqi security forces, weak leaders and the success of extremists' efforts to use violence to exacerbate the sectarian war all create a situation that will be difficult to improve.

"We think it is accurate," said Stephen J. Hadley, Mr. Bush's national security adviser. "We would emphasize the 'hard-pressed,' because we will be pressing them hard and the Iraqi people will be pressing the government hard."

The news comes as the next major political showdown looms on Capitol Hill.

The Bush administration will ask for another $100 billion for military and diplomatic operations in Iraq and Afghanistan this year and seek $145 billion for 2008, a senior administration official said yesterday.

The requests Monday, which will accompany Mr. Bush's budget for the 2008 fiscal year that begins Oct. 1, would bring the total appropriations for 2007 to about $170 billion, with a decline the following year.

The additional request for the current year includes $93.4 billion for the Pentagon -- on top of $70 billion approved by Congress in September -- and is about $6 billion less than the Pentagon's request to the White House budget office.

U.S. Copter Crash In Iraq Kills 2 In Fourth Such Incident This Year (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 2 -- A U.S. military helicopter crashed Friday morning north of Baghdad, killing two soldiers on board, officials said. It was the fourth fatal helicopter crash in Iraq this year.

The helicopter went down at 7:20 a.m. near Taji, about 15 minutes north of the capital. The military said in a brief statement that the soldiers' remains "have been recovered and the site secured."

Military officials did not say what type of helicopter it was or how it crashed. But Iraqi police and an insurgent group that asserted responsibility for the crash identified the craft as an Apache and said it had been shot down by a shoulder-fired antiaircraft missile.

"We are saying to the enemies of God that the airspace of the Islamic state of Iraq is prohibited for you, just like its land," the Islamic State of Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group, said in a statement posted on its Web site. "God opened for the soldiers of the Islamic State of Iraq new ways to confront your aircrafts."

Before Friday's incident, 19 people had died in U.S. helicopter crashes in the past two weeks. A Black Hawk crashed north of Baghdad on Jan. 20, killing 12 soldiers on board. The following week, a civilian helicopter was downed in central Baghdad while assisting a U.S. Embassy convoy that had come under attack. Five security contractors employed by Blackwater USA were killed in that incident.

On Sunday, a military helicopter crashed while participating in an Iraqi-led raid on an insurgent camp in the southern province of Najaf, killing two soldiers. An Iraqi official involved in the raid said that helicopter had also been shot down.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, discussed the string of crashes Friday during a briefing at the Pentagon.

"Clearly, groundfire . . . has been more effective against our helicopters in the last couple of weeks," he said, according to a transcript of the briefing posted on the Department of Defense's Web site. "I've taken a hard look at that. Don't know whether or not this is just statistically what's going to happen over time when you're flying at that level and people are shooting at you, or if there are some kind of new tactics and techniques that we need to adjust to. And the folks on the ground are looking at that right now."

Also Friday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of six other service members.

A Marine and a sailor died Wednesday in Anbar province in western Iraq of wounds "sustained due to enemy action," the military said in a statement. Another Marine died Wednesday after apparently going into cardiac arrest, the military said.

A Task Force Lightning soldier was killed Thursday in a vehicle rollover accident, the military said in a statement. Two other American soldiers were killed Thursday in a car accident at Camp Liberty in Baghdad, it said in a separate statement.

The names of the soldiers will be released after their relatives have been notified, the military said.

Elsewhere, 13 people were killed Friday by mortar rounds that struck a village 20 miles south of Baghdad, according to a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry.

DOJ_NMG_0127715

Mortar fire also killed five people and wounded 18 at the Musa al-Kadhim shrine in the Kadhimiyah district of northern Baghdad, the spokesman said.

In Suwayrah, in southern Iraq, Iraqi army officials killed 35 people and captured 23 suspected of belonging to a terrorist organization, the spokesman said.

2 Killed As U.S. Helicopter Is Shot Down Near Baghdad (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 2 — An American Apache attack helicopter was shot down on Friday just north of Baghdad and its two-member crew was killed, an American military official said.

It was the fourth American helicopter to be shot down or crash under fire in the last two weeks, a trend that American military commanders acknowledged was disturbing.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said that attacks by militants have "been more effective against our helicopters in the last couple of weeks."

Saying he has looked closely at the issue, General Pace said he did not know if the recent strikes were the result of a new strategy, improved skills or simply a natural result of the military's heavy dependence on helicopters in the fight here.

Traveling by road here has become increasingly fraught with danger as Shiite militia groups and Sunni insurgents continue to attack American vehicles with roadside bombs, more often using sophisticated devices that can penetrate even the best American armor.

The military would only say it was investigating the Friday crash, but witnesses indicated that the militants were clearly waiting to ambush passing helicopters.

A man who identified himself only as Abu Ahmed, who lives near the crash site, said gunmen were hiding near a manufacturing plant in Sheik Amir village, near the town of Taji, waiting for the helicopters. Taji is a central hub for helicopter traffic around Baghdad. Americans are currently training Iraqi pilots there and the Americans have expressed concern about enemies becoming more sophisticated in shooting at the helicopters.

On Friday, just after sunrise, two American Apache helicopters flew in low, and waiting militants successfully shot down one and hit the second, Mr. Ahmed said.

Before the military had confirmed the crash, a militant group was already taking responsibility and promising to post a video of the attack on the Internet.

The crash site was quickly secured and the two bodies recovered, said a military official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because an official report had not yet been released.

Just two weeks ago, an American Black Hawk helicopter was shot down north of Baghdad and all 12 service members on board were killed. Another American helicopter was shot down on Sunday during the battle in Najaf, south of Baghdad, killing two soldiers.

And five members of a private security detail protecting an American convoy in Baghdad were killed Jan. 23 when their helicopters came under attack and one crashed.

Separately, American forces engaged in a fierce battle overnight with militants in the restive western city of Ramadi.

American forces came under attack Thursday night as Sunni insurgents directed mortars at their main headquarters in the city, according to witnesses and the American military. When the Americans sent forces into two neighborhoods in response, they were ambushed, according to witnesses.

The city remains a hotbed of insurgent activity and militants and has been the scene of some of the fiercest street fighting in Iraq over the past four years.

The fiercest fighting in this clash occurred near the main cemetery, residents said. As the Americans approached the area, roadside bombs struck their vehicles and militants opened fired with machine guns.

The American military reported no casualties, but residents said civilians were caught in the middle of the battle.

DOJ_NMG_0127716

Hajj Ebrahim al-Jumaili said that he was sitting in his home when the fight broke out and his wife, daughter and two sons all were lightly wounded. The fighting, he said, lasted until 7:30 a.m. Friday.

Dr. Abdullah Saleh, at the main Ramadi hospital, said 4 people were killed and another 12 wounded.

Also in Anbar Province, Ali Hussein, the Sunni chairman of the City Council and an outspoken critic of Al Qaeda, was gunned down in Falluja. He is the third Falluja City Council leader to be killed this year.

Meanwhile, tensions remained high in the Shiite holy city of Najaf.

On Sunday, Iraqi government forces, backed by American air support and ground troops, killed at least 250 militants who they said were part of a renegade militia called the Soldiers of Heaven, bent on overthrowing the clerical hierarchy in that city.

Authorities imposed a 24-hour curfew there on Friday, fearful that the militia could still be active in the area.

During Friday Prayers there, a religious leader, Sadr Adeen al-Qubanchi, said that that there were many different forces conspiring to challenge the authority of the clerical hierarchy in Najaf, the renegade militia only being the latest threat.

"This attempt was big and very dangerous," he said in the speech. "It was about to drown Najaf in blood."

While praising the Iraqi military's efforts in the battle, he said there were at least two other groups in Najaf that have the same ideology as the militia and possibly the same intentions.

"I call on the security forces to watch them clearly and to question them according to the law," he said.

Late Friday, Iraqi officials said they took into custody six people they suspected of having ties with the Soldiers of Heaven and seized a sizable cache of weapons.

2 U.S. Troops Killed In Latest Helicopter Crash In Iraq (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

The craft is the fourth to go down recently. Iraqis say it was attacked.

BAGHDAD — A U.S. military helicopter crashed amid heavy gunfire Friday north of Baghdad, police and witnesses said — the fourth American chopper to go down in two weeks. The U.S. military said two crew members were killed.

The spate of attacks raised questions about whether insurgents were increasingly targeting aircraft, a crucial component of U.S. operations in Iraq. Not only do U.S. forces rely on helicopters in combat, but they are being used more often to ferry personnel and equipment across the country to avoid roadside bombs, the major killer of U.S. troops.

The recent attacks on helicopters have inflicted a heavy toll on Americans in Iraq — 16 military personnel and five civilians killed — at a time when roadside bombings are becoming less effective against U.S. vehicles, which are protected by improved armor plating, signal-jamming devices and other measures.

Six other U.S. military personnel in Iraq died in the previous two days, two in combat in Al Anbar province, one of an apparent heart attack and three in vehicle accidents, the U.S. command said. At least 3,093 U.S. personnel have been killed in the Iraq theater since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, according to the website icasualties.org.The U.S. military has lost 54 helicopters in Iraq since May 2003, about half of them to enemy fire, according to figures compiled by the Washington-based Brookings Institution.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged that insurgent ground fire in Iraq had been "more effective against our helicopters in the last couple of weeks."

But he said it was unclear whether "this is just statistically what's going to happen over time when you're flying at that level and people are shooting at you, or if there are some kind of new tactics and techniques that we need to adjust to."

"The folks on the ground are looking at that right now," Pace told journalists at a Pentagon briefing.

The U.S. command, in a brief statement, did not identify the latest helicopter felled or detail the circumstances of the crash.

Iraqi police and witnesses said the aircraft was shot down over farmland near Taji, a major U.S. air base about 10 miles north of Baghdad.

Hashim Assafi, a 37-year-old farmer, said he was irrigating his field when he saw a pair of helicopters fly by and heard a burst of gunfire, sending him ducking behind a well for cover. One helicopter was hit but continued flying, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127717

Peeping out from behind the well, he said, he watched the other helicopter circle back to where the gunfire had come from. There was another burst of fire, which he said hit the second craft in the tail.

"I saw smoke coming out of the tail," he said. "The chopper was swinging around before it hit the ground one kilometer away from me, and I heard a big explosion."

Other witnesses, who said the helicopters were escorting a convoy of military vehicles, described seeing a ball of fire as the stricken aircraft hit the ground.

U.S. troops sealed off the area and additional helicopters circled overhead, police and witnesses said.

A group linked to Al Qaeda claimed responsibility for the attack in a statement posted on a militant website.

"We say to the enemies of God that the sky of the Islamic state of Iraq is forbidden just like its land," the statement said, adding that the group had "new ways" to attack helicopters. It was not possible to verify the authenticity of the statement.

Military analysts said the recent cluster of attacks was worrying, but cautioned that it was too early to confirm a trend.

"The insurgents constantly improve and adapt their methods," said Anthony Cordesman, a former Defense Department official who is a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"There may well be a change in tactics to focus on helicopters because they are the principal method of transportation as well as an important attack element…. The problem is that we don't have enough of a pattern yet to be sure," he said.

Two other military helicopters and a civilian helicopter have been lost since Jan. 20. All were believed to have been shot down in combat or in areas where Sunni Muslim-led insurgents were active, though the causes of the crashes are still officially under investigation.

One of the military helicopters went down Sunday near Najaf during an offensive by American and Iraqi forces against a violent messianic cult said to be plotting attacks against Shiite Muslim clerics and religious sites. Two crew members were killed.

The other military chopper was a Black Hawk that crashed two weeks ago near Baqubah, killing all 12 U.S. personnel aboard, including three officers and two command sergeants. And five Western security contractors employed by North Carolina-based Blackwater USA were killed when two helicopters came under attack Jan. 23 in Baghdad and one of them crashed.

Sunni-led insurgents and Shiite militias are known to have shoulder-fired SA-7 antiaircraft missiles, rocket-propelled grenades and heavy machine guns in their arsenals.

The U.S. military has developed tactics to minimize the risk. Routes are varied. Helicopters fly low and fast to make it difficult for gunmen to get them in their sights, and they drop flares to divert heat-seeking surface-to-air missiles.

Such countermeasures are reevaluated after every copter crash, said Col. Bryan Owens, commander of the 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 82nd Airborne Division, who was questioned about Friday's crash during a separate Pentagon briefing.

"It didn't happen in my area, but I fully expect that the lessons learned from the tragedy of helicopter crashes will be passed on to me so that we can take action in our area just to make sure that we are … not putting our soldiers at undue risk," said Owens, who spoke to journalists via teleconference from Tikrit, northwest of Baghdad.

In other violence, police recovered at least 15 bodies in Baghdad, apparent victims of sectarian death squads.

U.S. forces said they killed at least 18 suspected insurgents in two missile strikes during fierce clashes late Thursday and early Friday in Ramadi, a Sunni Arab insurgent stronghold in volatile Al Anbar, west of Baghdad. There were no immediate reports of U.S. military or Iraqi civilian casualties in the Ramadi clashes.

Also in Al Anbar, the municipal council chairman in Fallouja was killed in a drive-by shooting as he left his home to attend Friday afternoon prayers, authorities said.

South of Baghdad, three days of mourning were announced for the 73 people killed and 152 injured in twin bombings Thursday at a busy Shiite market in the heart of Hillah.

In Najaf, authorities imposed a daytime vehicle ban amid fears that surviving members of the Heaven's Army cult, the target of Sunday's U.S.-Iraqi offensive outside the city, were again planning attacks.

The city has been on edge since the weekend clash, when more than 200 cult members were killed and hundreds detained.

zavis@latimes.com

DOJ_NMG_0127718

Times staff writers Julian E. Barnes and Saif Rasheed in Baghdad and special correspondents in Baqubah, Hillah, Najaf and Taji contributed to this report.

Groundfire Downs Another U.S. Copter; Kills 2 Troops (WT/AP)

By Kim Gamel

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A U.S. helicopter went down yesterday in Iraq in the fourth such incident in two weeks, killing two troops on board, and America's top general acknowledged that U.S. aircraft were increasingly in danger from groundfire.

Witnesses and local police said two helicopters were flying together when gunmen opened fire, sending one of the aircraft crashing to the ground, smoke trailing behind it, near Taji, an air base just north of Baghdad.

The military, acknowledging the loss of the Army helicopter in a statement, did not identity the type of aircraft nor say what caused it to go down.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said yesterday that clearly, "groundfire ... has been more effective against our helicopters in the last couple weeks." The comments marked the first time a military official has publicly acknowledged the recent crashes were caused by groundfire.

"I've taken a hard look at that, don't know whether or not this is statistically what's going to happen over time, when you're flying at that level and people are shooting at you, or if this is some kind of new tactics or techniques that we need to adjust to."

Three other helicopters -- two military and one civilian -- have been lost in Iraq since Jan. 20. All three were thought to have been shot down.

The U.S. military relies heavily on air transportation in Iraq to avoid roadside bombs and insurgent ambushes and the recent spate of losses has raised questions about whether Sunni insurgents and Shi'ite militias may have stepped up attacks on helicopters or may have received new supplies of shoulder-fired anti-aircraft weapons. Sunni insurgents are already known to have anti-aircraft weapons and heavy machine guns.

Since May 2003, the U.S. military has lost 54 helicopters in Iraq, about half of them to hostile fire, according to figures compiled by the Brookings Institution.

U.S. forces, meanwhile, said 18 insurgents were killed in fighting Thursday night and yesterday after insurgents opened fire on American troops from several positions in Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad, the military said. No civilian or U.S. casualties were reported, the military said.

Ramadi, the capital of the western province of Anbar, where Sunni insurgents remain well-entrenched, has seen some of the bloodiest street battles of the war.

Elsewhere in Anbar, gunmen assassinated the Sunni chairman of the Fallujah City Council, Abbas Ali Hussein, an outspoken critic of al Qaeda, the third council leader to be killed in a year.

The U.S. military said six troops were killed Thursday, two in fighting in Anbar province, one of an apparent heart attack and three in vehicle accidents.

The deaths raise to at least 3,092 members of the U.S. military who have died in Iraq since the war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count. At least 2,480 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

Iraqi officials in Hillah, a Shi'ite city about 60 miles south of Baghdad, announced a three-day mourning period after Thursday's devastating suicide attack. Police spokesman Capt. Muthanna Khaled said at least 73 persons were killed and 163 wounded.

Another U.S. Helicopter Lost In Iraq (AP)

By Bassem Mroue, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

A U.S. Army helicopter crashed Friday in a hail of gunfire north of Baghdad, police and witnesses said — the fourth lost in Iraq in the last two weeks. The U.S. command said two crew members were killed, and the top U.S. general conceded that insurgent ground fire has become more effective.

An al-Qaida-affiliated group claimed responsibility and said its fighters had "new ways" to attack American planes.

DOJ_NMG_0127719

A brief U.S. military statement gave no reason for the crash and did not identify the type of aircraft. A Pentagon official said it was an Apache attack helicopter, which carries two crew members.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information. Another Apache crashed Sunday during heavy fighting with a Shiite cult near Najaf, also killing two soldiers.

Iraqi police and witnesses said the latest crash occurred about 7:30 a.m. as two Apaches were flying along a well-established air route near Taji, a major U.S. base about 12 miles north of Baghdad.

One helicopter was struck by heavy machine gunfire but continued flying, the witnesses said. The other helicopter banked sharply and flew back toward the source of fire, apparently to attack the target.

But that helicopter was also struck by ground fire, exploded in a ball of fire and crashed, the witnesses said. The other helicopter flew away, they said. The witnesses spoke on condition of anonymity, fearing for their own safety.

The United States has lost more than 50 helicopters in Iraq since May 2003, about half of them to hostile fire.

However, the loss of four helicopters since Jan. 20 has raised new questions about whether Iraqi insurgents are using more sophisticated weapons or whether U.S. tactics need changing.

Three of the latest crashes involved Army helicopters — two Apaches and one Black Hawk. The fourth was an OH-6A observation helicopter operated by the Blackwater USA security firm. All were believed shot down, and 20 Americans, including four civilian, died in the crashes.

In Washington, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged that insurgent ground fire in Iraq "has been more effective against our helicopters in the last couple of weeks."

But Pace said it was unclear whether "this is some kind of new tactics or techniques that we need to adjust to."

The Islamic State of Iraq, an al-Qaida-linked group, claimed on Friday that it shot down the Apache near Taji in a statement posted on an extremist Web site.

"We tell the enemies of God that the airspace of the Islamic State in Iraq is prohibited to your aircraft just like its lands are," the statement said. "God has granted new ways for the soldiers of the State of Iraq to confront your aircraft."

Iraqi insurgents have used heavy machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades and shouldered-fired SA-7 anti-aircraft missiles throughout the Iraq conflict. U.S. officials believe Iran is supplying Shiite militias with new weapons including more powerful roadside bombs, Katysuha rockets and a newer class of rocket-propelled grenades.

Some of those weapons could have found their way into the hands of Sunni insurgents, who operate around Taji.

The U.S. military relies heavily on helicopters to avoid roadside bombs and insurgent ambushes. Any new threat to helicopters would be a serious challenge to the military as it gears up for a major crackdown against Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias in Baghdad.

Helicopters are always vulnerable to ground fire, said Stephen Trimble, Americas bureau chief for Jane's Defence Weekly. "A well-placed bullet can pretty much take down any helicopter," he said.

Protecting helicopters from attack is significantly more complicated than defending against roadside bombs, Trimble said.

"What you would do with a Humvee is up armor it," he said. But helicopters can't support a significant increase in weight. The U.S. military is looking into technology that tracks and fires at rocket-propelled grenades, he said, but its use on helicopters is a long way off.

Apaches carry multiple high-tech defenses, including long-range sensors, radar jammers and an infrared jammer for countering incoming missiles.

However, the Apaches, which were designed to fight the Soviet Union on the plains of central Europe, have proven vulnerable to intense ground fire.

During the 2003 invasion of Iraq, more than 30 Apaches had to break off an attack after suffering heavy damage in fighting with the Iraqi Republican Guard. One helicopter crashed but the two crew members survived.

Elsewhere, the U.S. command said 18 insurgents were killed in fighting Thursday night and Friday after insurgents opened fire on the Americans from several positions in Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad. No civilian or U.S. casualties were reported, the military said.

DOJ_NMG_0127720

Ramadi, the capital of the western province of Anbar where Sunni insurgents remain well-entrenched, has seen some of the bloodiest street battles of the war.

The U.S. forces returned fire with machine guns, tanks and finally a missile, which struck the intended target, killing at least 15 insurgents.

Insurgents renewed their attacks on Friday, prompting U.S. forces to fire another missile that killed at least three attackers.

Also in Anbar, gunmen assassinated the Sunni chairman of the Fallujah City Council, Abbas Ali Hussein, an outspoken critic of al-Qaida. He was the third council chairman assassinated in Fallujah this year as insurgents target Sunnis willing to cooperate with the U.S. and its Iraqi partners.

The U.S. military said six more troops died Thursday, two in fighting in Anbar province, one of an apparent heart attack and three in vehicle accidents.

The deaths raise to at least 3,092 the number of members of the U.S. military who have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count. At least 2,480 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

In Baghdad, police said they found the bullet-riddled bodies of 23 people throughout the capital — apparent victims of Shiite or Sunni death squads. Three more bodies were found in Kut, southeast of Baghdad, and two in Mosul.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki met Friday with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and the outgoing U.S. commander in Baghdad, Gen. George Casey, to discuss a planned major military operation against armed groups in Baghdad, state television said. It gave no further details.

Iraqi officials in Hillah, a Shiite city about 60 miles south of Baghdad, announced a three-day mourning period after a devastating suicide attack Thursday. Police spokesman Capt. Muthanna Khaled said at least 73 people were killed and 163 wounded.

Police and witnesses said two bombers strolled into the central Maktabat market about 6 p.m. when the area was packed with shoppers buying food for the evening meal.

Police said an officer, Ahmed Abed Majood, became suspicious and grabbed one of the bombers but he managed to detonate his explosives. His partner then blew himself up, too.

No group claimed responsibility, but many residents blamed Sunni insurgents. The Shiite city, located in a religiously mixed province, was the scene of one of Iraq's deadliest attacks — a February 2005 suicide car bombing that killed 125 people.

Iraqi Army Brigades Not At Full Strength (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — The army brigades promised by the Iraqi government to help secure Baghdad have begun to arrive in the city, but with only a little more than half of their manpower, representing at least a partial failure in a crucial first test of the Bush administration's new war plan.

Administration officials had identified the participation of Iraqi military units as an important measure of support from Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's government for the new U.S. strategy in Iraq. Previous efforts to secure Baghdad failed in part because the Iraqi government was never able to deliver the forces it promised.

In disclosing the shortfall, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the first of the three Iraqi brigades ordered to Baghdad had arrived, and the second was en route. Iraqi brigades are supposed to consist of 2,000 to 2,500 soldiers, smaller than American brigades.

"There's good news and bad news," Pace said. "The good news is that, contrary to what has happened in the past, the units that were designated to arrive in Baghdad have begun to arrive, on the schedule they were supposed to be there."

But Pace said the units had only about 55% to 60% of the soldiers assigned to them.

Under the rules of the Iraq Defense Ministry, soldiers are on duty 21 days and then get a week off to take their pay home. These rules mean that as much as a quarter of each unit can be absent with permission at any time.

DOJ_NMG_0127721

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said it was unclear whether the manpower estimates of the units arriving in Baghdad included soldiers who are on authorized leave.

But asked whether the Iraqis were fulfilling their obligations, Pace said the units need to improve. "It needs to be stronger than that," he said.

Although "55% probably isn't good enough," Gates said, the strength of the Iraqi units could improve before they are sent into combat.

Last month, the day after Bush outlined his plan to increase the number of U.S. forces in Iraq, a senior military official said the Pentagon would be keeping a close watch on the movement of Iraqi forces to Baghdad.

"One of the very early things that we're going to monitor is the progress of the Iraqi government providing these additional security forces," the official said.

Pentagon officials said they also were interested in more than just numbers.

"We're watching them down to finite detail: which unit, why that unit, what's the training and readiness assessment of that unit, why was that unit picked, where's it coming from, how many guys got on the bus," the official said at the time. "We're going to watch this very carefully."

At a congressional hearing last month about the new plan, Gates emphasized the importance of the Iraqi troops. He told senators that the ability of the Iraqi government to move its army units to Baghdad would be a vital measure of its commitment.

Under questioning by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Gates had suggested that if Iraq failed to deliver its forces or to meet other benchmarks, the Defense Department would review the new plan.

"I think if at that time we conclude that, at a government level and on a broad level, they have not fulfilled their commitments, then I think we have to reevaluate our strategy," Gates said.

In subsequent public comments, Gates has made it clear that the U.S. has no intention of a wholesale change in approach until all 21,500 additional U.S. troops have arrived and the new commander, Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, has been given a chance to improve security. All the new U.S. troops are scheduled to arrive by May.

Although U.S. officials have made participation of Iraqi units an important benchmark, the Iraqi troops are not likely to be crucial to the early stages of the security plan.

Administration officials have sought to portray the new Baghdad security push as an Iraqi plan. But it was developed by Americans and was only reluctantly accepted by the Maliki government, according to officials who have described its formation. Iraqi forces are likely to have a more important role in the later phases than during the initial push into Baghdad neighborhoods to clear them of militias, insurgents and death squads.

In later phases, Americans plan to join with Iraqi military and police units to hold neighborhoods and prevent the return of violence.

Because the Iraqis will be most needed in the later phases, U.S. commanders believe they still have time to build up the Iraqi troop levels to full strength.

At a congressional hearing Thursday, Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the outgoing U.S. commander in Iraq, said that two of the Iraqi brigade headquarters units had arrived in Baghdad, as had four battalions, a subset of a brigade.

"We're working with them to increase the strength of the forces that they've got in Baghdad," Casey said. "But they are delivering so far on what they said they'd do."

Gates Says Not Enough Iraqi Troops Arriving In Baghdad (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

The Pentagon says the extra brigades Iraq promised to send into Baghdad are starting to show up -- without enough troops.The outgoing chief U-S commander in Iraq told lawmakers yesterday the new units have only 55 to 65 percent of their intended troop levels.Defense Secretary Robert Gates says that "probably isn't good enough," while pointing out the units may be at full strength by the time they're needed for a ramped-up Baghdad security crackdown.The U-S has said it expects Iraq to live up to its troop commitments but hasn't specified what consequences if there aren't enough troops. Gates says it partly depends on "how quickly they get back up to strength."

DOJ_NMG_0127722

Troops Aim To Oust Taliban From Town (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi,

AP, February 3, 2007

Afghanistan's security forces supported by NATO-led troops will "very soon" launch an operation to clear the southern Afghan town overrun and controlled by Taliban militants, an Afghan official said Saturday.

Gen. Mohammad Zahir Azimi, the spokesman for the defense ministry, said that the Taliban were now in control of the town of Musa Qala in Helmand province, which the British troops left after a contentious peace agreement in October.

Hundreds of Taliban militants overran Musa Qala on Thursday evening, destroying the government center and temporarily holding elders hostage, officials and residents said Friday.

The militants' assault, days after a Taliban commander was killed outside the town, raises doubts about the future of the peace deal, which has been criticized by some Western officials as a NATO retreat in hostile Taliban territory.

"We have a plan and we are going to launch that plan very soon," Azimi said. "All our operations are conducted jointly with the police and NATO," he said without elaborating further.

Squadron Leader Dave Marsh, a spokesman for the NATO-led troops in southern Afghanistan, said that the alliance troops stand ready to respond to any decision made by Afghan government.

Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said an "unknown number" of militants had entered Musa Qala. He said late Friday that no NATO-led forces were in the town.

British forces are based in Helmand province but left Musa Qala in October after a peace agreement was signed between elders and the Helmand governor. According to the deal, security was turned over to local leaders, while NATO forces were prevented from entering the town.

Some Western officials complained that the deal put the area, which had been a center for clashes between British troops and resurgent Taliban militants, outside of government and NATO control.

Asadullah Wafa, the governor of Helmand province, said the militants destroyed part of the compound housing the district's governor and police. "People have closed down the shops this morning and those living near the area have moved out of fear," he said Friday.

Mohammad Wali, a resident of Musa Qala who estimated that between 200 and 300 fighters were in town, said residents feared fighting between NATO and militants would resume. Raz Mohammad, another resident, said the Taliban had taken about 12 town elders hostage. Collins said there were indications the elders were now safe.

Late last month, NATO said an airstrike outside of Musa Qala destroyed a Taliban command post, killing a senior militant leader and a number of his deputies. NATO said the Jan. 25 airstrike "was outside the area of the agreement" and did not violate it.

However, Wafa said the Taliban told a gathering of elders last week that they considered the airstrike a violation, and it appeared the assault was in retaliation.

Violence in Afghanistan has risen sharply in the last year. Some 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence in 2006, according to a count by The Associated Press based on numbers from Afghan, NATO and U.S. officials.

American Gen. Dan McNeil on Sunday will replace British Gen. David Richards as the commander of more than 40,000 NATO-led troops in Afghanistan. Military officials have said privately that the change of command will mark a new approach in dealing with resurgent Taliban militants.

Afghan Town Is Overrun By Taliban (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall, Taimoor Shah

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 2 — Taliban militants overran the town of Musa Qala in southern Afghanistan just three months after NATO troops had withdrawn and handed over control to a tribal council, officials said Friday. The insurgents detained police officers and tribal elders, seized weapons and government equipment and bulldozed part of the district offices, according to residents.

DOJ_NMG_0127723

Residents fled in fear that the Taliban's arrival would precipitate further fighting with NATO forces, according to one family. A spokesman for the Interior Ministry in Kabul, Zemarai Bashary, confirmed the attack, which took place on Thursday night, and said the Taliban had disarmed the police stationed there.

A provincial governor, Asadullah Wafa, told Agence France-Presse on Friday that the Taliban had left the town again and that the district offices were now empty. In a statement, NATO said that although the situation remained unclear, the town elders were safe in their homes. A NATO security force was monitoring the situation and ready to support the government and the elders of Musa Qala, it said.

The attack ended a British-brokered experiment aimed at bringing some control over remote regions and keeping Taliban insurgents at bay. Under the plan, British troops agreed to withdraw from the town, leaving a tribal council in charge with a locally recruited police force, and Taliban forces agreed to withdraw to nearby villages.

American officials in Afghanistan had opposed the agreement because it left the broader district of Musa Qala, a poppy-growing region of Helmand Province, open to the Taliban. But the British commander in Helmand at the time defended it as a way to release his men from a pointless and occasionally bloody siege of the town. Residents had welcomed the deal, brokered in October, because it brought a temporary peace to the badly damaged town. But some had warned at the time that it was handing a victory to the Taliban.

A Taliban commander, Mullah Abdul Ghafoor, led the assault on the town Thursday in a rage, because his brother had been killed a few days before in a NATO airstrike, residents said. Leading a large group of armed men, he used a bulldozer to smash through the wall of the district office, said Abdul Razziq, a shopkeeper who said his family fled Musa Qala on Friday. Mullah Ghafoor ordered the elders to leave the compound, burned the government flag and hoisted the banner of the Taliban, Mr. Razziq said.

Taliban Militants Overrun Town After British Exit (WT/AP)

By Jason Straziuso

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Hundreds of Taliban militants overran a southern Afghan town that British troops left after a contentious peace agreement in October, destroying the government center and temporarily holding elders hostage, officials and residents said yesterday.

The assault, days after a Taliban commander was killed outside the town of Musa Qala, raises doubts about the future of the peace deal, which has been criticized by some Western officials as a NATO retreat in hostile Taliban territory.

Two residents of Musa Qala estimated that between 200 and 300 Taliban fighters had overtaken the town. They said the fighters took weapons from the police on Wednesday and destroyed the town's government center late Thursday.

Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said an "unknown number" of militants had entered Musa Qala. He said late yesterday that no NATO-led forces were in the town.

British forces are based in Helmand province but left Musa Qala in October after a peace agreement was signed between elders and the Helmand governor. According to the deal, security was turned over to local leaders, while NATO forces were prevented from entering the town.

Some Western officials complained that the deal put the area, which had been a center for clashes between British troops and resurgent Taliban militants, outside of government and NATO control.

Asadullah Wafa, the governor of Helmand province, said the militants destroyed part of the compound housing the district's governor and police. "People have closed down the shops this morning and those living near the area have moved out of fear," he said.

Mohammad Wali, a resident of Musa Qala who estimated that between 200 and 300 fighters were in town, said residents feared fighting between NATO and militants would resume. Raz Mohammad, another resident, said the Taliban had taken about 12 town elders hostage. Col. Collins said there were indications the elders were now safe.

DOJ_NMG_0127724

Late last month, NATO said an air strike outside of Musa Qala destroyed a Taliban command post, killing a senior militant leader and a number of his deputies. NATO said the Jan. 25 air strike "was outside the area of the agreement" and did not violate it.

However, Mr. Wafa said the Taliban told a gathering of elders last week that they considered the air strike a violation, and it appeared the assault was in retaliation.

Violence in Afghanistan has risen sharply in the last year. About 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence in 2006, according to a count by the Associated Press based on numbers from Afghan, NATO and U.S. officials.

Afghan District 'Under Taliban Control': Defence Ministry (AFP)

AFP, February 3, 2007

The southern Afghan district of Musa Qala was under the control of the Taliban, the Afghan defence ministry said as NATO-led forces said the situation was still unclear.

"It is under Taliban control since yesterday," ministry spokesman General Zahir Azimi told AFP of the remote, rural district in the southern province of Helmand.

Asked if that meant there were no police or administration structures in place, he said: "That's right."

The interior ministry told AFP Friday that the district centre -- the town of Musa Qala -- was "under serious threat and pressure from the enemy" after an attack late Thursday but was "not completely under control of the enemy."

The NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) refused to confirm or deny Saturday that the Taliban were in control.

An ISAF statement late Friday said there were reports that "an unknown number of Taliban have entered the Musa Qala district centre in Helmand province, that pressure has been placed on the elders and the Afghan national flag has been taken down."

"The exact situation in the town is still unclear. Indications are that the town elders are currently safe in their residences," it said.

The British military, which has most of its 6,000 deployment to Afghanistan in Helmand, said it had no new information since a Ministry of Defence statement that the situation was unclear.

The statement also said it was "misleading to report that the Taliban have 'taken the town'."

British forces pulled out of the Musa Qala district centre four months ago on the request of the government, after tribal elders said they would keep the Taliban out.

The deal has been controversial, with fears that it would provide the Taliban with a sanctuary.

Pakistan Says Taliban Activity Is Hard To Stop (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

RAWALPINDI, Pakistan, Feb. 2 — Faced with mounting criticism that Pakistan is not doing enough to thwart incursions into Afghanistan by Pakistan-based Taliban militants, the president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said Friday that securing the porous border was not the sole responsibility of this country.

He also insisted that despite some lapses, Pakistan's security forces were fully behind him in an effort to root out the resurgent Taliban.

"Pakistan will not be allowed to be made a scapegoat," he said, adding that securing the border was also the responsibility of Afghanistan and American and NATO forces.

Pakistan and Afghanistan have traded accusations in recent months over who bears responsibility for enabling the Taliban to regain strength and mount attacks on NATO and allied troops in Afghanistan.

While General Musharraf acknowledged that the Taliban were getting support from within Pakistan, he denied accusations that his security agencies were abetting the insurgency. "This is so preposterous I do not even want to comment," he said. Maintaining that the Pakistani military is a professional force, General Musharraf said there was "no question of anyone abetting."

DOJ_NMG_0127725

A correspondent for The New York Times, Carlotta Gall, recently reported that she had found anecdotal evidence in and around Quetta to support charges by Western diplomats and Pakistani opposition figures that the Pakistani intelligence agencies were encouraging the Taliban insurgency in Afghanistan.

General Musharraf said fighters had been able to slip over the border in part because Pakistan's border guards were poorly armed and were up against "well-trained, well-armed and well-motivated people." He said he would arm the guards better and provide them with security.

The president also denied allegations that some Taliban leaders were taking refuge in Pakistan. Last month the Afghan Intelligence Service announced that it had detained a Taliban spokesman who said the Taliban leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, was in Pakistan. General Musharraf said he was "500 percent sure" that Mullah Omar was in Afghanistan. He said Mullah Dadullah, a top Taliban commander, and other top leaders were also in Afghanistan.

The president did say Mullah Dadullah had escaped arrest three times in Pakistan, though he did not mention when.

General Musharraf also defended the peace deal reached late last year with tribal militants in North Waziristan, a semiautonomous tribal area straddling the border with Afghanistan, calling it "a partial success."

Diplomats and intelligence officials from several countries have said Islamic militants are using the peace deal to consolidate their hold in northern Pakistan and are openly flouting the terms of the accord, in which they agreed to end cross-border help for the Taliban. But the president said that his government was trying to wean the local population away from the militants and that using military force was not the answer.

General Musharraf provided details of plans to fence the porous and craggy Pakistani-Afghan border — a solution to curb cross-border movement that Pakistan has advocated but Afghanistan has rejected.

He said Pakistan would selectively fence 22 miles of the border in North-Western Frontier Province and would later erect a 155-mile fence in Baluchistan Province. He said plans to mine the border had been suspended, "due to sensitivities of the international community."

Pakistan To Fence Border Of Afghanistan (AP)

By Matthew Pennington,

AP, February 3, 2007

President Gen. Pervez Musharraf acknowledged Friday that outgunned Pakistani frontier guards have allowed insurgents to cross into Afghanistan but denied the army or intelligence service was actively helping the Taliban.

Musharraf said the army would soon fence parts of the porous border to stop militant infiltration, despite Afghan opposition. Many observers have been skeptical that the plan will prevent many militants from crossing, especially because the proposed fencing would cover only a tiny portion of the rugged frontier.

Musharraf said Pakistan was being made a scapegoat for the bloodiest surge in violence in Afghanistan since the fundamentalist Taliban regime was ousted five years ago for hosting al-Qaida.

"A misperception is being created that the resurgence of Taliban is from Pakistan. This is absolutely wrong. The resurgence of the Taliban is in Afghanistan, but some support goes from Pakistan," Musharraf said at his army office in Rawalpindi.

His defense of Pakistan's efforts to fight terrorism — and his admission of lapses — follow criticism from U.S. military officials who say cross-border attacks into Afghanistan have risen threefold since Pakistan signed a September peace deal with pro-Taliban militants in its North Waziristan region.

Musharraf said there had been "some incidents" of security forces at isolated border posts "turning a blind eye." He cited an example of two guards, located 500 yards from their section base, being outnumbered by around 20 highly trained and motivated al-Qaida militants.

But he denied any official collusion with militants, saying the powerful Inter-Services Intelligence was staffed by army officers who obey the chain of command.

"There is no question of anyone abetting," Musharraf said.

DOJ_NMG_0127726

Anthony Cordesman, an analyst at the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the situation at the border could reflect divisions within Pakistan's security services.

But while individual Pakistani soldiers may be helping Taliban fighters, "it doesn't in any sense mean there is any coherent Pakistani military involvement," Cordesman said.

The role of the shadowy ISI — which helped create the Taliban in the 1990s to project Pakistan's influence over its western neighbor — has been the subject of growing international debate.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai has directly accused it of fomenting the insurgency and claims the agency is harboring Taliban leader Mullah Omar in the Pakistani city of Quetta.

Musharraf said Omar has not been in Pakistan since studying there as a teenager, although he revealed that other Taliban leaders come and go.

He said a top militant commander, Mullah Dadullah, had been inside Pakistan three times but evaded capture. He called it "a combined failure" of Pakistan and anti-terror allies who shared the intelligence.

But in December, Pakistan helped foreign forces "eliminate" Mullah Akhtar Mohammad Osmani — a top Omar lieutenant — in southern Afghanistan, just across the border from Pakistan, Musharraf said.

"You could not have done this unless ISI cooperated," he said.

He accused Afghanistan of failing to police its own border, saying Pakistan had about 1,000 posts along the 1,510-mile frontier, while on the Afghan side there were less than 100.

He announced Pakistan had begun preparations to fence seven or eight locations — a total of 22 miles — along its northwest border. They would not use land mines because of concerns from the international community, Musharraf said.

However, he said plans for a second phase foresaw using both fencing and mines to secure 150 miles of the border further south in Baluchistan province.

"No one has the right to criticize unless they come up with an alternative solution," Musharraf said.

Arsallah Jamal, governor of Afghanistan's eastern Khost province, which borders Pakistan, said the decision would just divide people and not stop terrorism.

Afghan federal government officials could not be reached for comment.

The United States, meanwhile, gave eight Cobra attack helicopters to Pakistan on Friday to help it combat Taliban and al-Qaida militants in the border regions. The U.S. Embassy said another 12 Cobras were to be delivered later in a military aid package worth $50 million.

——

Associated Press writer Jason Straziuso in Kabul, Afghanistan, contributed to this report.

DOJ:

Challenge To U.S. Attorney Appointment Should Be Dismissed, Filing Says (ADG)

By Linda Satter

Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, February 3, 2007

A filing last week challenging the constitutionality of the December appointment of Tim Griffin to be U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas is off base and should be dismissed, Griffin's office said Friday in a written response.

The challenge and the response were filed in the case of Antoine Demetrius Baker of Little Rock, who is charged with capital murder and may face the death penalty if Griffin's office seeks and obtains permission to present that option to jurors in the event of a conviction.

Baker is accused of engineering the December 2002 shooting death of Jerry Otis, 21, who was scheduled to testify against Baker in an aggravated robbery and theft case stemming from an August 2002 altercation in which Otis was hit in the face with a pistol and robbed of $ 250.

On Jan. 23, Baker's newly appointed attorney, John Wesley Hall of Little Rock, filed a motion to declare Griffin's Dec. 20, 2006, interim appointment by U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales unconstitutional. Hall said an illegal appointment would prevent Griffin's office from legally carrying out its plan to add allegations to an existing indictment to justify seeking the death penalty against Baker.

Hall said the interim appointment violates Article II, Section 2, of the U. S. Constitution, which covers presidential appointments, as well as a section of the U. S. Code that was altered last year as part of Congress ' reauthorization of the USAPATRIOT Act.

Assistant U. S. Attorney Patrick Harris, the lead prosecutor in Baker's case, said in an 18-page response that Hall's interpretation of the sections and his corresponding arguments "lack merit," and that Griffin's appointment "was plainly lawful" and "also entirely constitutional."

Griffin's appointment immediately followed the resignation of Bud Cummins, who says the Department of Justice asked him to resign after five years on the job to give someone else a chance at the plum political appointment.

Griffin is a lawyer who had worked as an assistant under Cummins for several months and previously was a military prosecutor, a legislative attorney and an attorney in private practice, as well as a special assistant to President Bush who worked under Bush's political adviser, Karl Rove.

The ouster of Cummins, a popular and well-respected U. S. attorney on both sides of the political aisle, along with the forced resignations of a handful of other U. S. attorneys across the country, prompted an outcry from those who say the Bush administration is trying to circumvent the normal process of selecting top federal prosecutors. The situation also has prompted proposed legislation to reinstate language in the USAPATRIOT Act to limit attorney general appointments to 120 days.

Harris reiterated what the Justice Department has said — that it intends to formally nominate Griffin and submit his nomination for Senate approval, in line with the standard procedure for installing new U. S. attorneys.

Harris also argued, in part, "Because United States Attorneys are 'inferior officers,' the Appointments Clause of the Constitution expressly permits Congress to vest their appointment in the Attorney General, and does not require the advice and consent of the Senate before they may be appointed."

He also noted, "It is wellestablished that a court cannot dismiss an indictment issued under a United States Attorney whose appointment was allegedly infirm."

The matter is pending before U. S. District Judge G. Thomas Eisele.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Siemens Faces Scrutiny In U.S. (WSJ)

By Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

German industrial giant Siemens AG, already weighed down by a cross-border corruption probe, faces heightened scrutiny after it disclosed that U.S. authorities also are investigating the matter.

Siemens said the Department of Justice is investigating "possible criminal violations of U.S. law by Siemens." It also said it understands that the enforcement division of the Securities and Exchange Commission is conducting an "informal inquiry" into the allegations of wrongdoing.

The Munich-based conglomerate said in December that it had uncovered €420 million, or about $545 million, in suspicious transactions stretching back more than seven years. That disclosure came after more than 200 German police raided offices and homes of Siemens employees in mid-November, arresting several people linked to the company's telecommunications-equipment business.

German prosecutors are working with investigators in neighboring countries and said they suspect Siemens officials diverted funds through sham consulting contracts into slush funds to bribe customers abroad. Authorities released half a dozen people -- including a former Siemens management-board member and a former chief financial officer of the telecom unit -- before Christmas after they agreed to cooperate.

DOJ_NMG_0127728

Siemens says that it is cooperating fully with investigators and that it has "zero tolerance" for illegal behavior. It says any alleged wrongdoing was confined to "individual acts" by certain managers but acknowledged in December that it had identified "a material weakness" in its financial controls.

Some of the top suspects who have been interrogated by German prosecutors allege that top management was aware of bribes and other illegal payments. Prosecutors are investigating the allegations to determine how high up the corporate ladder the alleged corruption traveled.

The German company disclosed the DOJ investigation and the SEC's informal inquiry on Thursday as part of a regulatory filing with the SEC detailing its financial results for its first quarter ended Dec. 31, 2006. A Siemens spokesman said Friday that the company had learned of the DOJ investigation the previous week. He declined to provide more details.

The DOJ and SEC declined to comment.

The disclosure of a U.S. investigation doesn't come as a surprise. Shares of Siemens are listed on the New York Stock Exchange, and the company warned in a December regulatory filing with the SEC that both the SEC and the DOJ might launch investigations of their own. Still, a Washington-based investigation heightens the legal risks for Siemens, which could face lawsuits and be banned from bidding for infrastructure contracts in the U.S. and other countries if there is evidence of wrongdoing.

Siemens's shares were down 84 European cents at €84.30 in Frankfurt. Siemens's share price has risen in recent months despite the criminal probe. Most investors have been focusing on rising profit as management restructures far-flung holdings to narrow the company's focus and jettison underperforming businesses -- including the telecom unit, formerly Siemens's largest.

Siemens says it also is taking aggressive steps to improve its compliance procedures.

Write to Mike Esterl at mike.esterl@dowjones.com1

Sumner Redstone Settles Suit With Son Over Family's Fortune (WSJ)

By Matthew Karnitschnig

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

Hollywood mogul Sumner Redstone, the chairman of both CBS Corp. and Viacom Inc., settled a lawsuit with his estranged son over the family's vast fortune, ending a potentially messy confrontation that threatened to complicate his succession plans.

The terms of the agreement, filed in a court in Maryland where the family business, National Amusements Inc., is incorporated, weren't disclosed. But people close to the matter said the family company repurchased the one-sixth stake held by the son, Brent Redstone.

The sale also consolidates the elder Mr. Redstone's control over the family business. Before the settlement, Sumner Redstone owned two-thirds of National Amusements stock, while his son and daughter, Shari Redstone, shared equal ownership of the other third. Sumner Redstone now owns 80% of National Amusements and his daughter the remaining 20%. It was unclear how much National Amusements paid for the stake. The lawsuit valued the company, which holds a controlling stake in Viacom, CBS and a large cinema chain, at $8 billion.

A spokesman for Sumner Redstone confirmed that a settlement had been reached but said the two sides had agreed to keep the details confidential. A lawyer for Brent Redstone said his client had no comment.

Brent Redstone's suit, in which he alleged that his father led a campaign to "freeze out" his son from the family business, offered a rare glimpse into the difficult personal relationships of one of Hollywood's most powerful men. Sumner Redstone expressed shock at the suit and said it had both pained and angered him.

In his lawsuit, filed last year in the Circuit Court of Maryland for Baltimore, Brent Redstone, 56 years old, sought the dissolution of National Amusements. Brent, a former Boston prosecutor who now lives on a ranch in Colorado, claimed in the suit that he was barred from gaining access to his one-sixth stake and was allowed only to sell it back to his family.

It is unclear what role Shari will play when her father dies. But Sumner Redstone has said he would like his daughter to play a larger role in the company's affairs. She is president of National Amusements and runs the business's movie-theater chain.

Sumner Redstone faces another lawsuit, this one brought by his nephew, Michael, who claims he and other family members were bilked out of their inheritance. National Amusements says the allegations are "baseless."

DOJ_NMG_0127729

Write to Matthew Karnitschnig at matthew.karnitschnig@wsj.com1

CRIMINAL LAW:

Federal Prosecutors Widen Pursuit Of Death Penalty As States Ease Off (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey, Gary Fields

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

At a time when many states are backing away from capital punishment, the federal government is aggressively pursuing -- and winning -- more death sentences, including in jurisdictions that traditionally oppose them.

On Tuesday, federal prosecutors in New York persuaded a jury to give a death sentence to Ronell Wilson, a 24-year-old man convicted of killing two undercover detectives by shooting each in the back of the head. The decision -- the first time in more than 50 years that a federal jury in New York agreed to sentence someone to death -- marked something of a milestone for the Justice Department in its continuing effort to apply the death penalty more evenly across the country.

Today, there are 47 people on federal death row -- more than double the number six years ago -- and Mr. Wilson this week became the seventh sentenced in a state without a death statute of its own since the federal death penalty was reinstated in 1988. The ranks may grow in the months ahead, with several capital cases on tap in locales traditionally opposed to the death penalty.

The last federal execution was in 2003, when Louis Jones Jr. died by lethal injection at an Indiana facility where all federal executions now take place.

"I get the sense that it's really beginning to change a lot. There seems to be a renewed emphasis on this," said Jensen Barber, an attorney defending Larry Gooch, a man facing federal drug-related murder charges and a potential death sentence in Washington, D.C.

The growth in federal capital cases, many observers say, results from a heightened effort by the Justice Department to centralize the process for deciding whether prosecutors should push for capital punishment.

Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin says the government is making an effort to pursue capital punishment uniformly across the country. "We have in place a clearly defined review process to ensure the death penalty is applied in a consistent and fair manner nationwide," he said.

Congress in 1986 began expanding federal jurisdiction to crimes that traditionally had been prosecuted by states -- imposing mandatory minimum sentences in crack cocaine cases, for example -- and two years later expanded federal reach into capital cases. Still, it took 14 years before federal prosecutors under then-Attorney General John Ashcroft managed to obtain capital convictions in jurisdictions that didn't have the death penalty at the local level.

In many cases, the Justice Department has asserted jurisdiction even though local prosecutors were prepared to handle the cases. In Puerto Rico, for example, federal prosecutors have unsuccessfully sought death sentences for four defendants since 2003 although Puerto Rico's constitution explicitly states that "The death penalty shall not exist."

Puerto Rico's Secretary of Justice at the time, Anabelle Rodriguez, said her department's only recourse was to try to negotiate with the federal government to make it "respect local idiosyncrasy" so a death sentence wouldn't be enforced.

The rising count on federal death row comes as many states reconsider the death penalty or issue moratoriums on the punishment for a variety of reasons, including sloppy executions and exonerations of condemned inmates because of DNA evidence.

Since the 1988 reinstatement of the federal death penalty, prosecutors have attempted to bring capital cases in federal courts across the country. Typically, this has proved much easier in states such as Texas, which have death penalties of their own, than in states such as Iowa, which don't. In 2000, there were 18 inmates on federal death row, but none were from a state that disallows capital punishment.

Things began to change in 2002, when federal prosecutors secured a death sentence in Michigan, a state without a death penalty. A year later, Mr. Ashcroft ordered U.S. attorneys in New York and Connecticut to seek death penalties against 12 defendants even though prosecutors handling the cases had recommended against doing so or decided not to pursue capital charges. At the time, the Justice Department said there shouldn't be "one standard in Georgia and another in Vermont."

DOJ_NMG_0127730

"There's all this talk about how death row is declining, but that's not true for the federal system," said Ruth Friedman, director of the Federal Capital Habeas Project, a federally funded program that assists lawyers in the post-conviction stage of capital cases.

Indeed, the rising count on federal death row in recent years has occurred while the number of inmates on state death rows has been falling. After a long rise, the number of people on state death rows has fallen to 3,344 last year from 3,593 in 2000, according to the Death Penalty Information Center, an organization that tracks capital cases.

Eric Holder, a former U.S. attorney in Washington who was deputy attorney general during the Clinton administration, said that in the 1990s, he and then-Attorney General Janet Reno weren't as likely to override a local federal prosecutor who didn't think a crime warranted capital punishment.

Overriding local federal prosecutors "was relatively rare during the Clinton years," Mr. Holder said. "Having both been local prosecutors, we really deferred to our U.S. attorneys' understanding that they knew their local situations."

The Justice Department declined to comment on this point.

Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center, said concerns that federal capital cases were being clustered in pro-death penalty states led the Justice Department under Mr. Ashcroft to intensify its push for death sentences in states that traditionally oppose the punishment.

This process is often difficult. In two recent cases in Washington, D.C, federal judges ruled out the possibility of death penalties. In New York, juries have opted for life sentences instead of executions in more than a dozen federal cases.

Mr. Gooch, the defendant in the drug-related murder case, was initially charged with two murders and slated for trial under D.C. law, which prohibits capital punishment. Later, the U.S. attorneys charged him with two additional killings connected with a drug ring -- making it a federal case and bringing the death penalty into play.

Mr. Barber, his lawyer, unsuccessfully challenged the move, citing a 1992 referendum undertaken at the behest of Congress in which D.C. voters overwhelmingly banned the use of capital punishment. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting congressional delegate, has written a letter to the U.S. attorney for D.C., objecting to the "new and troubling pattern" of federal capital cases in the district.

Stay Of Executions (LAT)

By Andrew Cohen

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

LURKING LARGELY beneath the radar the last few weeks, while media coverage has focused on the perjury and obstruction-of-justice trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby and the Bush administration's flip-flop on domestic surveillance, were a series of important legal and political developments in the increasingly muddled world of capital punishment in the United States.

Nearly 13 years after U.S. Supreme Court Justice Harry Blackmun famously promised that he would no "longer tinker with the machinery of death," judges and politicians are tinkering — and doing so in ever emboldened ways. From Jan. 19 through Jan. 26, reports the Death Penalty Information Center, eight executions were stayed in North Carolina, Ohio and Texas — with four more postponed Thursday in Tennessee.

In North Carolina, a state judge blocked three executions after death row inmates challenged the state's lethal injection procedures. In Ohio, three more executions were stayed pending more thorough clemency reviews. Two Texas capital cases were halted, one by a state judge and one by the U.S. Supreme Court.

And in California, a federal trial judge in December declared unconstitutional the state's method of lethal injection. Even the conservative U.S. Supreme Court, which in large measure has the final say on whether and to what extent capital punishment may be used, has begun to pay more attention to death penalty procedures. The justices in January heard three capital cases out of Texas and agreed to hear another out of Washington state before the end of the term.

But it's not just the judiciary that gummed up the machinery of death last month. In Maryland, legislators proposed a measure that would ban capital punishment in the state, a bill Gov. Martin O'Malley said he would sign into law. In the Ohio cases, Gov. Ted Strickland, new to his post, declared that he has "serious questions" about capital punishment, and a former corrections director who oversaw executions in the Buckeye State said he favors the end of capital punishment. In New Jersey, a state commission recommended the abolition of the death penalty in that state too. And it was Tennessee Gov. Phil Bredesen on Thursday who declared a 90-day moratorium on executions, halting the four in that state.

DOJ_NMG_0127731

None of this means the end of capital punishment is near. A majority of Americans still support capital punishment in one form or another (and there are still states, mostly in the South and the West, where juries are still handing down death sentences for murder). But there is a clear, marked trend toward limiting the circumstances in which capital punishment is applied and the manner in which executions are performed. As the Death Penalty Information Center notes, "The number of death sentences per year has dropped dramatically since 1999."

In some cases, the architects of this national change are loyal to capital punishment and only want to protect it from substantive challenge by firming up the fairness in its procedures (which, trust me, needing firming up). These folks argue — and with good reason if Supreme Court precedent is any guide — that if more isn't done to ensure that death sentences are fairly meted out, they will one day be halted. In other cases, it is the opponents of capital punishment who have been able to muster support for their cause by using compelling statistics that show the failure of the death penalty as a deterrent.

In part, the refined attitudes about the death penalty also have come about because of advances in technology. New DNA testing and, just as important, a newfound willingness by judges and prosecutors to revisit old capital cases have led to many well-publicized exonerations of death row inmates, each one cutting into the core of confidence that people have about the reliability and accuracy of capital punishment. Since 1973, reports the Death Penalty Information Center, at least 120 people on death row have been exonerated for one reason or another.

Where is capital punishment likely to be at the end of this mini-upheaval? I have no idea. But I am willing to offer an educated guess: The death penalty will exist in fewer states than it does now. And in those states where it still exists, capital procedures, from jury selection through lethal injection, will be subject to a much more rigorous judicial review. Politicians may be more willing to ensure that capital defendants get decent representation at trial, and when they do not, judges may be more willing to toss tainted convictions. And DNA, the latest "great equalizer," will loom in the background of every capital case that does not otherwise involve irrefutable evidence.

After a generation of often reckless expansion of the death penalty, the pendulum is starting to swing back. The change didn't start in January 2007. But it sure looks like it is picking up the pace.

Andrew Cohen is CBS News' chief legal analyst.

Federal Jury Finds Former Secretary Guilty In Theft Of Coca-Cola Secrets (FINDLAW/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

(AP) - ATLANTA-A federal jury convicted a former Coca-Cola secretary Friday of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the world's largest beverage maker in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi.

Joya Williams faces up to 10 years in prison. No sentencing date was immediately set.

The jury of seven women and five men deliberated for 11 1/2 hours over three days. On Thursday, jurors told U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester they were "hung" and could not decide. Forrester told the jury to try again Friday.

Williams showed no visible reaction when the verdict was announced. She remains free on bond, pending sentencing.

Williams was fired as a secretary to Coca-Cola's global brand director at the company's Atlanta headquarters after the allegations came to light.

The government says Williams stole confidential documents and samples of products that hadn't been launched from The Coca-Cola Co. and gave them to Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney as part of a conspiracy to sell the items to Purchase, New York-based PepsiCo Inc. for at least $1.5 million (â,¬1.15 million).

Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing. Duhaney testified previously that Williams spearheaded the scheme. Dimson did not testify.

DOJ_NMG_0127732

The government said Williams was deeply in debt, unhappy in her job and seeking a big payday, so she embarked on the scheme to steal trade secrets.

Defense lawyer Janice Singer urged jurors to use their common sense, and she argued that prosecutors did not prove their case beyond a reasonable doubt.

Singer suggested that Dimson and Duhaney stole the documents and product samples from Williams without her knowledge and conspired to sell them to Pepsi behind her back. Williams testified earlier this week she left a key under her doormat for one of the co-defendants, perhaps explaining how they could have gotten into her home.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said during his closing argument Wednesday that the key under the mat claim was one of many lies told by Williams.

During two days on the stand, Williams testified that she did not steal anything from Coke, but rather took documents and product samples home to protect herself in case her boss questioned whether she was doing her job.

She also claimed that $4,000 (â‚¬3,072) in cash she deposited into her bank account in June 2006, just days after Dimson was given $30,000 (â‚¬23,041) in cash from an undercover FBI agent in exchange for Coke materials, came from a friend, not from Dimson.

But the friend, Clifton Carroll, testified Tuesday that Williams was lying; he said the most money he ever loaned her was $400 (â‚¬307), and that was after her July 5 arrest.

Williams' credibility was an issue for the jury to weigh during its deliberations.

After the verdict was announced, Singer said her client had been "prepared for the worst. She was ready for whatever the jury did."

"She's holding her own," Singer added. "She seems pretty strong right now."

Pak, the prosecutor, said, "We're happy with the verdict. It was the right verdict based on the evidence in the case."

He said it is too early to tell what sentence the government will recommend. He noted that under federal guidelines, the fact that Williams testified and denied involvement could weigh against her at sentencing.

--

Associated Press Writer Giovanna Dell'Orto contributed to this story.

Coke Worker Guilty Of Stealing Secrets (FT)

By Andrew Ward In Atlanta

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

A former Coca-Cola secretary was on Friday found guilty of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the soft drink company with the aim of selling them to PepsiCo for more than $1.5m.

Joya Williams could face up to 10 years in prison for the crime, which was foiled after PepsiCo received a letter offering “very detailed and confidential information” about its fierce rival.

PepsiCo informed Coke about the plot and the FBI was brought in to investigate, with the help of an undercover agent posing as a go-between for PepsiCo.

Two co-conspirators – Edmund Duhaney and Ibrahim Dimson – pleaded guilty in October but Ms Williams contested the charges.

Jurors had been deadlocked over the verdict, but on thursday the judge told them to keep trying to reach a decision.

The trial was in Atlanta, where Ms Williams worked as an administrative assistant to Javier Sanchez Lamelas, a senior Coke marketing officer.

Prosecutors played surveillance video taken inside Coke’s headquarters showing the 41-year-old stuffing documents into her bag and handling bottles of prototype beverages, sometimes late in the evening.

Jurors heard that the stolen materials included details of a new Coke product code-named Project Lancelot.

The 120-year-old recipe of Coke's trademark cola – the so-called “secret formula” -- was not involved.

Prosecutors explained how Ms Williams passed the stolen materials to her co-conspirators, both ex-convicts, who told PepsiCo they planned to sell to the highest bidder.

"Just think," PepsiCo was urged in a letter. "Instead of having to second-guess what your number one competitor is doing, you will know exactly what products and marketing campaigns they are going to set in motion."

The undercover FBI agent agreed to buy the clandestine information on behalf of PepsiCo and made several payments to Mr Dimson worth a combined $45,000, including a cookie tin full of cash handed over at Atlanta airport.

Mr Dimson wanted a further $1.5m for the most valuable items.

Ex-Duracell Worker Stole Trade Secrets (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., Feb. 2 (AP) — A former Duracell employee pleaded guilty Friday in Federal District Court to stealing trade secrets from the company, the authorities said.

Prosecutors said the former employee, Edward R. Grande, 48, a cell development technologist from Seymour, Conn., copied and downloaded computer research last year about Duracell's AA batteries.

Mr. Grande then sent the information to two Duracell competitors, prosecutors said. Neither of Duracell's competitors had requested or solicited Duracell's trade secret information, and both of the rivals sent the information back to Duracell.

Duracell, a unit of Procter & Gamble, generates more than $1 billion in revenue from the sale of AA batteries.

Sentencing is scheduled for April 23.

"The theft of trade secrets is a serious crime that has the potential to cause significant economic damage to the owners of trade secrets and their shareholders," the United States attorney for the district of Connecticut, Kevin O'Connor, said.

Mover Shot By Prince George's Official Dies (WP)

By Eric Rich And Ruben Castaneda, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Hospitalized Man Too Ill To Give Details of Incident

A furniture deliveryman who was shot last week by a Prince George's County homeland security official died yesterday without having recovered to the point that he could describe the circumstances of the shooting, authorities and an attorney for his family said.

Brandon D. Clark, 22, of Oxon Hill succumbed to his injuries at Prince George's Hospital Center. He and a co-worker had been in critical condition there since they were shot by Keith A. Washington, who is a veteran county police officer, as they delivered a Marlo Furniture bedroom set to his home in Accokeek.

Police initially said that Washington, a former driver for County Executive Jack B. Johnson, apparently acted in self-defense and that Clark and his co-worker, Robert White, would probably be charged with assault. They have since backed off that statement, saying they would wait until detectives have completed their work before deciding whom to charge.

The movers were unarmed, authorities have said.

In a statement yesterday confirming Clark's death, Prince George's Police Chief Melvin C. High said, "This is an unfortunate turn of events that now becomes a part of the internal and criminal investigation."

The case has attracted wide attention because of a pattern of previous complaints against Washington, 45, who was appointed deputy homeland security director by Johnson in 2004.

A law enforcement source confirmed yesterday that -- as Clark's girlfriend and the attorney for the family have said -- the deliverymen contacted a supervisor on the night of the shooting. According to the girlfriend, Leelee Best, the men told the supervisor that Washington was angry over a bedrail. The family attorney, Michael J. Winkelman, said the men were instructed to give Washington whatever he wanted.

Another source familiar with the investigation said yesterday that, in a brief report filed immediately after the shooting, Washington alleged that Clark and White, 36, of the District, were in a part of the house they were not supposed to be in. Both sources spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Under state law, police officers have up to 10 days to give a full statement after a shooting. Washington has not responded to messages seeking comment since the incident.

DOJ_NMG_0127734

Speaking to reporters yesterday morning, Winkelman said Clark's family members were grieving but were grateful "for the outpouring of public and private support" they have received. He asked for "continued thoughts and prayers" for White, who remains in critical condition.

Winkelman said that during the time he was hospitalized, Clark was unable to communicate with his family in any substantive way about the events that led to his shooting. As far as he knows, Winkelman said, Clark "never told his side of the story to anyone before he died."

Clark was a graduate of DuVal High School, where he played on the football team. Clark's family has described him as a big, gentle man, easygoing and slow to anger, standing 6 feet 4 inches and weighing more than 260 pounds.

Glenn F. Ivey, state's attorney for Prince George's, has said two investigations of the shooting incident will proceed on separate tracks: One team of police detectives will investigate Washington's use of force; the other set of detectives will look into what crimes, if any, occurred during the encounter.

Ivey said yesterday that a grand jury would consider the matter once he has received the findings of the investigations, Clark's autopsy report and other documents. "We can't rush into the grand jury," he said. "It would be counterproductive to hurry the investigations."

Official Has History Of Altercations, Sources Say (WP)

By Cheryl W. Thompson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

In the 10 days since Prince George's County homeland security official Keith A. Washington shot two unarmed deliverymen at his Accokeek home, some critics have told of run-ins with him dating back 15 years. They describe a man who loses his temper easily and has ended up in physical and verbal altercations.

Washington's supporters, including relatives and some county officials, have been reluctant to talk in the midst of an investigation, other than to say that Washington acted in self-defense.

The case took a turn yesterday when one of the men, Brandon D. Clark, 22, died at Prince George's Hospital Center. Clark, of Oxon Hill, and Robert White, 36, were delivering a Marlo Furniture bedroom set to Washington when they were shot during an altercation. White, of the District, remained in critical condition.

Washington, a deputy director of homeland security and a 16-year member of the county's police force, did not respond to messages left on his cellphone. He has been on paid administrative leave since the incident Jan. 24.

Washington has come under investigation at least three times by the Prince George's police department for assault complaints or "unbecoming conduct" and has been sued at least twice, including once by a D.C. police officer who said that Washington assaulted him and had him falsely arrested, according to interviews and court records.

"Keith has a bad temper," said Michon Charles, the mother of Washington's teenage daughter, Hali. "He gets hot under the collar very quickly."

Charles, who dated Washington briefly, recalled the day 13 years ago when Washington stormed into the property management office where she worked in San Antonio and yelled at her with her co-workers in earshot.

"He had a fit," Charles said, when they began discussing child support.

Charles asked a fellow employee to call the police, and the employee, Frances Broussard Peterson, said she told Washington, "You can't act like that in here."

Washington, 45, is a close friend, occasional dinner partner and fraternity brother of County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D), who named him to the homeland security position in 2004. Johnson said at the time that Washington would "lead this county in the right direction, ensuring that the office of Homeland Security provides the protection and required services that the county needs and desires." He said in an interview last summer that he hired Washington because he was "mentally tough."

Washington once served as Johnson's driver. He also worked on and contributed to Johnson's campaign in 2002. He was one of few county police officers to support Johnson, who, as state's attorney, had focused on combating police abuses. Washington ran unsuccessfully last year for County Council.

DOJ_NMG_0127735

Washington, who was born in Houston, joined the Army at 18 so he could earn money to pay for college, he said in an interview last year. According to his rÃ©sumÃ©, he is a lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserve and has extensive training in counterterrorism.

Hali Washington, 18 and the elder of his two daughters, said she and her father have had a troubled relationship for years. He went through a period of not paying child support, court records show. She said she last saw him New Year's Eve, when she was visiting her aunt -- his sister -- in Houston for the holidays. He was upset that his sister had agreed to let his daughter and her cousin attend a party at a nightclub that evening, Hali Washington said.

"He made a huge scene in the courtyard of the apartment complex," she said in a phone interview from San Antonio, where she lives with her mother. "He was acting crazy and screaming. He told me he wasn't going to be my dad if I stayed there."

Washington has also had problems with other police officers, records show.

D.C. Police Officer Robert L. Johnson Jr. was walking across the parking lot of the Oak Tree Restaurant in Oxon Hill in 1994 when Washington, who had been hired to work security there, stopped him, according to a complaint by Johnson contained in a civil lawsuit.

Washington recognized Johnson from an earlier run-in at another nightclub, said another D.C. police officer who said he was with Johnson at the nightclub. Johnson said Washington "physically constrained" him and "placed him under arrest with no justification," according to court records. A judge found Johnson not guilty, said lawyer Robert Matty, who defended Johnson. Washington denied in the lawsuit that he acted improperly.

Johnson then sued Washington, the restaurant owner and the county for assault and battery and false arrest. The case was dismissed after Johnson was shot and killed in 1997 after a traffic dispute near the 6th District police station, where he worked, said G. Clifton Patterson, another attorney for Johnson.

Gerard F. Policicchio, who owned the Oak Tree Restaurant, said he hired Washington on the recommendation of another officer to work there in case "things got a little out of hand." He said that Washington was "outstanding."

"He was not over-physical with anybody at all," Policicchio said. "He was always level-headed. Never the rambunctious type to go after something that wasn't there."

In 2000, a jury found that Washington and a county corrections officer had violated the rights of an Adelphi man, David P. Maslousky, who was arrested after he objected to the way Washington treated a motorist in 1997. Maslousky said he was strip-searched by a corrections officer at the police station. He sued the officers and the county, and a jury awarded him $260,000. The case was appealed, and Washington prevailed at a new trial.

In January 2004, Dennis Tozser, a neighbor, complained to the police department about Washington. The two were members of a homeowners association board in Accokeek when, Tozser said, Washington pushed him during a neighborhood watch meeting. Washington was saying that the management company ignored him when he requested copies of contracts the association had with vendors, Tozser said.

"I stepped in to say there's more to the story, and Keith said, 'Let's go outside and settle this,' " Tozser recalled. "He wanted to duke it out and took off his jacket. I put my hands in my pocket and kept them there, because I wasn't getting involved with a police officer," he said. "That's when he shoved me in the chest."

Police Capt. A. Mark Ciccone told Tozser in a letter nearly a year later that there was no cause to discipline Washington. "The investigation of your complaint . . . has failed to sufficiently sustain any acts of misconduct on his part," Ciccone said.

Also in early 2004, Washington was charged with a misdemeanor on suspicion of assaulting a property manager during a homeowners board meeting. He was suspended with pay pending an investigation. The charge was later dropped.

Tozser said he sees Washington at civic association meetings and said the two are cordial.

"I've talked to him. I've met with him," Tozser said. "I thought he sought anger management and had things under control, because it's been a long while since I heard anything with regards to him getting involved in a situation like this."

News researcher Alice Crites contributed to this report.

Feds Tout Results In Crime Crackdown (NOTP)

By Gwen Filosa, Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0127736

New Orleans Times-Picayune, February 3, 2007

Team approach nets convictions, arrests

Federal agents announced a slew of arrests, indictments and convictions Friday, saying it marks only the start of their promise to team up with New Orleans police to end the violent crime wave plaguing New Orleans.

Their haul includes a north shore man who admitted trying to hire a hit man to murder a federal agent; a disgraced doctor now criminally charged with abusing her prescription power to deal painkillers; and a 21-year-old man accused of selling heroin and crack at a public housing complex.

By hitting suspects with gun and narcotics charges, federal law enforcement has vowed to stifle the group of violent offenders who seemingly glide in and out of the state criminal justice system.

"The feds are not screwing around," said Jim Bernazzani, the FBI's special agent in charge of the New Orleans field division. "The train has left the station."

In all, the federal, state and local partnership racked up two guilty verdicts, nine indictments of ten defendants, four arrests and one guilty plea in a plot to murder a Drug Enforcement Administration agent.

"We are ratcheting up the pressure as we speak," said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten during a news conference Friday in which various federal agencies ticked off their recent results. "We're not going to be able to do this logistically every week. The federal numbers are small, but the power and leverage we wield is enormous."

Cases ticked off

Letten and his colleagues announced the following cases:

Chris Walker, 31, of Hammond, pleaded guilty in federal court Friday for hatching a plot to kill a DEA agent who helped bust him and others in a crack cocaine ring based in Tangipahoa Parish. He admitted shopping for a hit man while in jail and paying $1,000 as a down payment for the killing. Walker faces a maximum sentence of life in prison. Johnnie Sims, 26, of Robert, pleaded guilty in November to similar crimes.

Jacqueline Cleggett, a former doctor living in Baton Rouge, is charged with illegally distributing OxyContin, Vicodin, methadone and other drugs between June 2000 and February 2002 from her eastern New Orleans medical practice. She faces a 37-count indictment accusing her of handing out a few thousand tablets before her medical license was revoked.

John Sears, 21, of New Orleans is charged with dealing crack cocaine, heroin and marijuana in the courtyard of the Iberville public housing complex, which neighbors the French Quarter. New Orleans police arrested him Jan. 23 in the 1500 block of Bienville Street after recognizing him from previous arrests.

Sears had a loaded .38-caliber handgun in his waistband, police said, and a body search turned up five grams of crack and seven grams of heroin hidden in his underpants. Twenty grams of marijuana was found in his pants pocket, the indictment says.

When arrested Jan. 23, Sears was already awaiting trial at Orleans Parish Criminal District Court on a 2004 case of dealing cocaine and heroin, and a second case from 2005 in which he is charged with dealing crack. Sears is in federal custody without bond.

Jermaine Surtain, 29, is now in the custody of the U.S. Marshal's Office, charged with having firearms that were stolen from Puglia's Sporting Goods in Metairie on New Year's Day. Surtain, who has a 2000 conviction for possession of crack cocaine, faces the federal felon-in-possession charge and up to 10 years in prison.

Surtain was nabbed with a stolen M-15 assault rifle, one of 122 guns looted from the store, authorities said. Surtain, of Algiers, was arrested Jan. 7 in Luling and booked with one count of burglary. But as of Friday, he will face prosecution at U.S. District Court after a team-effort investigation between the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office and federal agents.

Surtain fits the federal effort's plan to remove armed convicted felons from the streets and send them through the U.S. Attorney's Office, officials said.

'No revolving door'

"In the federal system, there is no revolving door," Bernazzani said.

On Monday, FBI agents will meet with NOPD homicide detectives and begin pounding the pavement Tuesday, Bernazzani said.

Fifteen agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration have been in the city since last week, embedded with the New Orleans Police Department, said Bill Renton, the DEA special agent in charge in New Orleans.

"The city is populated by great people," Renton said. "We can't let a small cadre of thugs run them out of the city."

The NOPD said the federal agents are working side by side with patrol officers.

"They're at roll calls, they're in these dark alleys and they're kicking in the doors with us," said NOPD Deputy Chief James Scott, "They're in the cars with us."

On Thursday night alone, Scott said, police and DEA agents teamed up to confiscate 141 grams of cocaine and three weapons.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives announced Friday that it will reward tipsters to its hotline, (504) 581-GUNS, with $1,000 if their calls lead to arrests on federal firearms violations.

"We'll pay the caller $1,000 within 72 hours," said Bob Browning of ATF.

. . . . . .

Gwen Filosa can be reached at gfilosa@timespicayune.com or (504) 826-3304.

Va. Men Plead Guilty In Fake Purse Scam (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Designer Knockoffs Were Sold at Parties

A father and son pleaded guilty yesterday to supplying phony designer purses at massive discounts for "purse parties" in Northern Virginia and for kiosks they operated at malls throughout the Washington region.

Lalit Kumar Ohri, 63, and his son Gaurav Ohri, 28, both of Fairfax, admitted that they sold purses bearing the trademarks of some of the nation's leading designer labels, including Gucci and Prada. The pair had the counterfeit bags embossed with the sought-after labels or gave the labels to purchasers, some of whom affixed them to the purses with glue. The purses were purchased by the father and son from suppliers in New York.

"I bought bags. They were counterfeit bags. . . . They were not genuine," Gaurav Ohri, director of operations for the family company, Sonya Handbags, said as he pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to traffic in counterfeit goods.

"We had the labels we put on the bags. They looked like the real labels," Lalit Ohri, the company's owner, said as he pleaded guilty to the same charge in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. Both face up to five years in prison when they are sentenced April 20.

With the last-minute pleas, they avoided a trial scheduled for Monday that had promised to be unusual at a federal courthouse that has hosted some of the nation's most prominent terrorism and spy cases. Representatives from Kate Spade, Louis Vuitton and other high-profile designers had been expected to testify, and prosecutors were planning to show the jury a sampling of hundreds of phony designer purses.

The case has focused attention on the trendy purse parties that began more than a decade ago in New York City and have been going on in Northern Virginia since at least 2000, according to partygoers. Held in private homes, the gatherings feature flowing wine and plentiful food, along with hundreds of designer handbags sold for hundreds of dollars less than the real deal. It is a crime to sell trademarked goods but not to purchase them.

Several women known as "purse ladies," who run the purse parties, had been expected to testify at the trial. The Ohris sold counterfeit purses to women who then re-sold them at purse parties "throughout Northern Virginia," Assistant U.S. Attorney Jeanine Linehan said in court yesterday. Purses at the parties could be purchased for $40 to $50 each. Prices of genuine designer handbags by labels such as Prada and Gucci range from hundreds of dollars to more than $2,000.

The investigation of the Ohris began with an anonymous tip from a partygoer, according to court documents and law enforcement officials. Federal agents then raided the home of one of the purse ladies, recovering about 100 handbags and self-adhesive designer labels. That led to a raid at the Ohris' warehouse in Lorton, where 30,000 purses were recovered, along with more than 100 phony Kate Spade labels in a desk drawer, court documents said.

DOJ_NMG_0127738

Of the 30,000 purses, more than 6,000, with a retail value of $198,000, were determined to be trademark-infringing, Linehan said.

Lalit Ohri is a retired lieutenant colonel in the army of India who started his business in the early 1990s. By 2003, kiosks operating under the name Sonya Handbags were in 13 malls, including Tysons Corner Center and Fair Oaks Shopping Center in Virginia, Montgomery Mall and Columbia Mall in Maryland and the Old Post Office Pavilion in the District.

Counterfeit purses are sold on street vendor carts in Washington and other major cities, and enforcement of trademark laws is spotty. Experts say the problem has mushroomed in recent years.

Barry Rejects Offer, Maintains Innocence (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

A D.C. Superior Court judge set a June 12 trial date yesterday for D.C. Council member Marion Barry on several traffic offenses -- charges that Barry and his attorney insist are unfounded.

Barry (D-Ward 8), a former D.C. mayor, has rejected an offer from prosecutors to plead guilty to operating a motor vehicle while impaired in an incident in which police said they detected the smell of alcohol. Had he accepted the offer, prosecutors would have dropped the other charges, including the more serious offense of driving under the influence. Prosecutors also would have dropped charges in connection with a subsequent traffic stop.

But in a hearing yesterday morning, Barry's attorney, Frederick D. Cooke Jr., told Magistrate Judge Milton C. Lee that there is little common ground between the D.C. attorney general's office and the defense and that a deal is unlikely.

"He can't plead guilty to an offense he didn't commit," Cooke said.

The charges against Barry, who stood next to his attorney during the brief hearing, stem from two traffic stops last year in the District.

In the first incident, Barry was pulled over Sept. 10 by uniformed Secret Service officers near the White House after allegedly running a red light. Police said he smelled of alcohol, and Barry was asked to take a breathalyzer test. An initial test came in below the legal limit, but officers said they wanted to conduct a urine test for alcohol, Cooke said in an interview. Barry declined to provide a urine sample, and according to Cooke, he said he was willing to take another breath test, which police chose not to administer.

The officers charged Barry with driving under the influence, which can be done when a driver refuses the urine test. But Cooke said that the officers should have given Barry another breath test unless they documented some reason why they could not. Absent that, Cooke said, all they have to stand on is Barry's .02 reading, which is below the legal limit.

"The only objective data says that he was not intoxicated," Cooke said.

Traci L. Hughes, a spokeswoman for the attorney general's office, said the officers had the discretion to demand that Barry submit to a different type of test and the authority to charge him when he did not. Barry also was charged with misuse of temporary tags and operating an unregistered vehicle.

The second episode was Dec. 16, when Barry was stopped by U.S. Park Police officers in Southeast Washington for driving too slowly. Police said that Barry's license was suspended; he insisted that it was valid and that the D.C. Department of Motor Vehicles verified it. The attorney general's office did not charge him with driving without a license.

Prosecutors did, however, file other charges against Barry, including misuse of temporary tags and operating an unregistered vehicle. In both incidents, Barry was driving a loaner vehicle while his car was being repaired.

Cooke said Barry did not know that there was a problem with the registration of the vehicle and therefore did nothing wrong.

"It's undue harassment," Barry said after the hearing. "They know they don't have a case."

Crashing The Party (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

As Super Bowl Looms, FBI Eyes Online Wagering

If the U.S. government gets its way on Super Bowl Sunday, all bets will be off -- all online bets, that is.

DOJ_NMG_0127739

Federal prosecutors and agents in the FBI's organized crime unit have been mounting a large-scale crackdown on Internet gambling, with indictments against executives at gaming Web sites, arrests of foreign businessmen who process payments, and subpoenas to investment banks that may have helped bankroll the operations.

The aggressive campaign has gathered steam in recent weeks, as Americans prepare to wager more than $5 billion on tomorrow's game between the Chicago Bears and the Indianapolis Colts, the biggest betting day of the year, according to industry experts.

The arrests in California and in the U.S. Virgin Islands last month of two board members of Neteller, a British company that facilitates online money transfers, is spurring overseas executives with even modest gambling connections to avoid traveling to the United States lest they be nabbed. And it is leaving legal analysts and bettors crying foul about the government's approach.

"This escalation or, no, we should say surge, in this war of intimidation Justice is waging right now really has had an effect," said I. Nelson Rose, a professor at Whittier Law School in California and author of a textbook on gambling law.

Justice Department officials have long been on record as saying that Internet gambling breaks the law. They cite the long-standing Wire Act, a statute making it a crime to use telephone lines to place a bet within the United States or overseas. The 1961 law, which applies to businesses instead of individual bettors, was designed to eradicate the Mafia from the gambling arena.

But after the 2000 wire-fraud conviction of sports betting entrepreneur Jay Cohen for operating a Web site in Antigua, federal prosecutors enforced it only sporadically. The campaign heated up last year, after the government indicted two popular sports betting Web sites: Antigua's WorldWide Telesports Inc., and London's BetOnSports PLC. Both companies have announced they will no longer accept wagers from U.S. clients.

Then Congress dealt in. At the last minute, lawmakers inserted an online-gaming measure into the port security bill that chokes the flow of money by barring the use of credit cards, checks and fund transfers to make and settle bets. President Bush signed the bill into law in October.

But it has been the wave of criminal charges against individual executives and businesses that prompted a real exodus from the U.S. market. Americans bet nearly $6 billion online in 2005, but the flood of public companies out of the country has made it difficult to estimate current amounts, said Eugene Christiansen, who tracks such spending.

Meanwhile, U.S. authorities show few, if any, signs of folding, even in the face of rulings by the World Trade Organization that the United States cannot put foreign rivals at an economic disadvantage on the Internet gambling issue.

"Criminal prosecutions related to online gambling will be pursued even in cases where assets and defendants are positioned outside of the United States," Michael J. Garcia, the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, said last month.

Yet legal experts say there are questions about whether Internet gaming is a crime worthy of extradition in most foreign jurisdictions, and whether the executives meant to break the law, given that their operations are legal in their home countries.

Moreover, although the Justice Department has suggested that all forms of Internet gambling violate the law, analysts say that online horse racing, poker and fantasy leagues may be exempt. Gambling in some form, from state-sponsored lotteries to race tracks and slot machines, is legal in a majority of the 50 states, which collect billions in tax revenue from the enterprises each year.

A. Jeff Ifrah, a defense lawyer in the District office of Greenberg Traurig, said the Justice crackdown is confounding some legal analysts because "it is unclear how the government randomly targets members of this industry for prosecution, and why it is doing so on the heels of legislation that only recently prohibited facilitating certain gaming activity."

Neteller, which had provided payment services to more than 80 percent of worldwide gaming merchants, watched its business swell after PayPal and parent company eBay agreed to leave the business and forfeit $10 million to settle civil charges three years ago over financial transfers to offshore and online gambling firms.

Now, however, with the arrest of two of its founders, the British Web site is scrambling to exit the U.S business. Neteller is besieged with requests from frustrated bettors who want to recoup billions in deposits and winnings. The money is being held in trust accounts while the company holds conversations with the Justice Department about the status of its executives and other board members.

DOJ_NMG_0127740

"The answer is, it's a bit confused at the moment," Neteller spokesman George Cazenove said. "I'm sure they will get their money back. You've got to give Neteller a bit of space."

Prosecutors have increased efforts to force advertising companies and Web sites to reject paid ads for Internet gambling sites. They also sent subpoenas to at least three investment banks, HSBC, Dresdner Kleinwort and Credit Suisse. Richard Lindsay, spokesman for HSBC, said the subpoena it received late last year requested information "pertaining to some Internet gambling companies."

The crackdown against public, regulated foreign businesses has left small private companies to fill the void, an issue that worries industry officials and consumer groups who say the smaller entities are less subject to oversight and more difficult to police. In essence, they argue, the government drive could turn into another prohibition, and have the perverse impact of fostering underground, illegal activity.

"The net effect of this is, responsible people are out of the business," said Frank J. Fahrenkopf Jr., president of the American Gaming Association, a casino industry trade group.

But federal officials disagree. Mark J. Mershon, FBI assistant director, last month cautioned that companies handling Americans' offshore bets "amount to a colossal criminal enterprise masquerading as legitimate business."

Staff writer Tomoeh Murakami Tse and staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

Fake Degrees Bought By 14 Confound Fire Officials (NYT)

By Cara Buckley

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

The Fire Department has not decided whether to take disciplinary action two days after a report revealed that 14 of its employees had used, or tried to use, bogus diplomas to be promoted or hired.

According to the report, by the Department of Investigation, the 14 employees paid hundreds of dollars to buy fake degrees from "St. Regis University," an online diploma mill that required no course work, to fulfill the department's educational requirements.

But a spokesman from the Fire Department and a fire union official said the report overstated the extent of the problem. While 13 employees and one job applicant bought the degrees from a fake online university to be promoted or hired, the fire department rejected the phony diplomas from all but three. Ten were hired or promoted anyway because they later legitimately obtained the required credits. The Fire Department also said it began rejecting diplomas in 2003 from the so-called university, which claimed that it was based in Liberia.

"Of the 14 people, only 3 were promoted with that degree," said Francis X. Gribbon, a department spokesman. "We promoted 2,500 people since 2001. This is a handful of people we are talking about."

Yet according to Thomas Von Essen, who was fire commissioner from 1996 to 2001, the report underscored what he described as a lax attitude toward obtaining college credits in the department. Beginning in the late 1990s, Mr. Von Essen introduced requirements that higher-ranking Fire Department officials obtain a set number of college credits to be promoted. New hires would need college credits, too.

The Uniformed Firefighters Association, the fire officers' union, fought part of the new requirements. One of their arguments was that higher-ranking officers who came on the job when only high school diplomas were required should not need college credits to advance.

Though the new standards were adopted, Mr. Von Essen said resistance to them persisted.

"I'm absolutely not surprised that this happened, because the seriousness of education has never been accepted by the chiefs, and the higher ranks in the department," said Mr. Von Essen, now senior vice president at Giuliani Partners, the consulting firm of former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

But Peter L. Gorman, president of the officers' union, said most of the employees named in this week's report did nothing wrong. One of the employees, Daniel O'Gara, a battalion chief, had received a letter from a supervisor on the department's tenure desk, stating that his diploma met department requirements. But the letter writer confused "St. Regis University" with Regis

DOJ_NMG_0127741

College, a private college in Massachusetts. Still, Mr. Gorman said, the letter cleared Chief O'Gara of blame. "There was no cover-up; there was no intent to get false degrees," Mr. Gorman said.

Mr. Gribbon, the department spokesman, said the department began scrutinizing credits obtained, especially from online schools, after discovering in 2003 that "St. Regis University" was a fake. "We tightened up rules on all of them," he said.

But the department has also eliminated the requirement that new employees have college credits, in part to attract more minority applicants to its ranks. Starting in March, basic training will last 13 weeks instead of 8, Mr. Gribbon said, and will be extended to 23 weeks by year's end. Additional elements, like public relations and writing skills, were being folded into the training too, Mr. Gribbon said.

Several firefighters yesterday shrugged off the relevance of college credits to their jobs, saying experience rather than education mattered most.

Arthur Jens, 45, a retired firefighter from Engine 13, Ladder 12 in Chelsea, said: "Education's always a great thing. The more education you have, the better off you are. But as far as actual firefighting, I think the biggest thing is experience. That's the biggest factor in a fire."

According to Jason Post, a spokesman for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler met with Nicholas Scoppetta, the fire commissioner, yesterday to review the report. All 14 employees were still on the job, a Fire Department spokesman said.

"It is acceptable to wait more than two days before taking any action," Mr. Post said.

Former Judge Cites Pressure To Pay Friends Of Party Boss (NYT)

By Trymaine Lee

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

A former Brooklyn judge told a jury yesterday that she feared her career would be over if she did not pay $10,000 to associates of Clarence Norman Jr., the longtime leader of the borough's Democratic machine, for get-out-the-vote efforts and fliers during her re-election campaign in 2002.

The former judge, Karen B. Yellen of Brooklyn Civil Court, who ran on the Democratic ticket in the 2002 primary along with Mr. Norman, was the key witness for the prosecution in the weekold corruption trial against Mr. Norman, a former 12-term state assemblyman, in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn.

It is Mr. Norman's fourth corruption trial in two years. In this case, he is accused of pressuring Judge Yellen and another judicial candidate for thousands of dollars. In the week leading up to the 2002 primary, prosecutors say, Mr. Norman demanded that Judge Yellen pay his associates or be "dumped" and lose the party's support.

Wearing a bright red blazer and a frilly white blouse, Ms. Yellen wiped away tears and gestured to the jury, saying, "This was a fight for my career, and I knew I had to do anything possible to save it."

She looked into the faces of the jurors and seemed to plead for their sympathy.

"I would no longer be a judge," she said. "I would be out of a job."

In the end, she lost anyway, beaten by upstart candidates.

Ms. Yellen's testimony repeated much of that given on Thursday by Jeffrey Feldman, Mr. Norman's former second in command.

Mr. Feldman and Ms. Yellen testified that Mr. Norman became angry when a member of the judge's camp asked what would happen if she did not pay. Prosecutors have said Mr. Norman wanted her to pay Ernest Lendler, a printer, $1,000 for a flier he designed, and William H. Boone III, a longtime associate of Mr. Norman's, $9,000 for get-out-the-vote efforts on Primary Day in the mostly black districts of central Brooklyn.

"The words he used was that 'we will dump her,' " Ms. Yellen testified. She said she was "shocked" and "astonished" by Mr. Norman's reaction.

During cross-examination, Mr. Norman's lawyers suggested that Ms. Yellen, who is white, was willing to spend money in white neighborhoods but not in black ones.

DOJ_NMG_0127742

Anthony Ricco, a lawyer for Mr. Norman, said that Ms. Yellen had had no problems courting the black vote but drew the line on spending money to capture it.

"Didn't you and your advisers say it was a waste of time because Jewish people vote for Jewish candidates and black people vote for black candidates?" Mr. Ricco asked.

"But when you went to the chicken dinners in the African-American neighborhoods, did you say to those people, 'I'm here for your support,' " he asked, "and how good the chicken was?"

Ms. Yellen looked over at the jury and said: "No, I didn't. Because the chicken wasn't that good."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Calif. Teens Get Probation For Halloween Hate-crime Beating (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

LONG BEACH, Calif. (AP) — Four of nine black teenagers convicted in the racially charged beating of three white women on Halloween were sentenced to probation Friday.

Punishment could have ranged up to confinement in a California Youth Authority lockup until age 25. The teens were ordered to serve 250 hours of community service, 60 days house arrest, and take anger management and racial tolerance programs.

"It was an awful crime. Terrible, emotional and physical injuries," Juvenile Court Judge Gibson Lee said.

Last week, Lee convicted nine teens — eight female and one male — of felony assault, with a hate-crime enhancement against all but one.

Among those sentenced Friday were an 18-year-old youth, his twin sister, their 16-year-old sister — who didn't receive the hate-crime enhancement — and another 16-year-old girl.

The other five defendants face sentencing next week. Names of the defendants were withheld because they are juveniles or were juveniles at the time and were tried as juveniles.

The 18-year-old male teenager had pleaded with the judge, saying he was innocent and tried to help the victims, including taking a skateboard away from an assailant who was using it as a weapon.

"What will my life be like? I'm 18 and convicted of a hate crime," he said.

The victims were in an affluent area of Long Beach that draws crowds with fancy Halloween displays when a crowd of black youths yelled racial insults and one shouted "I hate whites," according to prosecutors.

One victim testified the trio was pelted with small pumpkins and lemons. A witness testified two of the women were beaten with skateboards.

Prosecutors said the beating only ended when a black motorist stopped, pulled the assailants away and shielded the women with his body.

"I'm not sure if all the emotional scars will ever completely vanish," 21-year-old Loren Hyman, one of the victims, said earlier in a victim impact statement. "I feel like the beating I endured on Halloween night is still not over."

Two 15-year-old boys face trial later on charges of felony assault with the hate-crime enhancement.

Long Beach, 22 miles south of downtown Los Angeles, is a major U.S. cargo port with a racially diverse population of 475,000 and neighborhoods ranging from high-end shoreline condos to low-income urban areas.

Judge Defers Decision On Port Chester Election (NYJN)

By Liz Sadler, THE JOURNAL NEWS

New York Journal News, February 3, 2007

PORT CHESTER - A federal judged deferred a decision yesterday on whether to stop the March 20 village election for two seats on the Board of Trustees.

U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson will instead wait to hear arguments from both sides in the voting rights lawsuit filed by the U.S. Department of Justice against Port Chester, he said in a pre-trial conference.

DOJ_NMG_0127743

The judge said he will presume that holding the election would cause irreparable harm, as the Justice Department alleges. The village must prove otherwise at trial later this month in order to proceed with the election.

Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, argued that stopping the election would actually cause irreparable harm to the village because it would force a special election and disenfranchise voters. He said the trustee race would provide a good "snapshot" of Hispanic voter turnout because a Hispanic candidate is running.

But U.S. Attorney David Kennedy said "this can only be decided after a full and fair hearing." He said it would be "informative but wrong" to hold the election in March.

The Justice Department sued the village in December, asserting that its at-large method of electing its six trustees violates the federal Voting Rights Act. It is asking the judge to replace Port Chester's system with one in which trustees are elected from six districts. It is also asking the judge to stop the March trustee election until voting districts are implemented.

The village argues that its election system is fair and has soundly denounced the Justice Department's case.

Trial dates are scheduled for Feb. 13-15 and 20-22.

Reach Liz Sadler at esadler@lohud.com or 914-694-3525.

Court: No Discrimination (MOULTO)

By Lori Glenn

Moultrie (GA) Observer, February 3, 2007

Ruling says Ellenton farmer was not unfair to Puerto Ricans

ELLENTON — The U.S. Court of Appeals 11th Circuit Thursday upheld a decision from the U.S. Justice Department that a Colquitt County farmer did not discriminate against 17 Puerto Rican farmworkers in favor of Mexican labor.

The plaintiffs had traveled from Puerto Rico to Georgia in 2003 to work for Booth Farms under a contract approved by the U.S. Department of Labor. They arrived a few days after a group of federal H2A program workers from Mexico.

Producer Larry Booth, of Ellenton, had maintained that some of the citizen workers (Puerto Rico is a territory of the United States) were slow pickers and didn't pick enough to earn the equivalent piece rate of $7.49 an hour, the Adverse Effect Wage Rate at the time, so he fired them citing economic reasons. The plaintiffs complained that no Mexican H2A workers who didn't work up to Booth's standard weren't fired and subsequently filed a discrimination suit. Federal law requires that employers hire Americans over H2A workers, but the plainiffs said Booth favored Mexican workers over Puerto Rican regardless of production rates.

The 17 workers, some of whom Booth said he didn't fire, were represented through the Georgia Legal Services Farmworker Division. Booth represented himself pro se with some assistance from friend and cousin former Georgia Senator Franklin Sutton, also of Ellenton. Booth wasn't able to secure financing for his farming operation because of the suit and had to sell out, he said. Plus, the same 17 plaintiffs have filed a suit in Puerto Rico against Booth Farms seeking about $383,000.

"Hell from Day One," Booth said. "I can truthfully say I would have worked them if they would have worked. And four of them I didn't fire."

"The argument that Georgia Legal Services had was that even though you had to pay them minimum wage, they weren't required to do anything. This makes a distinction between nonproduction and production, and that's a good thing," Sutton said.

Sutton said he isn't fool enough not to think that some farmworkers have been mistreated over the years, but he also thinks that Legal Services are extorting producers.

"They didn't care whether I was liable for those charges or not," Booth agreed. "All they wanted from me from day one is a settlement. They started sending me letters saying that we could settle for a lesser amount. They didn't have no concern on my part as far as I was liable or not. They never considered that. ... I'm proud that they did take it to the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals. That makes it a stronger case for us."

Georgia Legal Services, funded through private and public sources, often handles cases involving failure to pay workers, cheating workers out of wages, discrimination and failure to keep recruitment promises, according to its Web site. Legal Services has represented complaints against Colquitt County producers in the past. Many, if not all up until now, have been settled out of court.

DOJ_NMG_0127744

One local H2A farmer only would consent to an interview if The Moultrie Observer didn't use his name for fear of retaliation by Legal Services. He's been sued several times but settled each time because of the enormous expense of a trial.

"There for a while we were paying about $80,000 a year just to fight lawsuits. ... We settle just to get rid of it," he said.

And that's what these farmers think fuels Legal Services' fire.

"They want to settle it because they know they haven't got a case. It's frivolous stuff," he said.

This producer and several others, also wishing to remain anonymous, said they hire workers through the relatively costly H2A program because they want to hire legal workers to avoid trouble, but Legal Services haunts them with what they call "frivolous lawsuits."

"Immigration told us we needed to get legal, they were going to start raiding our farms," said one producer. "They don't go by what the law says. They sue for anything they want to sue on. If they win, it changes the playing field. If they don't win, so what — they're out soliciting for another case from somewhere else. It doesn't cost the worker anything. ...They say they don't target H2A, but they do."

Voting Rights: Noxubee Case A National Test (JCL)

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, February 3, 2007

Discriminating against the free exercise of the right to vote is wrong, regardless of race and regardless Mississippi's past history of white-on-black oppression.

Quietly, with little fanfare, a national test of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is under way in Mississippi.

This month, U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee has been presiding over the first case in U.S. history in which the federal government has accused black election officials of violating the Voting Rights Act by discriminating against white voters.

The U.S. Justice Department is alleging that Noxubee County Democratic Party Chairman Ike Brown and other Noxubee County election officials have rigged the voting process against white voters by manipulating voter rolls, making public threats to ban some whites from voting, certifying candidates who did not live in districts they sought to represent, miscounting ballots to ensure white candidates lost and other discriminatory acts.

Brown has denied all allegations, accusing the white minority in Noxubee County of petty complaints after years of white discrimination against black voters there.

The key question facing Judge Lee isn't whether Noxubee County or Mississippi has a sordid history of white election officials discriminating against black voters. The county and the state are guilty on both counts.

The question is if Brown and other black officials in Noxubee have used their powers to do the very same thing to white voters.

The Voting Rights Act must be enforced equally for voters of all races.

Push To Resolve Fading Killings Of Rights Era (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

ATLANTA, Feb. 2 — For every infamous killing that tore at the South in the 1950s and '60s, there were many more that were barely noted, much less investigated.

Virtually all such cases gained momentum only when the victims of the past found voices in the present, like those that helped arrest a 71-year-old man last month in connection with the Klan killings of two black teenagers in Mississippi in 1964. Rather than police officials, it has often been journalists and filmmakers who have combed through documents and tracked down witnesses, fueling some 15 years of successful prosecutions.

Only now, with time running out because potential witnesses and suspects are dying off, have law enforcement officials begun to take a systematic approach to unsolved civil rights crimes. The Federal Bureau of Investigation recently canvassed its field offices for the first time, compiling a list of 51 victims in 39 cases, most of which were never investigated by the bureau.

The list was prompted not by the string of convictions, but by a letter about the lynching of two black couples at the Moore's Ford Bridge, east of Atlanta, in 1946, said Chip Burrus, the assistant director of the F.B.I.'s criminal investigative division.

DOJ_NMG_0127745

"When I read the letter, I said, 'I've never heard of Moore's Ford. What is this about?' " Mr. Burrus said. "There've got to be more of these things."

That a single letter prodded the F.B.I. to action illustrates how slender are the time-brittled fibers that knit together the outcome in these fading crimes.

In the case that produced the recent arrest, timing was crucial. If the bodies of the victims, Henry H. Dee and Charles E. Moore, had been found just three weeks earlier in the summer of 1964, their deaths might have been largely forgotten.

The two friends, a sawmill worker and a college student, were 19 when they disappeared in May 1964, last seen hitchhiking on the highway near Meadville, Miss. They were beaten and drowned by Klansmen who mistakenly believed the two were involved in plotting an armed uprising. Two months later, on July 12, a fisherman spotted the torso of Mr. Moore in a Mississippi River backwater called the Old River. Mr. Dee was found the next day.

At the time, an extensive search was under way for three civil rights workers, two of whom were white New Yorkers, who had disappeared on the opposite end of the state in what became known as the "Mississippi Burning" case. The initial classification of Mr. Moore's body as that of a Caucasian male, and thus potentially one of the missing rights workers, caused a spurt of media coverage.

That fleeting interest had two results, said David Ridgen, a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation producer who has made a documentary about the case. It prompted the F.B.I. to investigate, and it ensured that there was enough in the historical record to arouse the curiosity, decades later, of scholars and reporters.

Countless other race killings, however, were minimally recorded. In the late 1980s, when the Southern Poverty Law Center in Montgomery, Ala., was creating its memorial to 40 civil rights martyrs, most of whose cases remain unprosecuted, researchers found more than 80 victims who could not be included because not enough was known about the circumstances of their deaths.

"It was so frustrating and sad," said Sarah Bullard, the project's chief researcher. "If the information wasn't there I couldn't include them, no matter what I suspected or felt."

Mr. Burrus of the F.B.I. said he was not familiar with the monument or the center's research, but that the bureau had also consulted civil rights groups in compiling its list.

Because local newspapers often ignored such killings, Ms. Bullard pored over microfilm of national newspapers and records compiled by the Tuskegee Institute, internal memorandums of the N.A.A.C.P. and other civil rights groups, and cartons of news clippings collected by a research group called the Southern Regional Council and stored in the basement of a Korean grocery in Atlanta.

Ms. Bullard recalled references to an unidentified teenager who was found in the Big Black River in Mississippi wearing a Congress of Racial Equality T-shirt. After scouring all her sources, she learned only his name, Herbert Oarsby.

"There were activists who were trying to pay attention," Ms. Bullard said, "but at the same time there were African-American communities who knew that racist crimes amongst them were not going to be investigated or reported and made the choice not to seek justice because it would bring on further violence against them."

That may have been the case with Mr. Moore's mother, Mazie, who made her elder son Thomas promise not to avenge or seek justice for his brother's death. In 1964, when reporters found her at the country shack where she had lived all her life, she repeatedly praised the white residents of Franklin County, a Klan stronghold, and said there was nothing to be done.

Alvin Sykes, a civil rights advocate who has urged the federal government to pass the Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Bill, which would provide $11.5 million per year to investigate these cases, said part of that money would be used to encourage people scared into silence at the time to come forward. "We have absolutely no idea how many of them are out there," Mr. Sykes said.

Mazie Moore died in 1977, and in 1998 Thomas Moore finally decided to seek justice, contacting the local district attorney, Ronnie Harper, who was unaware of the case. Mr. Harper requested information from the F.B.I., and was told that no file on the case existed.

But in 2000 two journalists, Jerry Mitchell of The Clarion-Ledger in Jackson and Harry Phillips of ABC News, obtained copies of the F.B.I. investigation file that was said to be missing, which had led to the arrest of Charles M. Edwards and James F.

DOJ_NMG_0127746

Seale in November 1964, though the charges were dropped when the district attorney said there was not enough evidence to make a case.

Mr. Phillips used the file to track down the F.B.I.'s principal informant, Ernest Gilbert, then 74, persuading him to do an on-camera interview about the case, and Mr. Mitchell reported that because the crime began in the Homochitto National Forest, where the two victims were tied to trees and beaten with switches, federal prosecutors might have jurisdiction in the case.

But even those breakthroughs did not force prosecutors to act. Mr. Harper says he was told by the F.B.I. that Mr. Gilbert would not testify. The F.B.I. closed the case in 2003 because the jurisdiction issue could not be resolved, said Deborah Madden, a spokeswoman for the F.B.I. office in Jackson. Mr. Gilbert died in 2004.

Thomas Moore, living in Colorado Springs, grew tired of telling reporters his brother's story with no result. But in 2005, Mr. Ridgen, the documentary producer, convinced him that the two should go back to Mississippi together.

On that trip, they discovered that Mr. Seale was not dead, as several newspapers had reported, but was still living in Franklin County. Then came a coincidence: Thomas Moore had served in the same Army unit as Dunn Lampton, who became the United States attorney in Jackson in 2001. Mr. Moore and Mr. Ridgen persuaded Mr. Lampton to reopen the case, resulting in the recent arrest of Mr. Seale, who has pleaded not guilty.

"Thomas Moore had a lot of information about what happened, and I made use of that," Mr. Lampton said. "You don't come into an office and go back and start digging through all the old files to find something to do. It's only when someone brings that to your attention."

Number Of People Stopped By New York Police Soars (NYT)

By Al Baker And Emily Vasquez

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

The New York Police Department released new information yesterday showing that police officers stopped 508,540 individuals on New York City streets last year — an average of 1,393 stops per day — often searching them for illegal weapons. The number was up from 97,296 in 2002, the last time the department divulged 12 months' worth of data.

After inquiries by the City Council and civil rights advocates, the department delivered four bound volumes of statistics to the Council in midafternoon. The raw data showed that more than half of those stopped last year were black: an average of 67,000 per quarter.

At the same time, the average number of people arrested per quarter as a result of such stops almost doubled to 5,317 last year, from 2,819 in 2002, and summonses nearly quintupled, to a quarterly average of 7,292 last year from 1,461 in 2002.

Until yesterday, the most recent information released by the Police Department about how and why it stops people to search them, sometimes looking for illegal guns, was from 2003, according to city officials and city and court records. Some officials have said that lag put the department at odds with a pair of legal requirements that sprang from public outrage at the 1999 fatal police shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed black street peddler.

The department, which rejects such assertions, has not released numbers from 2004 and 2005, or from the last three months of 2003.

Those who review the data are now grappling with dual issues: determining why the Police Department waited so long to release any new figures, and why it is stopping more people and searching them.

The issue of these police-public encounters — called "stop and frisks" — became an emotional flashpoint after the shooting of Mr. Diallo, whose death in a barrage of 41 police bullets led to weeks of protests and scores of arrests outside 1 Police Plaza, in Lower Manhattan.

Many of the protesters contended that there was a pattern of racial profiling in stop-and-frisks. A state study later in 1999 confirmed racial disparities in such stops.

The guidelines to monitor stop-and-frisks in detail were set forth in a city law signed in 2001, and in a federal court case settled by the Bloomberg administration in 2004. Both called for the Police Department to release to the City Council, four times a year, basic data about the people who are stopped and questioned by officers, and the reasons for such encounters.

DOJ_NMG_0127747

But until yesterday, it had been a year since the department reported its stop-and-frisk activity, and those numbers dated from a three-month period ending in September 2003.

In the meantime, the Civilian Complaint Review Board, an independent city agency that investigates charges of police misconduct, found that complaints involving stops and searches have more than doubled in recent years, increasing to 2,556 last year from 1,128 in 2003. Complaints involving police stops now account for 33 percent of all complaints, up from 20 percent in 2003.

At a City Council hearing on Jan. 24, Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly assured council members that his officers were not practicing racial profiling in street stops.

"Officers are stopping those they reasonably suspect of committing a crime, based on descriptions and circumstances," Mr. Kelly said, "and not on personal bias."

Paul J. Browne, the chief police spokesman, said later that the department's analysis of the numbers showed that while 55.2 percent of the stop encounters last year involved blacks, 68.5 percent of crimes involved suspects described as black by their victims (or by witnesses, in the case of homicides). Hispanics, he said, made up 30.5 percent of those stopped and 24.5 percent of suspected offenders. For whites, he said, the numbers were 11.1 percent and 5.3 percent, respectively.

Mr. Browne said that aggressive street enforcement was partly responsible for the increase in stop-and-frisks. Also, he said, "careful accounting" of such encounters by the department in recent years made the increase seem greater. "Part of it is taking guns off the street and responding to complaints where we use stop-and-frisk," he said.

It was unclear last night how much of the increase in stops was due to suspected gun possession or how many led to gun arrests. Mr. Browne could not confirm a direct line between gun arrests and increases in stops, and said officers' efforts to take guns off the streets were just one facet of the crime suppression the stop-and-frisk forms reflected.

The 2006 figures, delivered yesterday by two officers in plain clothes, were contained in four books of about 250 pages each. Councilman Peter F. Vallone Jr., chairman of the Council's public safety committee, said his staff was unable to interpret the numbers immediately.

The department's lag in releasing the numbers came to light after the fatal shooting in November of another unarmed black man, Sean Bell, and has been seized on by civil rights advocates, academics and current and former government officials. Mr. Bell's death was not related to a stop-and-frisk operation, but it has become a valve for frustrations over relations between the police and minority residents. But members of the City Council said they had been requesting the material even before the Bell shooting.

Jeffrey Fagan, a professor of law and public health at Columbia University who studied the issue in 1999 for Eliot Spitzer, then the attorney general, said he was not surprised that the number of stop-and-frisks went up "during a period of no accountability."

But, he added, "it is an astonishing fact that stop rates went up by 500 percent when crime rates were flat." Police officials and a city lawyer said there were several reasons the department had fallen behind in releasing the numbers. Compiling the reports, they said, has been hampered by antiquated technology, especially since the numbers have risen. The department has been working to modernize its reporting system, officials said, and has not been withholding the data deliberately.

Some observers questioned whether producing data on street stops remained on the department's front burner during the age of terrorism.

"I just don't think it's a priority," Dr. Fagan said of the data collection.

The total number of stops includes cases in which the officers acted to prevent what could have been terrorist activity, the police said. But those stops are relatively rare, they said, and there is no separate category for keeping track of them. Searches of subway riders' bags are not considered stop-and-frisk encounters because people willing to forgo entry to the subway can decline them.

Joel Berger, who monitored matters of police conduct as an executive in the city's Law Department from 1988 to 1996, said: "It is particularly frightening that the Police Department is not following the statute that requires reporting on stop, question and frisks. It is the thing that happens most often and most troubles people, and the failure to report the numbers is, effectively, very alarming."

DOJ_NMG_0127748

Mr. Spitzer first dug into the issue of street stops after the Diallo shooting and found that Hispanics and blacks were being disproportionately targeted. After adjusting for varying crime rates among racial groups, his analysis found that blacks were stopped 23 percent more often than whites. Hispanics were stopped 39 percent more often than whites.

In the wake of those findings, the city signed a law allowing the Council to collect the Police Department's stop-and-frisk data on a quarterly basis. Separately, the federal class-action lawsuit, Daniels v. City of New York, alleged that the police habitually used racial profiling in stop-and-frisk situations. When the city's corporation counsel settled the case in January 2004, the agreement required the police to disclose data on such encounters through 2007.

The idea was that increased transparency about police stops would not only foster analysis of one of the department's most crucial tactics for reducing crime, but also would help restore the public's trust.

Mr. Spitzer's study reviewed police records known as UF-250s. Officers must fill them out after making forcible stops, including those in which a person is frisked or searched. His report noted that officers did not always fill them out. The form shows the race of the person stopped as well as the reason.

Under a system begun in the spring of 1999, police officials said, forms completed at individual precincts were taken to 1 Police Plaza, where their 50 points of data were gathered. Envisioning a daunting backlog, Mr. Kelly in 2005 directed that the process be decentralized so that the raw data could be recorded quickly, at the precinct level.

Mr. Kelly told officials at the Jan. 24 hearing that the data for the remainder of 2003, and for all of 2004 and 2005, would take longer to provide. That is "because it must be compiled manually, rather than in a technologically advanced way," according to a letter sent Thursday from the Law Department to a plaintiff in the federal case.

"We've been patiently waiting for years now," Councilman Vallone, told Mr. Kelly at the hearing. "We would again request that you give us that information."

For a time, the police gave the data to the City Council with some regularity. But the frequency of the reports slowed, and in February 2006, the department released data for the third quarter of 2003.

Then, the flow of data stopped. Until yesterday.

But city leaders came under criticism as well for failing to more forcefully demand the data. "The City Council has failed to ensure that the Police Department is producing the reports, as required by the statute," said Christopher Dunn of the New York Civil Liberties Union. "As a result, it has not been doing any monitoring of stop-and-frisk activity, which was the very point of the statute."

Court Bars Government Benefit For Same-Sex Domestic Partners (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 2 — Same-sex domestic partners are not entitled to health benefits from public universities or local and state governments under the State Constitution's two-year-old marriage amendment, the Michigan Court of Appeals said in a ruling released Friday.

In a reversal of a lower court ruling, a three-judge panel found that the amendment, which bans same-sex marriage, also prohibited government agencies from recognizing "similar unions" like domestic partnerships for any purposes.

"By officially recognizing a same-sex union through the vehicle of a domestic partnership agreement, public employers give same-sex domestic couples similar status to that of married couples," the judges wrote.

Such action, they added, would "run directly afoul of the plain language of the amendment."

The American Civil Liberties Union, which filed a supporting brief in the case, expressed "deep disappointment" with the decision and said it would appeal to the State Supreme Court.

The issue of benefits became contentious when Michigan voters passed the marriage amendment in November 2004 because several public employers, including universities and local governments, had policies or agreements in place that extended health care to same-sex domestic partners of employees.

The formal case began in 2005 when National Pride at Work Inc., a gay advocacy group based in Washington, and a number of individuals sought to settle the question about benefits through the court.

DOJ_NMG_0127749

They sought a declaratory judgment that the amendment did not prohibit public employers from conferring health benefits to employees' same-sex domestic partners.

Among their arguments was that a denial of benefits would violate the state's equal- protection clause. They also said that proponents of the marriage amendment had made assurances that its passage would not affect benefits to same-sex partners.

A trial court in Ingham County granted the judgment in 2005, saying that the extension of benefits in the context of employment contracts did not come close to the legal status of marriage in society.

But Mike Cox, the Michigan attorney general, asked for a stay of the ruling and reconsideration, which was granted.

The new ruling was dated Thursday but released on Friday.

Deborah A. Labelle, a lawyer for the A.C.L.U. of Michigan, said in a statement, "After today's decision, many men and women in Michigan with children now stand to lose their benefits."

Michigan Court Rules Against Gay Benefits (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

LANSING, Mich. (AP) -- Public universities and state and local governments would violate the state constitution by providing health insurance to the partners of homosexual employees, the Michigan Court of Appeals ruled yesterday.

A three-judge panel said a 2004 voter-approved ban on homosexual "marriage" also applies to same-sex domestic partner benefits. The decision reverses a 2005 ruling from an Ingham County judge who said universities and governments could provide the benefits.

"The marriage amendment's plain language prohibits public employers from recognizing same-sex unions for any purpose," the court wrote.

A constitutional amendment passed by Michigan voters in November 2004 made the union between a man and a woman the only agreement recognized as a marriage "or similar union for any purpose." Those six words led to the court fight over benefits for homosexual couples.

Homosexual couples and others had argued that the public intended to ban homosexual "marriage" but not block benefits for unmarried opposite sex or same-sex domestic partners.

The appeals court agreed with the Michigan attorney general, Republican Mike Cox, who said in a March 2005 opinion that same-sex benefits are not allowed in a state that does not recognize same-sex unions.

The legal challenge was mounted by 21 homosexual couples who work for the city of Kalamazoo, universities and the state.

"The protection of the institution of marriage is a long-standing public policy and tradition in the law of Michigan," Judges Kurtis Wilder, Joel Hoekstra and Brian Zahra noted In the unanimous ruling.

Jeffrey Montgomery, executive director of the Triangle Foundation, a leading homosexual advocacy group in Michigan, said the legal sanctity of marriage was not in question.

"This ruling will result in families being robbed of their health care and other basic necessities that are fundamental to protecting their well-being," he said.

The case will be appealed to the Michigan Supreme Court, said Jay Kaplan, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union of Michigan.

"We're very disappointed by this result," he said. "It's a misguided analysis, and they produced a heartless result. It was never the voters' intention in 2004 to take away health insurance benefits from families and children."

The Right Reform (WP)

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

LAWMAKERS locally and nationally are moving in the right direction in pushing for improvements in how Americans vote. Foremost is the growing movement to require an independent way to verify the results of electronic voting. It's critical, though, that this reform effort be calibrated so that local election officials are given the time and resources to do the job properly.

Congress is expected to consider legislation this year requiring that the nation's electronic voting machines produce a paper trail so that people can verify the accuracy of their votes and to facilitate recounts in disputed elections. Meanwhile, as reported by the New York Times, states such as Florida may abandon touch-screen voting. The Virginia legislature is considering a bill that would phase out the machines, and Maryland appears headed toward some kind of requirement for a paper trail.

While we have not been in the camp of those seeing fanciful conspiracies in electronic voting, a backup system is without question the best way to safeguard security and ensure voter confidence. One worry, however, is whether unreasonable mandates will be placed on local communities. Some of the problems that Maryland experienced during last fall's elections were attributed to election workers being overwhelmed by new and unproven technology. Already, officials such as state Sen. President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) have expressed doubt about whether the state has the money or the time to implement big changes for the 2008 presidential election.

It's clear that this will be the impetus from Congress, where Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.) has lined up a majority of House members in support of his bill requiring paper ballots in time for the presidential primaries. Mr. Holt is correct about the urgency of the need for reform, but it's important that this reform be a lasting one.

ANTITRUST:

Viacom Orders Removal Of Videos From YouTube (WSJ)

By Matthew Karnitschnig

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

Deciding that trading its copyright protection for Internet buzz was no longer viable, Viacom Inc. ordered Google Inc.'s YouTube to remove all of its content from the video Web site.

Viacom's decision to force YouTube, which hosts a vast array of video content uploaded by its users, to take down more than 100,000 video clips from its Web site may yet prove to be a negotiating tactic aimed at drawing the company into a deal. But Viacom executives said privately they had determined that the marketing boost they once believed YouTube provided them has proved to be a mirage.

"People are waking up to the fact that there is no marketing advantage," a Viacom executive said. "There's no novelty anymore." YouTube Chief Executive Chad Hurley said in an interview that other media companies such as CBS and NBC that partnered with YouTube felt otherwise.

Viacom's decision comes after the two camps failed to reach a distribution agreement despite months of negotiation punctuated by pointed rhetoric from Viacom, which owns a stable of cable networks that includes MTV, Nickelodeon and Comedy Central as well as the Paramount movie studio.

Viacom wants to be paid for the inclusion of its content on YouTube. Viacom video clips, such as those from "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart," count among YouTube's most-viewed content. Viacom said the roughly 100,000 clips it ordered removed accounted for 1.2 billion video streams.

"We have been quite indulgent to this point," Viacom Chief Executive Philippe Dauman said in an interview. "We cannot continue to allow YouTube or Google to continue to profit from our content without a reasonable commercial agreement."

"They are more focused on the money they can make in the short term," said David Eun, Google's vice president of content partnerships. "We're still more focused on innovation than the short-term economics." Mr. Eun said Google still hoped to come to a licensing agreement with Viacom. Mr. Hurley said the company was in the process of removing the videos that Viacom requested, and that it currently doesn't generate any revenue from advertising on the YouTube pages where videos are displayed, a claim Viacom disputes.

Copyright law compels YouTube to remove all content it doesn't hold the rights to if it receives a complaint from the owner. YouTube regularly receives such requests from media companies and readily complies with them.

Viacom has previously asked the site to take down full-length episodes of its shows but has allowed it to continue to carry short clips. Like other media companies, Viacom has had to balance the advantages of exposure on YouTube, which says consumers view its videos more than 100 million times a day, with protecting its copyrights.

DOJ_NMG_0127751

Until now, the company considered YouTube's broad distribution worth the copyright infringement. Though Viacom offers much of its video content free on its own Web sites, those sites have struggled to draw the Web-savvy youngsters who regularly flock to YouTube.

Viacom also has provided YouTube with a list of all of its programs and ordered the Web concern to keep Viacom content off the site in the future. It is unclear whether there is a legal basis for Viacom to enforce this request, however. The so-called safe harbor provisions that govern online copyrights stipulate that Internet companies remove content they don't own when they receive a complaint from the copyright holder. But it isn't clear whether sites such as YouTube can be forced to prevent the content from being put online to begin with.

In explaining the reasons for its decision, Viacom complained that YouTube had yet to install filtering tools to slow the flow of unauthorized content onto the site.

"YouTube and Google retain all of the revenue generated from this practice, without extending fair compensation to the people who have expended all of the effort and cost to create it," the company said in a statement.

YouTube last year said it intended to introduce digital fingerprinting technology that could automatically identify copyrighted video and audio clips in order to remove them or share related ad revenue with content owners.

In an interview earlier this past week, Google Chief Executive Eric Schmidt said Google would "eventually do some very significant deals" related to its online video services, including YouTube. Google has been in discussions with a number of television and music companies about licensing their video and music for use on its video services, and at the same time stave off any copyright lawsuits against Google over content uploaded by users without its owners' permission.

The CEO declined to comment on any specific possible deals but said he "wasn't in a great hurry on this issue -- it's more important to get it right." He acknowledged copyright concerns but added, "We have answered those by saying we're working very hard on fingerprinting technologies."

--Kevin Delaney contributed to this article.

Write to Matthew Karnitschnig at matthew.karnitschnig@wsj.com5

Viacom Tells YouTube To Remove Content (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin And Aline Van Duyn In New York

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

Google's strategy for its newly acquired YouTube site was dealt a serious blow on Friday when Viacom, the owner of MTV, demanded that all its clips be removed from the user-generated internet company's site.

Viacom, which owns youth brands such as Nickelodeon and Comedy Central, made the demand after months of negotiations with YouTube and Google. It said more than 100,000 affected video clips on the YouTube site had generated more than 1.2bn video streams.

The move threatens to wreck Google's attempts to cement commercial relationships with traditional media groups, which supply most material.

Since acquiring YouTube for $1.65bn in October, Google and Eric Schmidt, its chief executive, have made a frantic effort to forge relationships with traditional media companies. They have managed to sign short-term deals with CBS, Warner Music, Sony-BMG and Universal Music.

Discussions with Viacom appeared to break down over the splitting of advertising revenues from Viacom content. There was also a fight over which company would make those sales.

Viacom executives were frustrated that YouTube had failed to implement a content-monitoring system by the beginning of the year, as it had promised, so companies could easily tell when their material was being posted.

It accused Google and YouTube of reaping all the revenue from their material "without extending fair compensation to the people who have expended all of the effort and cost to create it".

YouTube said it would comply with the request.

"It's unfortunate that Viacom will no longer be able to benefit from YouTube's passionate audience which has helped to promote many of Viacom's shows," YouTube said in a statement. "We take copyright issues very seriously. We prohibit users from uploading infringing material, and we cooperate with all copyright holders to identify and promptly remove infringing content as soon as we are officially notified."

Viacom and other traditional media groups are eager to distribute their content to audiences of social networking and user-generated websites, which are wildly popular with young consumers. But they are wary of losing commercial and editorial control.

They complain that most clips posted on the sites are derived from their copyrighted work and have been appropriated without permission.

Viacom believes it has particular leverage because it specialise in youth-oriented and short-form video clips. It has previously demanded that clips from programmes such as Comedy Central's Daily Show be removed.

Under US copyright laws, sites are protected from legal action as long as they respond in a timely manner to requests to remove unauthorised material. NBC Universal, Disney and Viacom complain that they have to monitor hundreds of thousands of clips.

Viacom Decides YouTube Is A Foe (WP)

By Mike Musgrove, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Videos Reclaimed After Talks Fail

Viacom Inc. demanded that online-video-sharing site YouTube remove all video clips of its content yesterday and accused the site of profiteering.

The media company, which owns the Comedy Central, Nickelodeon and MTV cable networks, said there were some 100,000 clips of its shows on the site that have been viewed 1.2 billion times. The request, which YouTube said it would honor, came after months of profit-sharing negotiations between the two companies failed.

The dilemma for Viacom, as it yanks back control over clips from its popular networks, is whether YouTube is more of a marketing tool that helps it win new viewers, or a business threat.

"We have been very indulgent for a period of time, but we've come to the point where we can't let YouTube and Google continue to profit at our expense without an agreement in place," Viacom chief executive Philippe P. Dauman said in an interview yesterday.

Though YouTube, which was purchased by Google last year, said it would take down the clips, as of yesterday afternoon there were still thousands for shows like Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report" on its site.

The tussle between the companies is indicative of a rocky transition for traditional broadcast interests, which must try to make business sense out of the online entertainment age, in which content is easy to produce, copy and distribute. Many networks are putting shows on their own Web sites, but YouTube, which is just a year old, has become the online nexus for trading both homemade and cribbed video. It serves up 100 million videos and its users upload 65,000 videos a day, and now that it's backed by Google's massive advertising machine, YouTube stands to become its own advertising behemoth.

With valuable ad revenue at stake, Viacom is not the first company to publicly take YouTube to task over copyright issues. Last month, Twentieth Century Fox subpoenaed YouTube to learn who uploaded pirated copies of episodes of television shows "24" and "The Simpsons." Last year, a group representing Japanese authors and copyright holders asked the site to take down 30,000 videos.

Such copyrighted content often makes its way to YouTube's most-watched lists. Yesterday, an interview with Bill Gates that had aired Monday night on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart" ranked No. 6 on YouTube. The clip remained online early yesterday evening.

YouTube, in its own defense, has argued that the popularity of such clips helps promote programs.

"It's unfortunate that Viacom will no longer be able to benefit from YouTube's passionate audience which has helped to promote many of Viacom's shows," the company's statement said. Some networks, like NBC, have selectively allowed clips of such shows as "Saturday Night Live" and "The Office" to remain on the site for promotional reasons.

DOJ_NMG_0127753

Even when people violate YouTube's user agreement and post copyrighted material, the site is not in violation of the law so long as it removes the infringing videos at the copyright holders' request, said Tim Wu, a law professor at Columbia University.

"It's a common misconception that YouTube is a big land mine of liability," he said, "but the law in this area favors YouTube much more than people realize."

Because both sides have an interest in keeping content available, most of YouTube's copyright disputes with the television networks have been resolved through profitable arrangements, said Forrester Research media analyst James L. McQuivey.

CBS, for example, started a channel on YouTube's site last year, with clips from such programs as "The Late Show with David Letterman," and has even credited YouTube with boosting its ratings. In three months, the new channel has been viewed 90 million times.

McQuivey said he would expect Viacom and YouTube to eventually strike a similar deal. "It's a great way to drive eyeballs," he said.

YouTube, meanwhile, is not the only one defending itself against claims that it's making money piggybacking on others' content.

This week, Amanda Congdon, former host of the popular online show "Rocketboom," found that ablog, Valleywag, took one of her videos and added its logo. Though she doesn't mind when fans post videos of her content, Valleywag crossed the line, she said.

"They basically harvested a video from my site and plopped their logo on it. They made it seem like there was some sort of affiliation, which there isn't," she said. "I just think it's kind of underhanded to advertise on someone else's content."

YouTube Removing Viacom TV Shows Media Firm Says 'Daily Show,' MTV Snippets Must Go (SFC)

By Ellen Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 3, 2007

YouTube, the popular online video site, has begun removing more than 100,000 unauthorized clips belonging to entertainment giant Viacom -- everything from snippets of Jon Stewart's "The Daily Show" to Nickelodeon's "SpongeBob SquarePants."

The purge comes after Viacom demanded that YouTube take down the material, accusing the site of violating its copyrights. Viacom says it's the largest order to delete videos it has ever made.

The dispute reflects how popular San Bruno's YouTube has become as an online source of entertainment. And it highlights the dilemmas media companies face as they try to keep control of their material in the digital age.

Since exploding onto the Web less than two years ago, YouTube has drawn ire -- as well as millions of loyal fans -- for its vast and rapidly growing library of videos, many of them copyrighted clips from popular television shows and movies. The site's mushrooming popularity got the attention of Internet powerhouse Google, which bought YouTube for $1.65 billion last year.

Viacom, whose properties include MTV, Comedy Central, BET, TV Land and Nickelodeon, said it spent months negotiating with YouTube so that it could be paid for its material to appear on the site. That copyrighted material -- amounting to 1.2 billion streams, according to Viacom -- is uploaded by YouTube users, despite measures the site takes to stop the practice.

"YouTube and Google retain all of the revenue generated from this practice, without extending fair compensation to the people who have expended all of the effort and cost to create it," Viacom said in a statement.

YouTube said it takes copyright issues seriously, but it added that media companies gain from having their shows displayed.

"It's unfortunate that Viacom will no longer be able to benefit from YouTube's passionate audience, which has helped to promote many of Viacom's shows," a YouTube spokesperson said in a statement.

But in an interview, Viacom general counsel Mike Fricklas said that Viacom should have control over how and what it promotes. "When everyone gets a free pass to the movies, it's no longer promotional," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127754

YouTube has already struck partnerships with CBS, NBC and others to post authorized clips on the site. Last fall, CBS said that in the first month it operated a YouTube channel, it garnered 29.2 million views, and credited the partnership for increasing ratings.

By law, YouTube must take down copyrighted material when it is alerted to it. This happens regularly. Last fall, the Japanese Society for Rights of Authors, Composers and Publishers demanded that YouTube delete 30,000 copyrighted clips from the site.

Even NBC, which, like CBS, has a branded YouTube channel, continues to order YouTube to remove some 1,000 clips a month.

James McQuivey, principal analyst with Forrester Research, said he expects the two sides to return to the bargaining table quickly. By demanding its clips be erased from YouTube, Viacom is making a point that its shows offer more value than YouTube's other partners. Viacom shows appear on paid cable rather than broadcast channels, for instance, and "The Daily Show" and "The Colbert Report" are consistently on YouTube's top-watched lists.

On the other hand, YouTube and Google want to come to an agreement quickly because they don't want it to appear that media companies can play hardball and dictate deal terms, McQuivey said.

Page C - 1

Viacom Asks YouTube To Remove Over 100,000 Unauthorized Video Clips (USAT/AP)

By Seth Sutel, The Associated Press

USA Today, February 3, 2007

NEW YORK — Media company Viacom, which owns the cable networks MTV, VH1, Nickelodeon and the Paramount Pictures movie studio, asked YouTube on Friday to remove more than 100,000 unauthorized clips from its hugely popular video-sharing site.

Viacom said in a statement that after several months of talks with YouTube and its corporate parent, the online search leader Google, "it has become clear that YouTube is unwilling to come to a fair market agreement that would make Viacom content available to YouTube users."

Viacom said that YouTube and Google had failed to deliver on several "filtering tools" to control unauthorized video from appearing on the hugely popular site.

The company was now asking YouTube to take the clips down, but stopped short of filing a lawsuit.

Under federal copyright law, online services such as YouTube are generally immune from liability as long as it responds to takedown requests such as these, which YouTube often does. Less clear legally is what happens when another user posts the same video, something commonly done on the free video-sharing site.

A spokesman for YouTube didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

In November, YouTube agreed to delete nearly 30,000 files after the Japan Society for Rights of Authors, Composers and Publishers complained of copyright infringement.

Some media companies such as CBS and General Electric's NBC Universal have made deals to allow YouTube to use video clips from their programming, but others have yet to agree with the site over ways to get compensated for the use of their copyrighted material.

Universal Music Group, a division of French telecommunications giant Vivendi SA, had threatened to sue YouTube for copyright infringement, saying it was a hub for pirated music videos, but later reached a licensing deal with them last year.

Despite Viacom's problems with YouTube, the company's MTV Networks division reached a licensing deal last year with Google that allows the search company's video service to use clips from MTV and its sibling networks under a revenue-sharing agreement.

Equity Endorses Blackstone Bid (WP/BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Board Rejects Vornado's Larger Offer in Takeover Attempt

DOJ_NMG_0127755

Equity Office Properties Trust, the target of the largest real estate takeover, yesterday rejected a $41 billion offer from Vornado Realty Trust, saying a $38.3 billion cash bid by Blackstone Group L.P. is less risky for shareholders.

Equity Office said a sale to New York-based Vornado would take months to complete, while a buyout by Blackstone would close within days. Given the time delay, Equity Office put the value of Vornado's bid of $56 a share in cash and stock at $54.28 to $54.88. Blackstone's offer is $54 a share.

The stock closed yesterday at $55.38, up 23 cents a share.

Equity Office of Chicago postponed a vote on the Blackstone bid by two days to Feb. 7 to give shareholders time to review its stance on the Vornado offer, according to a statement filed yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission. If Blackstone's bid is approved, the purchase would be completed on or about Feb. 9.

The decision by the board of the biggest U.S. office landlord is a setback to Vornado chief executive Steven Roth, who first pursued the company in July. Now Blackstone's Stephen A. Schwarzman must win approval of Equity Office investors to complete the biggest leveraged buyout ever and gain 543 buildings across the country.

Equity Office's board said in its SEC filing that Vornado's offer "fails to adequately compensate Equity Office shareholders for the increased risk when compared to the Blackstone transaction, whose closing conditions have largely been satisfied."

The board "unanimously voted to reaffirm its recommendation" of Blackstone's bid, Equity Office said.

Equity Office said that even though four Vornado shareholders holding 7 percent to 9 percent of Vornado stock indicated they would approve the sale, Equity Office is still concerned that shareholders will reject the transaction.

Proxy adviser Glass, Lewis & Co. recommended that investors vote against the Blackstone bid. Vornado's offer is "financially superior" and allows shareholders to continue to own "important office property assets," the proxy adviser said in a report.

Lawsuit Targets Dell, Intel (MERCN)

By Therese Poletti

The San Jose Mercury News, February 3, 2007

Intel's program of rebates to its computer-making customers has come under serious fire again, this time in a massive class-action complaint claiming the chip giant's rebates to Dell inflated the troubled computer maker's profits by $800 million a year.

A 252-page lawsuit was filed against Dell in federal court in Austin, contending that Dell did not disclose the rebates -- which the suit also called kickback payments -- from Intel. The suit claims that Dell's reported profits were propped up by about $800 million a year by rebates Intel paid to Dell in return for exclusively using Intel chips in its computers.

The suit was filed by a well-known law firm, Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, on behalf some Dell shareholders, including Amalgamated Bank.

Until last year, Dell was the only computer maker to solely use chips developed by Intel. While most PC and computer server makers have been using chips developed by Intel archrival Advanced Micro Devices, Dell was a major holdout. Last year, it began to use AMD chips.

The suit was filed Wednesday, the same day founder Michael Dell said he was returning as chief executive after Kevin Rollins resigned. The company's chief financial officer, James Schneider, stepped down in December and was replaced by board member Donald Carty.

Dell officials did not return calls seeking comment. But Chuck Mulloy, a spokesman for Intel in Santa Clara, said that upon a preliminary review of the suit, ``Some of the allegations with respect to Intel appear to be completely made up." Mulloy noted that the suit rehashes some of the allegations already put forth in an antitrust lawsuit filed against it in June 2005 by AMD.

``It is very thoroughly investigated," said Bill Lerach, one of the founding partners of Lerach Coughlin in San Diego.

The suit contends that Dell's direct business model was not operating successfully or creating the strong operating margins that the company was reporting. ``In truth, Dell's financial results were being falsified," the suit claimed. It also contended that Dell's results were ``temporarily inflated" by large cost cuts, improper accounting tricks and ``its secret receipt of some $200 million per quarter in rebate/kickback payments from Intel in return for exclusively purchasing Intel microprocessors/chips."

DOJ_NMG_0127756

The suit named as defendants 16 current and former Dell executives, including Randy Mott, who is now executive vice president and chief information officer at Hewlett-Packard. Intel is also named as a defendant, as is Dell's accounting firm, PricewaterhouseCoopers.

``We conduct discounting based on volume purchase, just like every other semiconductor supplier," said Mulloy of Intel. ``We are going to move very quickly" to respond, he added.

The suit even contends that there were several meetings to discuss how Dell would receive the so-called e-CAP dollars from Intel, how the rebates would be spread out and how Dell would account for them. The suit said these meetings typically took place ``behind closed doors at the top executive level," and participants included Dell, Rollins and former Intel Chairman Andy Grove.

The suit seeks to represent others who purchased Dell's stock from Feb. 13, 2003, to Sept. 8, 2006.

Dell Accused Of Hiding Intel Payments (AP)

By David Koenig, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

A new class-action lawsuit claims that computer maker Dell Inc. inflated profits with secret payments of about $1 billion a year from chip maker Intel Corp.

The lawsuit was filed Wednesday, the same day the company announced that founder Michael S. Dell would return to the chief executive's role amid more disappointing financial news.

Filed in U.S. District Court in Austin, the lawsuit also claimed that Dell concealed problems in accounting and product quality from shareholders while company executives reaped $3.3 billion from selling their stock.

Dell spokesman Dwayne Cox declined comment Friday on the lawsuit and wouldn't say whether the company had received payments from Intel.

A spokesman for Intel, which was also named as a defendant, said the company had done nothing wrong and vowed to fight the lawsuit. He said that some of the charges "appear to have been completely made up" and that Intel payments to Dell were legal.

"It's pricing. It's discounting," said the Intel spokesman, Chuck Mulloy. "It's a normal business practice. Our business practices are both fair and lawful."

Mulloy declined to describe the payments to Dell, saying it was a private matter of pricing with a customer. He said the company had not been contacted by securities regulators or federal prosecutors.

The case was filed by the class-action firm of lawsuit firm of Lerach, Coughlin, Stoia, Geller, Rudman & Robbins LLP on behalf of two institutional investors.

Mary Blasy, one of the lawyers who filed the lawsuit, said in an interview that the plaintiffs don't claim that the payments were illegal. Rather, she said, they believed Dell cheated investors by concealing the payments, which the company didn't control and gave a false picture of Dell's financial strength.

The lawsuit charges that Dell got the Intel payments "for shipping only Intel-based products and not doing business with AMD," Advanced Micro Devices Inc. Dell began using chips from Intel's rival last year.

The payments to Dell were mentioned in an ongoing antitrust lawsuit that AMD filed against Intel in 2005. The Lerach law firm learned the size of the payments from Dell insiders, Blasy said.

The lawsuit named as defendants Dell and 16 current and former officials; Intel; and Dell's accounting firm, PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP. It seeks class-action status for investors who bought Dell stock from February 2003 to September 2006.

Other lawyers continue to file securities lawsuits against Round Rock-based Dell, whose shares have lost nearly half their value in the past two years while stock of rival PC maker Hewlett-Packard Co. doubled. Dell shares fell 28 cents, or 1.18 percent, to close at $23.52 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Last week, lawyers for a Maryland investor filed a lawsuit in the same Austin court on behalf of Dell. The derivative lawsuit charged that Michael Dell, former CEO Kevin Rollins and other executives with unjust enrichment and gross mismanagement.

DOJ_NMG_0127757

Both the recent lawsuits claim that Dell executives pushed the stock to artificially high levels by making false statements about the company's operations dating to early 2003. They said Dell leaders withheld knowledge about such problems as faulty laptop computer batteries that were later recalled and a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation of Dell.

The lawsuits come at a tumultuous time for Dell. This week, Michael Dell stepped back into the CEO's role that he had turned over to Rollins in 2004. The same day, Dell said it expects fourth-quarter sales and earnings to be below Wall Street estimates.

Dell has been losing market share to rivals and failing to meet Wall Street's expectations for higher earnings. The company's image was also battered in August by the voluntary recall of 4.2 million laptop batteries made by Sony Corp (NYSE:SNE - news). and the disclosure of an ongoing SEC probe into accounting issues.

Delta Creditors' Committee Approves Terms Of $2.5 Billion In Bankruptcy Exit Financing (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

(AP) - ATLANTA-Lawyers for Delta Air Lines Inc., the third-largest U.S. carrier, said Friday in court papers that the company's creditors' committee has approved the terms of the $2.5 billion (â,¬1.9 billion) in financing that Delta has secured to emerge from bankruptcy protection.

The disclosure was made as Delta amended its reorganization plan for a second time. Other technical changes also were made to the plan, which was first filed Dec. 19 and amended on Jan. 19.

Delta's chief bankruptcy lawyer, Marshall Huebner, said the official unsecured creditors' committee's support of the exit financing is a "tremendous milestone for us as we move toward exiting Chapter 11 under our standalone plan."

The filing also provided a few new details of the behind-the-scenes discussions in recent weeks by Delta's board regarding US Airways' now withdrawn $9.8 billion hostile takeover bid.

Delta's board discussed US Airways' revised proposal several times before US Airways withdrew the bid on Wednesday, including that day. The board took no action.

"Given the withdrawal, no further action by the Delta board regarding the revised US Airways proposal is contemplated," Friday's court filing by Delta's lawyers says.

Tempe, Arizona-based US Airways Group Inc. withdrew its bid for Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines Inc. after Delta's official committee of unsecured creditors said it supports Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy protection in the spring as a standalone carrier, thus rejected US Airways' merger offer.

US Airways had wanted to postpone a Feb. 7 bankruptcy hearing involving the disclosure statement to Delta's reorganization plan. But the hearing will go forward. If the disclosure statement is approved, Delta can begin soliciting votes to approve its reorganization plan.

Several creditors have objected to the disclosure statement, but Delta's lawyers are currently working to resolve those objections.

Delta is hoping to hold a confirmation hearing on its reorganization plan in April.

Delta has estimated it will be worth $9.4 billion (â,¬7.22 billion) to $12 billion (â,¬9.22 billion) if it emerges from Chapter 11 as a standalone company. That valuation did not change in the amended reorganization plan filed Friday.

On the Net:

Delta Air Lines: http://www.delta.com

MediaNews Acquires Santa Cruz Sentinel (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

DENVER - MediaNews Group Inc. said Friday that it has acquired the Santa Cruz Sentinel from Community Newspaper Holdings Inc.

MediaNews, with 56 daily publications, said the California Newspapers Partnership -- which is majority-owned by MediaNews -- acquired the Sentinel, a daily.

DOJ_NMG_0127758

MediaNews funded its share of the purchase through a revolving credit agreement. Gannett Co. and SF Holding Corp., the other partners, contributed their share of the purchase price. Financial terms were not disclosed.

Dean Singleton, MediaNews' chief executive officer, said the Santa Cruz newspaper will bolster the company's reach in California. "The Santa Cruz Sentinel is a fine newspaper today but will be strengthened by the resources of our existing newspapers," he said.

MediaNews, which owns the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers, acquired the Monterey County Herald, San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. last year. The complex $1 billion deal included $300 million in financing from the Hearst Corp., owner of the San Francisco Chronicle. The deal between MediaNews and Hearst is the subject of a federal antitrust lawsuit filed by a San Francisco businessman.

MediaNews is the nation's fourth-largest newspaper company, with 56 daily newspapers and about 120 nondaily publications in 13 states.

Judge: Microsoft Can Question Expert Who Found Violation (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 3, 2007

The computer expert who said he found evidence that Microsoft is violating a federal consent decree can be interviewed by Microsoft lawyers for up to five hours, Polk County District Court Judge Scott Rosenberg has ruled.

The expert, Andrew Schulman, is a witness for Iowa consumers suing Microsoft for anti-trust violations and up to $330 million in damages.

The consent decree ended a federal anti-trust case against Microsoft several years ago.

Schulman reportedly found evidence it was being violated while digging through mountains of secret computer code that is used to drive Microsoft products.

Microsoft lawyers had already questioned Schulman for seven hours in an earlier deposition, but he reported the violation after that testimony. His report caused Microsoft lawyers to ask for permission to question Schulman again before he testifies in court.

Lawyers on the other side resisted, requiring the ruling from Judge Rosenberg.

UPDATE: Analyst Sees Express Scripts Winning Caremark With Sweetened Bid (DOW)

Dow Jones, February 3, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO (Dow Jones) - Express Scripts Inc. is expected to triumph in its bidding war with CVS Corp. for pharmacy benefit manager Caremark Rx Inc. with a sweetened offer price, one industry analyst concluded after conducting a survey of Caremark and CVS clients.

"Absent a significant external event (pressure from Congress, material adverse change in the industry) or a stronger sales pitch from Caremark-CVS (entirely possible), we expect Express Scripts (ESRX) will acquire Caremark (CMX) at a higher price," Cowen & Co. analyst Kemp Dolliver wrote in a research note Friday. He assumed a $3-a-share increase to Express Scripts' current offer, to roughly $62 a share.

"We continue to think that Express Scripts has the upper hand in the competition for Caremark," Dolliver said. "Our survey indicates that Caremark's and CVS' clients share the same uncertainty over the deal as the investment community."

Dolliver subsequently reiterated an outperform rating on Express Scripts shares.

Caremark in November agreed to a so-called "merger of equals" with retail drugstore chain CVS Corp. (CVS) in a deal that would give Caremark shareholders 1.67 shares of CVS share for each share held.The following month, Express Scripts launched a competing, hostile $26 billion cash-and-stock bid for its larger PBM rival which, at the time, represented a 15% premium over CVS' offer.

The Caremark-CVS bid was sweetened in January with a $2 a share onetime dividend.

PBMs provide prescription services to health-benefit-plan sponsors, employers, managed-care organizations and others, dispensing prescriptions through a network of retail pharmacies and their own mail-order service. Some retail pharmacies, CVS included, operate their own mail-order services, but they primarily fill prescriptions in stores.

DOJ_NMG_0127759

As healthcare costs continue to rise, so does pressure to keep retail drug prices low. Though the market has shown it understands how the Caremark-CVS deal would benefit CVS, noted Cowen's Dolliver, by reducing exposure to cannibalization from the mail-order channel and offering the potential to attract more foot traffic, it is much less sure of the benefits for Caremark. " Both management teams have touted the potential benefits for customers, but we and the market view them as insignificant competitively," Dolliver wrote.

CVS and Caremark have also cited antitrust concerns as one of the top reasons to reject the competing offer from Express Scripts. Caremark is the largest PBM on a market capitalization basis and figures among the nation's three biggest, along with Express Scripts and Medco Health Solutions Inc. (MHS) . CVS is the second-largest drugstore chain in the U.S.

But Dolliver, who surveyed benefit managers and senior executives from 124 employers that use either CVS or Caremark as their PBM, said "very few" of them share the antitrust concerns.

"The majority of respondents are undecided, but only one of the eight Caremark clients with drug spending of $100 million or higher expressed any concern," Dolliver wrote. "This data confirms our view that the Federal Trade Commission should clear Express Scripts' offer after a brief review."

Express Scripts earlier this week said it would withdraw and subsequently refile its antitrust filing in connection with its bid in an attempt to get FTC approval without the need for a second request for information.

The CVS deal has already been given the green light by the FTC. Caremark shareholders are set to vote on it Feb. 20, and CVS shareholders will cast their votes Feb. 23. Both companies have said they expect to complete the deal by March if shareholders approve the proposal.

Shares of Express Scripts were changing hands for $70.11 in midday trading, up 21 cents. Caremark shares were down 20 cents, at $60.50, while shares of CVS were off by 16 cents, at $33.13.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Scientists Dispel Global Warming Doubts (FT)

By Fiona Harvey

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

The world's leading climate scientists on Friday swept away the last doubts surrounding global warming, saying they were certain human activities were altering the climate and warning severe effects were inevitable unless greenhouse gas emissions were curbed.

The evidence for climate change caused by fossil fuel combustion was "unequivocal", said the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, a body comprising 2,500 climate experts convened by the UN.

Their report predicted severe heatwaves, droughts, storms and floods resulting from an expected rise of 3 degrees Celsius in average global temperatures by 2100. It will be difficult for governments to ignore because it was agreed by all UN members, including the US and China.

Six years in the making, the report is the most authoritative ever produced on climate change and will form the basis for negotiations on a possible successor to the Kyoto treaty, the main provisions of which expire in 2012.

Rajendra Pachauri, chairman of the IPCC, said: "You can see [from the report] what the costs of inaction are. Everything is [included in the report] by consensus, so the implication is that it has the stamp of acceptance by all governments in the world."

Yvo de Boer, secretary-general of the UN climate change secretariat, said work should now begin on a successor treaty to Kyoto that would include obligations on developed countries to cut carbon dioxide emissions and incentives for poor countries to limit theirs.

Stavros Dimas, the European Union's environment commissioner, called the IPCC's findings "a grim report" and urged governments to agree to the European Commission's proposal of reducing emissions by 30 per cent by 2020.

Jacques Chirac, French president, proposed a new worldwide environmental organisation under the UN, to spearhead action on emissions.

DOJ_NMG_0127760

But the report met a cool reception from the US government. Sharon Hays, leader of the US delegation in Paris and deputy director of the White House office of science and technology policy, said: “This summary for policymakers captures and summarises the current state of climate science research and will serve as a valuable source of information for policymakers.”

The US is the world’s biggest emitter of greenhouse gases and has rejected the Kyoto treaty.

Achim Steiner, director-general of the UN Environment Programme, said in the light of the report’s findings, it would be “irresponsible” to resist or seek to delay actions on mandatory emissions cuts.

Climate Paper Prompts Call To Act (BBC)

BBC.com, February 3, 2007

Governments around the world have called for urgent action to tackle climate change, after a major report said mankind was very likely the cause.

The EU said it was the starkest warning yet, while the UK said climate change threatened world peace and prosperity.

The US administration said the report was "valuable", but rejected mandatory controls to reduce greenhouse gases.

The report, by more than 2,000 top scientists, says world temperatures could increase by 3C by 2100.

The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) also projected that sea levels were most likely to rise by 28-43cm, and said global warming was likely to influence the intensity of tropical storms.

The findings are the first of four IPCC reports to be published this year.

'Serious negotiation'

EU Environment Commissioner Stavros Dimas said he was now deeply concerned by the accelerating pace of climate change.

"It is now more urgent than ever that the international community gets down to serious negotiations on a comprehensive new worldwide agreement to stop global warming," he said.

UK Environment Secretary David Milliband said that international political commitment, which had so far been lacking, was now needed.

South Africa's Environmental Affairs Minister Marthinus van Schalkwyk said failure to act would be "indefensible".

And officials from Indonesia and the Maldives said they feared for the future of their countries, both threatened by rising sea levels.

US Energy Secretary Sam Bodman said he accepted the conclusions of the scientists.

How computers model climate

"We're very pleased with it. We're embracing it. We agree with it," he said.

"Human activity is contributing to changes in our Earth's climate and that issue is no longer up for debate."

But he said that a unilateral US programme to cut emissions might damage the US economy and send business overseas.

Meanwhile the head of the Senate Environment Committee, Barbara Boxer, called on Mr Bush to show "real leadership" on the issue of climate change.

"I'm calling on the president to convene a summit at the White House of the 12 largest global warming emitters," she said, adding that she would bring the IPCC scientists to brief the Senate in the next few weeks.

The US contributes around one-quarter of the world's greenhouse gas emissions.

Strong language

The report, produced by a team tasked with assessing the science of climate change, was intended to be the definitive summary of climatic shifts facing the world in the coming years.

The agency said that it would use stronger language to assess humanity's influence on climatic change than it had previously done.

In 2001, it said that it was "likely" that human activities lay behind the trends observed at various parts of the planet; "likely" in IPCC terminology means between 66% and 90% probability.

Now, the panel concluded that it was at least 90% certain that human emissions of greenhouse gases rather than natural variations are warming the planet's surface.

DOJ_NMG_0127761

U.N. Climate Panel Says Warming Is Man-Made (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

An international panel of climate scientists said yesterday that there is an overwhelming probability that human activities are warming the planet at a dangerous rate, with consequences that could soon take decades or centuries to reverse.

The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, made up of hundreds of scientists from 113 countries, said that based on new research over the last six years, it is 90 percent certain that human-generated greenhouse gases account for most of the global rise in temperatures over the past half-century.

Declaring that "warming of the climate system is unequivocal," the authors said in their "Summary for Policymakers" that even in the best-case scenario, temperatures are on track to cross a threshold to an unsustainable level. A rise of more than 3.6 degrees Fahrenheit above pre-industrial levels would cause global effects -- such as massive species extinctions and melting of ice sheets -- that could be irreversible within a human lifetime. Under the most conservative IPCC scenario, the increase will be 4.5 degrees by 2100.

Richard Somerville, a distinguished professor at the Scripps Institution of Oceanography and one of the lead authors, said the world would have to undertake "a really massive reduction in emissions," on the scale of 70 to 80 percent, to avert severe global warming.

The scientists wrote that it is "very likely" that hot days, heat waves and heavy precipitation will become more frequent in the years to come, and "likely" that future tropical hurricanes and typhoons will become more intense. Arctic sea ice will disappear "almost entirely" by the end of the century, they said, and snow cover will contract worldwide.

While the summary did not produce any groundbreaking observations -- it reflects a massive distillation of the peer-reviewed literature through the middle of 2006 -- it represents the definitive international scientific and political consensus on climate science. It provides much more definitive conclusions than the panel's previous report in 2001, which said only that it was "likely" -- meaning between 66 and 90 percent probability on a scale the panel adopted -- that human activity accounted for the warming recorded over the past 50 years.

Some of the report's most compelling sections focused on future climate changes, because the buildup of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere would exert an effect even if industrialized countries stopped emitting greenhouse gases tomorrow. Gerald Meehl, a senior scientist at the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo., who helped oversee the chapter on climate projections, said that in the next two decades alone, global temperatures will rise by 0.7 degrees Fahrenheit.

"We're committed to a certain amount of warming," said Meehl, who worked with 16 computer-modeling teams from 11 countries. "A lot of these changes continue through the 21st century and become more severe as time goes on."

Meehl added, however, that a sharp cut in greenhouse gas emissions could still keep catastrophic consequences from occurring: "The message is, it does make a difference what we do."

For the first time, IPCC scientists also looked at regional climate shifts in detail, concluding that precipitation in the American Southwest will decline as summer temperatures rise, just as precipitation in the Northeast will increase. Linda Mearns -- another NCAR senior scientist who was also one of the lead authors -- said these changes could cause water shortages and affect recreational activities in the Southwest. Developing countries in Africa and elsewhere could also experience severe droughts.

Governments and scientific organizations across the globe nominate scientists to produce and review the IPCC assessment without pay under the auspices of the United Nations. A group of key authors and government officials met in Paris this week to finalize the document, which reflects three years of work.

"Every government in the world signed off on this document, including the U.S.," said World Bank chief scientist Robert T. Watson, who chaired the last round of deliberations. Watson added that compared with the 2001 report, "the difference is now they have more confidence in what they're doing."

The authors concluded that Earth's average temperature will increase between 3.2 and 7.8 degrees Fahrenheit over the next century, while sea levels will rise between seven and 23 inches.

DOJ_NMG_0127762

IPCC scientists also said that global warming will not trigger a shutdown within the next 100 years of the North Atlantic ocean current that keeps Northern Europe temperate, though they do not predict whether it might occur in future centuries. In a similar vein, the authors said they did not have sophisticated enough computer models to project how much melting of the Greenland ice sheet would boost sea levels over the next century, but they suggested that over several centuries the ice sheet's disappearance could raise sea levels by a devastating 23 feet.

Bush administration officials said yesterday that they welcomed the report and emphasized that U.S. research funding helped underpin its conclusions. National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration Administrator Conrad C. Lautenbacher Jr., who oversees much of the nation's climate research, said in an interview that the international assessment will lead to "a more objective and informative public debate."

But environmental advocates said the White House -- which remains opposed to mandatory limits on U.S. carbon emissions -- is making a mistake in assuming research and technological advances alone will address global warming.

"The administration's proposals are at least a decade away," said Angela Anderson, vice president for climate programs at the National Environmental Trust. "The promise of better technologies tomorrow shouldn't stop us from doing what we can today."

House and Senate Democratic leaders back a cap on greenhouse gases and hope to enact such legislation this year; next week, several of the report's authors are to testify in congressional hearings.

In an interview yesterday, House Science and Technology Committee Chairman Bart Gordon (D-Tenn.) called the report "a unanimous, definitive world statement" on climate change that, if anything, was too conservative. "It's time to end the debate and act," Gordon said. "All the naysayers should step aside."

Some critics, however, question the push for nationwide limits on emissions from power plants, automobiles and other industrial sources. At the George C. Marshall Institute, a think tank that receives funding from Exxon Mobil, chief executive William O'Keefe and President Jeff Kueter issued a statement urging "great caution in reading too much" into the report until the panel releases its detailed scientific documentation a few months from now.

"Claims being made that a climate catastrophe later this century is more certain are unjustified," they said, adding that "the underlying state of knowledge does not justify scare tactics or provide sufficient support for proposals . . . to suppress energy use and impose large economic burdens on the U.S. economy."

Science Panel Says Global Warming Is "Unequivocal" (NYT)

By Elisabeth Rosenthal, Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 2 — In a grim and powerful assessment of the future of the planet, the leading international network of climate scientists has concluded for the first time that global warming is “unequivocal” and that human activity is the main driver, “very likely” causing most of the rise in temperatures since 1950.

They said the world was in for centuries of climbing temperatures, rising seas and shifting weather patterns — unavoidable results of the buildup of heat-trapping gases in the atmosphere.

But their report, released here on Friday by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, said warming and its harmful consequences could be substantially blunted by prompt action.

While the report provided scant new evidence of a climate apocalypse now, and while it expressly avoided recommending courses of action, officials from the United Nations agencies that created the panel in 1988 said it spoke of the urgent need to limit looming and momentous risks.

“In our daily lives we all respond urgently to dangers that are much less likely than climate change to affect the future of our children,” said Achim Steiner, executive director of the United Nations Environment Program, which administers the panel along with the World Meteorological Organization.

“Feb. 2 will be remembered as the date when uncertainty was removed as to whether humans had anything to do with climate change on this planet,” he went on. “The evidence is on the table.”

DOJ_NMG_0127763

The report is the panel's fourth assessment since 1990 on the causes and consequences of climate change, but it is the first in which the group asserts with near certainty — more than 90 percent confidence — that carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases from human activities have been the main causes of warming in the past half century.

In its last report, in 2001, the panel, consisting of hundreds of scientists and reviewers, said the confidence level for its projections was "likely," or 66 to 90 percent. That level has now been raised to "very likely," better than 90 percent. Both reports are online at www.ipcc.ch.

The Bush administration, which until recently avoided directly accepting that humans were warming the planet in potentially harmful ways, embraced the findings, which had been approved by representatives from the United States and 112 other countries on Thursday night.

Administration officials asserted Friday that the United States had played a leading role in studying and combating climate change, in part by an investment of an average of almost $5 billion a year for the past six years in research and tax incentives for new technologies.

At the same time, Secretary of Energy Samuel Bodman rejected the idea of unilateral limits on emissions. "We are a small contributor to the overall, when you look at the rest of the world, so it's really got to be a global solution," he said.

The United States, with about 5 percent of the world's population, contributes about a quarter of greenhouse gas emissions, more than any other country.

Democratic lawmakers quickly fired off a round of news releases using the report to bolster a fresh flock of proposed bills aimed at cutting emissions of greenhouse gases. Senator James M. Inhofe, the Oklahoma Republican who has called the idea of dangerous human-driven warming a hoax, issued a news release headed "Corruption of Science" that rejected the report as "a political document."

The new report says the global climate is likely to warm 3.5 to 8 degrees Fahrenheit if carbon dioxide concentrations in the atmosphere reach twice the levels of 1750, before the Industrial Revolution.

Many energy and environment experts see such a doubling, or worse, as a foregone conclusion after 2050 unless there is a prompt and sustained shift away from the 20th-century pattern of unfettered burning of coal and oil, the main sources of carbon dioxide, and an aggressive expansion of nonpolluting sources of energy.

And the report says there is a more than a 1-in-10 chance of much greater warming, a risk that many experts say is far too high to ignore.

Even a level of warming that falls in the middle of the group's range of projections would be likely to cause significant stress to ecosystems, according to many climate experts and biologists. And it would alter longstanding climate patterns that shape water supplies and agricultural production.

Moreover, the warming has set in motion a rise in global sea levels, the report says. It forecasts a rise of 7 to 23 inches by 2100 and concludes that seas will continue to rise for at least 1,000 years to come. By comparison, seas rose about 6 to 9 inches in the 20th century.

John P. Holdren, an energy and climate expert at Harvard, said the report "powerfully underscores the need for a massive effort to slow the pace of global climatic disruption before intolerable consequences become inevitable."

"Since 2001, there has been a torrent of new scientific evidence on the magnitude, human origins and growing impacts of the climatic changes that are under way," said Mr. Holdren, who is the president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. "In overwhelming proportions, this evidence has been in the direction of showing faster change, more danger and greater confidence about the dominant role of fossil-fuel burning and tropical deforestation in causing the changes that are being observed."

The conclusions came after a three-year review of hundreds of studies of past climate shifts; observations of retreating ice, warming and rising seas, and other changes around the planet; and a greatly expanded suite of supercomputer simulations used to test how the earth will respond to a growing blanket of gases that hold heat in the atmosphere.

The section released Friday was a 20-page summary for policymakers, which was approved early in the morning by teams of officials from more than 100 countries after three days and nights of wrangling over wording with the lead authors, all of whom are scientists.

DOJ_NMG_0127764

It described far-flung ramifications for both humans and nature.

"It is very likely that hot extremes, heat waves and heavy precipitation events will continue to become more frequent," said the summary.

Generally, the scientists said, more precipitation will fall at higher latitudes, which are also likely to see lengthened growing seasons. Semi-arid subtropical regions, already chronically plagued by drought, could have a further 20 percent drop in rainfall under the panel's midrange outlook for increases in the greenhouse gases.

The summary added a new chemical consequence of the buildup of carbon dioxide to the list of mainly climatic and biological effects foreseen in its previous reports: a drop in the pH of seawater as oceans absorb billions of tons of carbon dioxide, which forms carbonic acid when partly dissolved. The ocean would stay alkaline, but marine biologists have said that a change in the direction of acidity could imperil some kinds of corals and plankton.

The report essentially caps a half-century-long effort to discern whether humans, through the buildup of carbon dioxide and other gases released mainly by burning fuels and forests, could influence the earth's climate system in potentially momentous ways.

The group operates under the aegis of the United Nations and was chartered in 1988 — a year of record heat, burning forests and the first big headlines about global warming — to provide regular reviews of climate science to governments to inform policy choices.

Government officials are involved in shaping the summary of each report, but the scientist-authors, who are unpaid, have the final say over the thousands of pages in four underlying technical reports that will be completed and published later this year.

Big questions remain about the speed and extent of some impending changes, both because of uncertainty about future population and pollution trends and the complex interrelationships of the greenhouse emissions, clouds, dusty kinds of pollution, the oceans and earth's veneer of life, which both emits and soaks up carbon dioxide and other such gases.

But a broad array of scientists, including authors of the report and independent experts, said the latest analysis was the most sobering view yet of a century of transition — after thousands of years of relatively stable climate conditions — to a new norm of continual change.

Should greenhouse gases continue to accumulate in the atmosphere at even a moderate pace, average temperatures by the end of the century could match those last seen 125,000 years ago, in the previous warm spell between ice ages, the report said.

At that time, the panel said, sea levels were 12 to 20 feet higher than they are now. Much of that extra water is now trapped in the ice sheets of Greenland and Antarctica, which are eroding in some places.

The panel said there was no solid scientific understanding of how rapidly the vast stores of ice in polar regions will melt, so their estimates on new sea levels were based mainly on how much the warmed oceans will expand, and not on contributions from the melting of ice now on land.

Other scientists have recently reported evidence that the glaciers and ice sheets in the Arctic and Antarctic could flow seaward far more quickly than estimated in the past, and they have proposed that the risks to coastal areas could be much more imminent. But the climate change panel is forbidden by its charter to enter into speculation, and so could not include such possible instabilities in its assessment.

Michel Jarraud, the secretary general of the United Nations World Meteorological Organization, said the lack of clarity should offer no one comfort. "The speed with which melting ice sheets are raising sea levels is uncertain, but the report makes clear that sea levels will rise inexorably over the coming centuries," he said. "It is a question of when and how much, and not if."

The warming and other climate changes will be highly variable around the world, with the Arctic in particular seeing much higher temperatures, said Susan Solomon, the co-leader of the team writing the summary and the section of the panel's report on basic science. She is an atmospheric scientist for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

The kinds of vulnerabilities are very much dependent on where you are, Dr. Solomon said in a telephone interview. "If you're living in parts of the tropics and they're getting drier and you're a farmer, there are some very acute issues associated with even small changes in rainfall — changes we're already seeing are significant," she said. "If you are an Inuit and you're seeing your sea ice retreating already, that's affecting your life style and culture."

DOJ_NMG_0127765

The 20-page summary is a sketch of the findings that are most germane to the public and world leaders.

The full report, thousands of pages of technical background, will be released in four sections through the year — the first on basic science, then sections on impacts and options for limiting emissions and limiting inevitable harms, and finally a synthesis of all of the findings near year's end.

In a news conference in Paris, Dr. Solomon declined to provide her own views on how society should respond to the momentous changes projected in the study.

"I honestly believe that it would be a much better service for me to keep my personal opinions separate than what I can actually offer the world as a scientist," she said. "My stepson, who is 29, has an utterly different view of risks than I do. People are going to have to make their own judgments."

Some authors of the report said that no one could honestly point to any remaining uncertainties as justification for further delay.

"Policy makers paid us to do good science, and now we have very high scientific confidence in this work — this is real, this is real, this is real," said Richard B. Alley, one of the lead authors and a professor at Pennsylvania State University. "So now act, the ball's back in your court."

UN Report Predicts Global Warming Effects In U.S. (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Global warming is "very likely" a human-caused problem that will last for centuries and require concerted international action to reduce its potentially devastating impacts, a United Nations panel of climate experts declared Friday in a landmark report.

Now the question is whether the bleak report will change the politics of global warming in the U.S. and lead to a more united effort to deal with the problem—and for the moment, that appears uncertain.

The Bush administration embraced the report but rejected demands for a mandatory system of capping "greenhouse gas" emissions, such as carbon dioxide. Instead, the administration said President Bush would rely on his plans to develop more renewable fuel and require more efficient vehicles.

But with Democrats controlling Congress, pressure is apt to build on the White House to take a tougher approach. More than half a dozen bills—some of them bipartisan—have been presented to Congress calling for mandatory caps on emissions, though the administration said they would hurt the economy and not effectively deal with the problem.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said, "President Bush should immediately work with Congress to pass legislation that requires reductions in the emissions of greenhouse gases, and he should call together the leaders of the world to obtain their binding commitment to reducing pollution around the globe."

The report by the UN's Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change struck a chord of urgency as it warned of rising sea levels, more powerful storms and rapidly shifting weather patterns, including floods and droughts, resulting from a warming of the planet that it said could last a thousand years.

The scientists from 113 countries said they are now 90 percent confident that global warming is caused by mankind, in contrast with a 2001 report in which they said they were 60 to 90 percent confident.

Achim Steiner, executive director of the UN Environment Program, said the focus should shift from the cause of global warming "to what on Earth are we going to do about it. The public should not sit back and say, `There's nothing we can do.'"

"Warming of the planet is unequivocal," the 21-page report concluded, "as is now evident from observations of global average air and ocean temperatures, widespread melting of snow and ice, and rising global mean sea level."

In effect, the panel said governments and people cannot prevent the planet from warming but that steps can be taken to stem the projected increases.

The panel forecast global temperature increases of 2 to 11.5 degrees Fahrenheit by the year 2100 but added that its best estimate was for a rise of 3.2 to 7.1 degrees. Warming during the 21st Century would "very likely be larger" than that of the 20th Century, the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0127766

Some scientists question such conclusions about global warming.

Patrick Michaels, a scholar at the CATO Institute, a Washington libertarian think tank, said that "it is not news to say that human beings are responsible for much of the warming in the late 20th Century."

But Michaels said the report was not as alarming as portrayed. He cited a prediction by the panel that sea levels would rise by a modest 7 to 23 inches by the end of the century and noted that this was slightly less than the panel reported in 2001.

"What this report does is place this very small but very widely quoted group of alarmists—who are talking about 20 feet of sea-rise—far, far beyond the fringes [of environmental science]," he said.

But the report, as well as Bush administration officials, said the relatively modest increases in the sea level do not take into account the recent increased rate of ice melting in Greenland and Antarctica.

"[The sea-rise prediction in the report] is less," Stephen Johnson, administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, told reporters. "But we believe there are other effects that haven't been taken into account yet."

The report said an additional 3.9 to 7.98 inches of sea-level rise are possible if the recent melting of polar ice sheets continues at its recent rate.

Joseph Romm, an assistant secretary of energy in the Clinton administration, said in an interview that if the rate of recent ice loss from Greenland and Antarctica continues, there would be a dramatic rise in sea levels that would devastate coastlines around the world.

Romm, author of a book on global warming, called the report "very solid and alarming." He said a "hidden bombshell" in the report is a finding that as the Earth grows hotter, the less the soil is able to absorb carbon. That would lead to an acceleration of greenhouse gases, he said, and could be devastating to the ecosystem and to the economy.

"The key point is that it said humans are the most likely cause," Romm said. "If we are the main cause, we are the main solution. You can't endorse the report and not endorse strong action on climate change."

The Bush administration said it is already taking action. The White House noted that Bush has devoted nearly $29 billion to climate-related science, technology, international assistance and incentive programs since 2001.

Bush has spent nearly $9 billion on climate science research, "leading the world with unparalleled financial commitment," the White House said in a statement.

In his State of the Union speech last month, the president acknowledged that global warming is a problem and that he is taking steps to do something about it. But it has not been his top priority.

He refused to endorse the 1997 Kyoto agreement to create a mandatory system to cap carbon-dioxide emissions, saying it would harm the U.S. economy and wouldn't be effective because fast-developing countries like China and India are not abiding by it.

During his first presidential campaign, he had pledged to regulate carbon dioxide emissions under the Clean Air Act, but he backtracked when he took office.

At the Energy Department on Friday, Secretary Samuel Bodman said the president has set an "aggressive" goal to cut greenhouse gas emissions by 18 percent by 2012, through increasing the supply of renewable fuels like ethanol and reforming the government's fuel economy standards for cars.

Bodman also called for a dramatic increase in nuclear-power generation here and around the world.

Deal With Warming, Don't Debate It, Scientists Warn (LAT)

By Thomas H. Maugh, Karen Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

A United Nations report released Friday that blames humans for the "runaway train" of global warming has abruptly shifted the international debate from "Are humans to blame?" to "What are we going to do about it?"

"The world's scientists have spoken," said Timothy E. Wirth, president of the United Nations Foundation. "It is time now to hear from the world's policymakers. The so-called and long-overstated 'debate' about global warming is now over."

DOJ_NMG_0127767

The 21-page report, released in Paris by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, proposed no solutions. There is no world consensus on how best to bring about the radical restrictions in emissions that would be needed to mitigate global warming.

The most significant effort to reach a common solution was the 1997 Kyoto Protocol, which so far has not had much impact.

The report said that it was "unequivocal" that global warming was occurring and that it was at least 90% certain humans were responsible. It predicted temperatures would rise 3.2 to 7.2 degrees Fahrenheit by 2100 and that sea level would rise 7 to 23 inches, perhaps more.

If the Greenland ice sheet were to melt completely, it would lead to a 21-foot increase in sea level, forcing the relocation of more than 300 million people living in low-lying areas worldwide.

The report also said warming would continue even in the extremely unlikely event that global carbon dioxide could be stabilized at its current level. Such a stabilization would require an immediate 70% to 80% reduction in emissions, said Richard Somerville of the Scripps Institution of Oceanography in La Jolla.

Although most of the scientific data behind the report have come out before, their aggregation into a single report, phrased in the boldest of terms, sparked an intense reaction Friday.

"The degree of certainty, which was already very high, is now as close to certain as scientists are willing to say," said former Vice President Al Gore, a longtime champion of environmental issues whose documentary on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth," is nominated for two Oscars.

Echoing a phrase that was widely heard Friday, Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) called the report "a scientific smoking gun."

The warming would have a powerful impact on California and the Southwest, with hotter weather, less rainfall and a loss of water supply because of the diminishing snowpack in the Rocky Mountains.

Deflecting criticism

Bush administration officials downplayed the United States' contribution to global warming.

"We are a small contributor when you look at the rest of the world," Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman said in a Friday teleconference.

The U.S. is the single largest contributor to global warming, producing about a quarter of the world's carbon dioxide emissions even though it accounts for about 4.5% of its population.

China, with 20% of the world's population, produces 14.5% of global emissions.

The proportion of emissions contributed by the U.S. is decreasing, however, as developing nations, particularly China and India, build up their economies.

Though global warming cannot be reversed, it can be mitigated, said climatologist Gerald Meehl of the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo. If emissions are reduced, "we'll have fewer climate changes and less warming. If they are higher, we'll have much greater changes. The longer you wait to begin reducing emissions, the worse the problem gets and the more you have to do to do something about it."

The report is the fourth in a series compiled by 2,500 scientists from 130 nations. Although the projections in the report have not changed substantially from those of the last study, scientists' confidence in the assertions has increased sharply.

Compiling the report has been a large international effort with 16 climate modeling groups from 11 countries working independently. "What's really striking … is that the models keep improving with time, but the answers don't keep changing," Meehl said. "That allows us to say with a lot more confidence what we are looking at."

And since the last report was issued, "we have six years of new data, and they are among the seven warmest years on record," said climatologist Kevin Trenberth of the National Center for Atmospheric Research.

The data show that the warmth of the last half century "is unusual in at least the previous 1,300 years," the report said, and the last time the polar regions were significantly warmer for an extended period was about 125,000 years ago. That warming was caused by changes in Earth's orbit and led to melting of the Greenland ice cap.

DOJ_NMG_0127768

As warming continues, it will produce wide changes in regional climates, including: more droughts in the tropics and subtropics; more heat waves; fewer frosts; heavier rains, particularly in Canada, the U.S. Northeast and South America's eastern coast; a retreat of the polar ice caps; less snow cover in the Northern Hemisphere; less-saline ocean water because of the increased precipitation; and more intense hurricanes, though they won't become more frequent.

Sea level rises will cause flooding in low-lying areas, such as the island nation of Kiribati in the western Pacific Ocean, the southern tip of Florida and the lower half of Louisiana.

In Southern California, the modest rise in sea level forecast in the report would probably endanger beaches that are less than 100 feet wide, which account for more than half the state's coastline, said Reinhard Flick, an oceanographer with the California Department of Boating and Waterways.

"They are very likely to be lost if we see anything like a 1- to 3-foot rise in sea level," he said. "A lot of these beaches can be in trouble."

The average temperature in the Southland will probably increase by about 8 degrees by the end of the century and rainfall will decrease, according to climatologist Linda Mearns of the National Center for Atmospheric Research. What rain does fall will evaporate more quickly because of higher temperatures, accentuating the dryness of the climate.

The region's water supply will also be imperiled because in the Rocky Mountains, which provide much of the water for the Southwest, the snow season will be shorter and the snowpack diminished.

"Sections of this report read like the Book of Revelations," said Moira Chapin of Environment California.

Yvo de Boer, executive secretary of the U.N. Framework Convention on Climate Change, called for a summit of global leaders to address the problem. "The findings … leave no doubt as to the dangers that mankind is facing and must be acted upon without delay," he said.

French President Jacques Chirac echoed the call, saying, "Now is not the time for half measures…. We are in truth on the historical doorstep of the irreversible."

Curbing emissions

The only previous effort to reduce global emissions was the Kyoto Protocol, which proposed carbon dioxide emission caps for the 35 richest countries. The United States, where emissions are increasing about 1% a year, withdrew from the pact in 2001, contending it was unfair because it did not set limits for developing nations.

Bodman said Friday that the U.S. would not cap emissions because that would lead to a transfer of jobs and industries abroad. "You would have the U.S. economy damaged on the one hand, and the same emissions — in fact, potentially even worse emissions because in many of those countries they don't have the same kind of standards," he said.

Bodman also noted that the U.S. had spent $29 billion on global warming research, technology development and other initiatives — "more than the rest of the world combined."

Countries that agreed to the Kyoto pact are having trouble meeting its goals. Canada's emissions, for example, are a third higher than levels the country agreed to reach by 2012, and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper says the goal is unachievable.

Scientists said it was not too late to take steps toward emission controls, but "it is later than we think," said atmospheric scientist Susan Solomon of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, who co-chaired the panel that produced the summary.

Global-Warming Report Gets U.S. Emphasis (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- U.S. government scientists Friday said the long-term outlook for global warming may be more dire than suggested by this week's United Nations' report, which they say doesn't fully address the impact of clouds and melting glaciers.

Recent evidence of accelerated melting of glaciers in Greenland and the Antarctic ice cap came too late to be included in the report released Thursday by the U.N.-sponsored Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change.

DOJ_NMG_0127769

Glaciers are among the largest sources of fresh water in the world and are contributing to rising ocean levels. Rising sea levels could expose population centers bordering the ocean to more storm damage and could require evacuation in some areas. But the computer models used for the IPCC report based their predictions only on the results of heating of the existing water in the world's oceans, causing the oceans to expand and sea levels to rise, said Tom Delworth, a climate modeler for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the government agency in charge of climate science and weather service.

The IPCC report predicts sea levels will rise by between one to two feet over the next 100 years. Mr. Delworth said there remains "much more uncertainty" over how much accelerated melting of glaciers might add to that.

A second area of continuing uncertainty has to do with the impact of clouds on climate change. Warming the ocean sends more water vapor into the air, and the resulting clouds accelerate global warming by trapping more of the sun's heat in the atmosphere and further warm the ocean. Jim Butler, deputy director of NOAA's global monitoring division, called this "a very scary feedback mechanism."

But, so far, the supercomputers the agency uses to model the effect on the earth's climate -- which were also used for the IPCC report -- aren't detailed or fast enough to predict how much clouds are accelerating the problem. Mr. Delworth said computer models divide the earth's oceans and atmosphere into four million boxes, each about 150 square miles, and that these boxes are too large to model the effects of clouds.

"We could use computers that are one million times faster than they are today and still not be satisfied," Mr. Delworth said.

Further complicating the issue are layers of haze containing pollutants from human activity. Such pollutants, including sulfates, soot, dust and nitrates, tend to make the atmosphere brighter, reflecting more of the sun's heat back into space. The IPCC has found that the net effect of the added pollution is to cool the atmosphere.

A.R. Ravishankara, an atmospheric chemist for NOAA, said this raises a problem for governments attempting to clean the air by removing pollutants. "If you take away this cooling effect, then the heating effect would be exacerbated. It's a highly complex problem."

Global Warming To Continue For Centuries (AP)

By Seth Borenstein

AP, February 2, 2007

PARIS (AP) - Global warming is so severe that it will "continue for centuries," leading to a far different planet in 100 years, warned a grim landmark report from the world's leading climate scientists and government officials. Yet, many of the experts are hopeful that nations will now take action to avoid the worst scenarios.

They tried to warn of dire risks without scaring people so much they'd do nothing - inaction that would lead to the worst possible scenarios.

"It's not too late," said Australian scientist Nathaniel Bindoff, a co-author of the authoritative Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change report issued Friday. The worst can be prevented by acting quickly to curb greenhouse gas emissions, he said.

The worst could mean more than 1 million dead and hundreds of billions of dollars in costs by 2100, said Kevin Trenberth of the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Colorado, one of many study co-authors. He said that adapting will mean living with more extreme weather such as severe droughts, more hurricanes and wildfires.

"It's later than we think," said panel co-chair Susan Solomon, the U.S. National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration scientist who helped push through the document's strong language.

Solomon, who remains optimistic about the future, said it's close to too late to alter the future for her children - but maybe it's not too late for her grandchildren.

The report was the first of four to be released this year by the panel, which was created by the United Nations in 1988. It found:

_Global warming is "very likely" caused by man, meaning more than 90 percent certain. That's the strongest expression of certainty to date from the panel.

_If nothing is done to change current emissions patterns of greenhouse gases, global temperature could increase as much as 11 degrees Fahrenheit by 2100.

DOJ_NMG_0127770

_But if the world does get greenhouse gas emissions under control - something scientists say they hope can be done - the best estimate is about 3 degrees Fahrenheit.

_Sea levels are projected to rise 7 to 23 inches by the end of the century. Add another 4 to 8 inches if recent, surprising melting of polar ice sheets continues.

Sea level rise could get worse after that. By 2100, if nothing is done to curb emissions, the melting of Greenland's ice sheet would be inevitable and the world's seas would eventually rise by more than 20 feet, Bindoff said.

That amount of sea rise would take centuries, said Andrew Weaver of the University of Victoria in Canada, but "if you're in Florida or Louisiana, or much of western Europe or southeast Asia or Bangladesh ... or Manhattan ... you don't want that," he said.

The report spurred bleak reactions from world leaders.

"We are on the historic threshold of the irreversible," warned French President Jacques Chirac, who called for an economic and political "revolution" to save the planet.

"While climate changes run like a rabbit, world politics move like a snail: Either we accelerate or we risk a disaster," said Italy's environment minister, Alfonso Pecoraro Scanio.

And South Africa's Environmental Affairs Minister Marthinus van Schalkwyk said failure to act would be "indefensible."

In Washington, Bush administration officials praised the report but said they still oppose mandatory cuts in greenhouse gas emissions. The problem can be addressed by better technology that will cut emissions, promote energy conservation, and hasten development of non-fossil fuels, said Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman.

About three-fourths of Americans say they expect global warming will get worse, according to a recent AP-AOL News poll. However, other recent polls have found they don't consider it a top priority for the U.S. government.

But doing nothing about global warming could mean up to a 10-degree Fahrenheit temperature rise by the end of the century in the United States, said report co-author Jonathan Overpeck at the University of Arizona.

Elsewhere, the projected effects of global warming would vary on different parts of the globe.

Temperatures would spike higher near the poles, according to the report. Within 22 years - whether greenhouse gases are controlled or not - most of the Northern Hemisphere will see more high temperature extremes, the report showed. Places like Northern Africa will get even less rainfall.

This climate change "is just not something you can stop," said Trenberth. "We're just going to have to live with it. If you were to come up back in 100 years time, we'll have a different climate."

People experience the harshest effects of global warming through extreme weather - heat waves, droughts, floods, and hurricanes - said study co-author Philip Jones of Britain's University of East Anglia. Those have increased significantly in the past decade and will get even worse in the future, he said.

Given all the dire predictions, why are scientists nearly all optimistic? They think their message is finally getting through to the people in charge.

United Nations environmental leaders are talking about a global summit on climate change for world leaders and they hope President Bush will attend.

"The signal that we received from the science is crystal clear," said Yvo de Boer, the executive secretary of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, a multi-national body that tries to change policy to fight global warming.

"That makes it imperative that the political response that comes from this crystal-clear science is as crystal-clear as well.

"I sense a growing sense of urgency to come to grips with the issue," de Boer said. "I think the major challenge is to further the negotiating agenda in a way that makes major players feel safe to step forwardly on this issue."

The major player that has at times been absent is the United States, the biggest emitter of greenhouse gases.

"The world cannot solve the climate change problem without the United States," Achim Steiner, who heads the UN Environment Program, told The Associated Press.

"The world is looking to the Bush administration and to the United States and how it has to be a key part" of solving global warming, he said.

De Boer was optimistic, there too. In an interview, he said that despite U.S. greenhouse gas emissions increasing 16 percent since 1990, change is afoot.

DOJ_NMG_0127771

Citing congressional interest and carbon dioxide emission limits requested by top industry CEOs, de Boer said: "I see a very important momentum building throughout the country."

Gore To Testify On Climate Change (POL)

By Ryan Grim

The Politico, February 2, 2007

Former Vice President Al Gore has accepted an invitation to testify next month in a congressional hearing on the highly controversial issue of climate change.

Gore's film, "An Inconvenient Truth," which focused on global warming, received two Oscar nominations this week, one for best documentary feature. For people who make a parlor game of guessing Gore's intentions for 2008, the appearance will surely stoke speculation that he may yet be a late entrant into the Democratic presidential derby.

Gore will appear at a joint hearing on Wednesday, March 21. He will be the only witness to appear before the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Energy and Air Quality and the Science and Technology Subcommittee on Energy and Environment. Gore served on both committees during his House tenure representing a Tennessee district.

House Energy and Commerce Chairman John D. Dingell, D-Mich., and Science Committee Chairman Bart Gordon, D-Tenn., will jointly chair the hearing. Climate change has proved a politically thorny issue for newly empowered House Democrats. Dingell, whose district includes many auto industry workers, has been locked in a political battle with Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., over panel jurisdiction on climate change issues.

Political Science (WSJ)

By Philip Stott

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

I confess I was afflicted by a profound world-weariness following the release yesterday of the latest gloomy machinations from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC). The U.N.'s global-warming caravanserai, founded in 1988 by the World Meteorological Organization and the United Nations Environment Program, had this time pitched camp in Paris, in order to issue the "Summary for Policy Makers" relating to Working Group One of its "Fourth Assessment Report: Climate Change 2007." This is the group that focuses on "The Physical Science Basis" of climate change, and its summary was greeted with the usual razzmatazz, the Eiffel Tower's 20,000 flashing bulbs being symbolically blacked out on the evening before. Further IPCC reports are due this year, one in April from Working Group Two, on the impacts of, and adaptation to, climate change, and another in May, from Working Group Three on climate-change mitigation.

But it is the science summary that always gives rise to the jamboree -- with journalists, politicians and eager environmentalists desperate to claim that this particular report is the last word on climate change, that it represents a true consensus, that the world is doomed, and that we must recant our fossil-fuel ways. Moreover, as in 2001 with the Third Assessment Report, Friday's release was preceded by speculative leaks, the political shenanigans and spinning beginning even before the final text had been haggled over and agreed upon.

Unfortunately, the IPCC represents science by supercommittee, as rule 10 of its procedures states: "In taking decisions, and approving, adopting and accepting reports, the Panel, its Working Groups and any Task Forces shall use all best endeavors to reach consensus." I bet Galileo would have had a rough time with that.

In this context, it is vital to remember that science progresses by skepticism and by paradigm shifts: A consensus early last century would have given us eugenics. Moreover, the IPCC does no original research, nor does it monitor climate-related data; its evidence is instead from selected secondary sources. But, above all, this supercommittee is more political than is often recognized, rule three firmly reminding delegates that: "documents should involve both peer review by experts and review by governments."

Friday's summary and "best estimates" of temperature-rise by 2100 (as compared to preindustrial times) are thus little more than a committee compromise chewed over by governments with different agendas: an average potential rise of three degrees Celsius (up from 2.5 degrees in 2001); a probable rise of between 1.8 to 4 degrees; a possible rise of between 1.1 to 6.4 degrees. So you can take your pick, also bearing in mind that there are groups outside the IPCC predicting cooling by one or two degrees

DOJ_NMG_0127772

Celsius. Moreover, the conclusion that climate changes seen around the world are "very likely" to have a human cause is wonderful Alice-through-the-Looking-Glass talk.

Unsurprisingly, the report will please neither a Humeian skeptic nor a rabid apocalyptic. Indeed, even before it appeared, environmentalists were incensed that predictions for the rise in sea levels this century have been lowered to between 28 and 43 cm (11 to 17 inches). They want the polar bears to be drowning now!

For the skeptic, however, the problem remains, as ever, water vapor and clouds. Enormous uncertainties persist with respect to the role of clouds in climate change. Moreover, models that strive to incorporate everything, from aerosols to vegetation and volcanoes to ocean currents, may look convincing, but the error range associated with each additional factor results in near-total uncertainty. Yet, there is a greater concern. Throughout the history of science, monocausal explanations that overemphasize the dominance of one factor in immensely complex processes (in this case, the human-induced emissions of greenhouse gases) have been inevitably replaced by more powerful theories.

Worryingly for the IPCC's "consensus," there is a counterparadigm, relating to the serious uncertainties of water vapor and clouds, now waiting in the wings. In the words of Dr. Henrik Svensmark, director of the Center for Sun-Climate Research at the Danish National Space Center: "The greenhouse effect must play some role. But those who are absolutely certain that the rise in temperatures is due solely to carbon dioxide have no scientific justification. It's pure guesswork." A key piece of research in this emerging new paradigm was published in the Proceedings of the Royal Society A (October 2006): "Do electrons help to make the clouds?"

Using a box of air in a Copenhagen lab, physicists managed to trace the growth of clusters of molecules of the kind that build cloud condensation nuclei. These are specks of sulfuric acid on which cloud droplets form. High-energy particles driven through the laboratory ceiling by exploded stars far away in the galaxy -- cosmic rays -- liberated electrons in the air, which helped the molecular clusters to form much faster than atmospheric scientists have predicted. This process could well explain a long-touted link between cosmic rays, cloudiness and climate change.

The implications for climate physics, solar-terrestrial physics and terrestrial-galactic physics are enormous. This experiment ties in elegantly with the work of certain geochemists and astronomers, who for some time have been implicating cosmic rays and water vapor, rather than carbon dioxide, as the main drivers of climate change. Indeed, they have put down up to 75% of all change to these drivers.

Cosmic rays are known to boost cloud formation -- and, in turn, reduce earth temperatures -- by creating ions that cause water droplets to condense. Calculating temperature changes at the earth's surface -- by studying oxygen isotopes trapped in rocks formed by ancient marine fossils -- scientists then compared these with variations in cosmic-ray activity, determined by looking at how cosmic rays have affected iron isotopes in meteorites. Their results suggest that temperature fluctuations are more likely to relate to cosmic-ray activity than to carbon dioxide. By contrast, they found no correlation between temperature variation and the changing patterns of CO2 in the atmosphere. But the mechanism remained far from understood -- until last October, that is, when the team in the Copenhagen lab may have discovered it.

Who knows where this exciting research will lead? What it unquestionably shows, however, is that the science of climate change is far from settled, and most certainly not by a government-vetted committee policy "summary" from a U.N. supercommittee.

The inconvenient truth remains that climate is the most complex, coupled, nonlinear, chaotic system known. In such a system, both "doing something" (emitting human-induced gases) and "not doing something" (not emitting) at the margins are equally unpredictable. What climate will we produce? Will it be better? And, if we get there, won't it, too, change?

This is the fatal flaw at the heart of the whole global-warming debacle. Climate change must be accepted as the norm, not as an exception, and it must be seen primarily as a political and economic issue, focusing on how best humanity can continue to adapt to constant change, hot, wet, cold or dry. The concept of achieving a "stable climate" is a dangerous oxymoron.

We must hope that IPCC Working Group Two on adaptation will set a wiser agenda in their April report.

Mr. Stott, professor emeritus of biogeography at the University of London, is co-editor of "Political Ecology: Science, Myth and Power" (Oxford University Press, 2000).

DOJ_NMG_0127773

States' Map For Saving The Oceans (WP)

By Leon E. Panetta, James D. Watkins

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Buried beneath the headlines about warming oceans, harmful algae blooms and dwindling seafood stocks is the fact that it is within our power to make immediate, measurable progress toward solving the problems facing our oceans. Innovative state leaders are showing us the way, and the federal government needs to follow their example.

Over the past three years, California, acting to preserve a vital state resource, has developed an Ocean Action Plan; launched the most comprehensive approach to marine protected areas in the nation; and invested more than $30 million in projects to improve water quality, protect ocean habitats and manage sand on its beaches. In the past year, at least 18 states have taken similar steps. Regional, bipartisan alliances were formed to protect the waters, shores, species and economies of the Gulf of Mexico, New York, Puget Sound and the West Coast.

In all of these instances, governors prioritized ocean management and set aside individual state concerns to develop a more effective plan to manage the region's oceans and coasts.

The considerable strides the states and regions made last year in ocean governance earned an A-minus on the Joint Ocean Commission Initiative's latest report card on U.S. ocean policy. That is in stark contrast to the C-minus earned by the nation as a whole. When it comes to managing our oceans, the United States is barely treading water, threatening not only the survival of ocean life but also the lives and livelihoods of those who depend on the ocean as a food source and economic engine.

Our country's C-minus represents a modest improvement from the previous year's grade, a D-plus. The improvement is largely attributable to state action and a few notable federal accomplishments. For instance, passage of the Magnuson-Stevens Fisheries Conservation and Management Act set a firm deadline to end overfishing and will ensure a more scientific approach to fisheries management. The administration's designation of the Northwest Hawaiian Islands Marine National Monument provides important safeguards to 140,000 square miles of ocean and island bounty, and the release of a new national ocean research strategy provides a platform for advancing ocean sciences.

In most respects, though, the federal government and Congress lag behind states in efforts to protect our oceans. And the failure to commit funding and to reform national and international policy for the long-term preservation of our oceans will hamper additional progress in the states.

It's impossible to effectively manage our oceans without the research necessary to fully understand the complex processes of an ocean ecosystem. Nowhere is this more apparent than with climate change. It's no secret that the oceans and climate are deeply linked -- the oceans store vast amounts of energy in the form of heat and are a sink for much of the carbon dioxide emitted over the past century. Yet while sophisticated atmospheric monitoring systems have been in place for decades, only rudimentary systems exist for our oceans. This leaves us trying to fight climate change with one hand tied behind us. The only way to understand and respond to devastating climate change is with important tools such as an Integrated Ocean Observing System, which the administration's new ocean research plan recommended on Jan. 26.

Unfortunately, even the best-laid plans to preserve the oceans remain empty rhetoric when Congress and the administration fail to commit the funds necessary for implementation. For the second year in a row, federal funding for oceans was stagnant. The Joint Ocean Commission Initiative estimates that a $750 million investment would be a significant step forward for such research as the integrated observing system and management programs like the Magnuson-Stevens Act. Such an investment would protect an ecosystem that represents 95 percent of the habitable living space on the planet and supports ocean-dependent businesses that generate more than $138 billion each year.

The federal government can learn the most from the states by emulating their willingness to heed the advice of environmental and industry experts who say that collaboration is the key to preserving the vital resources in our oceans. The United States is one of the few nations that have failed to accede to the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, essentially a global-scale version of our various regional alliances. Joining the convention would ensure the United States a stake in decisions that affect the health of our oceans, economy and security.

DOJ_NMG_0127774

The states have outpaced the federal government on ocean protection for years. It's time for the administration and Congress to dive in. By committing increased science and management funding and supporting the collaborative leadership described above, we can immediately begin to reverse the decline in our oceans.

The writers are co-chairmen of the Joint Ocean Commission Initiative.

Schaghticoke Challenges Cason's Legal Authority (ICT)

By Gale Courey Toensing, Indian Country Today

Indian Country Today, February 3, 2007

KENT, Conn. - The Schaghticoke Tribal Nation has challenged Interior Department Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason's authority to act as "the decision-maker" in overturning the tribe's federal acknowledgement in October 2005.

In the latest twist in the Schaghticokes' decades-long quest for federal recognition, attorneys filed a motion Jan. 23 in U.S. District Court in New Haven, claiming that Cason violated both the Appointments Clause of the Constitution and the Vacancies Reform Act when on Oct. 12, 2005, he issued a Reconsidered Final Determination reversing the BIA's January 2004 positive federal acknowledgement decision.

Cason was functioning as an Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs but was not appointed by the president or confirmed by Congress, and therefore exceeded his authority by issuing decisions that only a "principal officer of the United States" can lawfully render; therefore, the RFD is void, STN's attorneys wrote.

Cason also reversed that day the federal status of the Eastern Pequots, whose federal recognition had been issued two years earlier.

Interior's Inspector General's office could not comment on what the implications would be concerning Cason's other high-level regulatory decisions, if the Schaghticokes' claims are upheld.

The motion is part of the tribe's appeal of the reversal of its recognition. The appeal alleges, among other things, that the RFD was arbitrary and capricious, a violation of the tribe's due process rights and the product of unlawful political influence and congressional interference. It asks the court to restore the tribe's recognition. Interior and its officials are named as defendants.

The appeal is "the Tribe's remaining hope to regain the federal recognition that was wrongly taken from it in the RFD. It is no exaggeration to say that the Tribe is fighting for its very existence. What happened to this Tribe, including the circumstances in which it lost its prior positive recognition are, at a minimum, unusual and deserving of careful review. The Tribe has alleged since its federal recognition first came under attack that various political officials acted improperly to reverse that recognition. This improper delegation of authority to Mr. Cason is one more part of the story of the illegal handling of the Tribe's recognition. The Court should hear the full story of the Tribe's fate," one of the attorneys said.

The Schaghticokes' claims have "no merit," said Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal, who led the state's relentless opposition to the tribe's federal recognition.

"They are yet another attempt to deflect attention from the real issue: the Schaghticoke Tribal Nation's woefully insufficient evidence in support of its petition for federal recognition. I am confident that the BIA's final decision denying the group federal recognition will stand," Blumenthal said.

On Aug. 2, 2001, Norton named Cason "associate deputy secretary" - a title that does not appear on Interior's organizational chart on its Web site at www.doi.gov. In February 2005, when the duly appointed and confirmed ASIA David Anderson resigned, Norton issued an order relegating all of the ASIA responsibilities, duties and functions to Cason.

"Information obtained by the Tribe - including the recent depositions of former Secretary Norton and Mr. Cason ... makes plain that, in this capacity as Associate Deputy Secretary, James Cason at all relevant times performed duties that rendered him a 'principal officer' of the United States. As such, he is required by the Constitution and case law to have been a PAS [presidential appointee, Senate confirmation] appointee. He was not," the attorneys wrote.

The tribe's attorneys declined to release transcripts of Cason's and Norton's depositions, but Blumenthal included excerpts in a brief he filed opposing the tribe's request to take testimony from other Interior officials.

The tribe's attorneys said "it was no accident" that Cason was appointed outside of the PAS process - he did so to avoid Senate scrutiny. Cason failed to win Senate confirmation in 1989 when former President George H.W. Bush nominated him as

DOJ_NMG_0127775

Assistant Secretary for Natural Resources Environment in the Agriculture Department. His inability to win Senate confirmation related to his actions in Interior's Land and Minerals Management and Bureau of Land Management during the 1980s.

"Mr. Cason's decisions at the Department of the Interior were uniformly bad when measured against any reasonable standard of public interest and fairness to the public which owns the public lands," said R. Max Peterson, the chief of the U.S. Forest Service during the Reagan years, in an article called "Leave No Tree Behind" posted on www.counter punch.org in August 2003.

Interior's Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall could not comment on the merits of the Schaghticokes' claims because the issue is in litigation.

"But as a lawyer, not speaking on behalf of the IG's office, I think these are very, very interesting legal issues," Kendall said.

If the tribe's arguments are upheld, what would it mean for all the other high-level decisions Cason has made? Should they stand? Should they be reviewed or vacated?

"I can't go there," Kendall said.

Inspector General Earl Devaney's office has investigated both the tribe's positive recognition process and Cason's roles in Interior.

Devaney investigated the BIA's Schaghticoke recognition process in 2004 at the request of Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, a Democrat who recently announced he is running for president in 2008. Connecticut officials had accused the BIA and the tribe of political influence, corruption and "bending the rules." The investigation exonerated both the BIA and the tribe of any wrongdoing. The recognition decision was "highly controversial," but the process had been honest and transparent, Devaney said. Connecticut officials then accused the IG's office of corruption and "whitewashing" the investigation.

The IG scrutinized Cason's actions during an 18-month investigation of former Deputy Secretary J. Steven Griles, who was notified by the Justice Department in January that he was likely to be indicted for lying under oath about his relationship with the criminal former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The investigation involved allegations that Griles and "DOI officials" had steered $1.6 million in Bureau of Land Management contracts to Griles' former clients. Griles had assigned Cason to screen all matters relating to the contracts from which he had ostensibly recused himself.

The investigation was not able to pin down any ethical violations, but issued a scathing indictment of Interior's "cowardly and disingenuous" failure "to provide rigorous ethics advice to the political leadership."

The investigation was impeded by the shape-shifting nature of Griles' former oil and gas industry clients who "continually merge, change names, and develop subsidiary companies," and by "an unanticipated lack of personal and institutional memory, conflicting recollections; poor record keeping" and other deficiencies.

Cason's authority to act without a presidential nomination and Senate confirmation also raised a red flag years before the tribe's current claims. In response to a query from Committee on Energy and Natural Resources Chairman Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., in 2002, the Government Accountability Office reported that Cason at that time was not making high level regulatory decisions and, therefore, was not "a de facto officer" of the United States subject to presidential appointment and Senate confirmation.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Budget To Seek Cuts For Medicare, Medicaid (LAT)

By Joel Havemann, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

His effort to balance the books in five years includes new spending on education, energy initiatives, farmers and the wars.

WASHINGTON — In a bid to balance the federal budget in five years, President Bush will seek cuts in several key programs. But the spending blueprint he sends to Congress on Monday leaves room for some sweeteners, according to administration officials.

DOJ_NMG_0127776

Under the Bush plan, grants for college students would rise after remaining stagnant for three years, and some parts of the No Child Left Behind Act would receive additional funding.

There would be new money to spur the manufacture of hybrid cars and production of ethanol. And a new farm bill would give farmers $1 billion more a year than the current law.

At the same time, Bush will ask for substantial cuts in Medicare and Medicaid, the government's main healthcare programs.

The Pentagon budget, including a detailed request for war funding in 2008, will hit $623 billion, according to a senior Defense official. That total includes $481 billion for the military's normal annual budget, a 10% increase over this year's spending.

That increase is accounted for, in part, by Bush's proposal to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps by a combined 92,000 troops over the next five years.

The budget request also includes, for the first time, funding details for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan; in past years, these war costs have been approved as special emergency funding bills. The 2008 budget will include a $142-billion estimate for war costs, a clear indication that the administration anticipates a high troop level in Iraq through the end of next year.

The White House will also be asking for an additional $93 billion in war funding for the current fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30.

Combined, the two war requests would take total spending on Iraq and Afghanistan to about $737 billion.

Many aspects of Bush's budget almost assuredly will spark criticism from the Democratic-controlled Congress, which can be expected to offer alternative funding levels. His proposed Medicare cuts are likely to receive an especially cold reception.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who is seeking the presidency in 2008, on Friday said she considered it "unconscionable that the president's answer to our healthcare crisis is to cut the already strained healthcare safety net."

Bush's proposal is expected to cut more than $65 billion over five years from Medicare and about $7 billion from Medicaid, relative to the spending levels that the programs would reach under current law. Large as these cuts seem, they represent only about 2% of the total projected spending for the two programs, which will cost about $590 billion this year.

Most of the Medicare cuts target hospitals and other service providers, rather than direct benefits to patients. The proposal includes cutting about 8% in Medicare payments to doctors.

At the same time, patients would have to pay more for their healthcare coverage through higher co-payments and other changes.

The president also will propose restraining the growth of the State Children's Health Insurance Program. In some states, children from families with incomes up to three times the poverty level qualify for assistance; Bush would reduce that threshold to twice the poverty line.

The president's budget would be more generous to low-income college students. The maximum Pell grant would rise to $4,600 in the 2008-09 school year, from $4,050.

The No Child Left Behind Act, which became law early in Bush's first term, would keep its goal of lifting every student to grade-level competency in reading and mathematics by 2014. Some components of the program would get more federal funding, but the Education Department did not say whether overall outlays would rise.

Bush, who in his State of the Union address last week highlighted a push to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil, is expected to ask for $2.7 billion for his "advanced energy initiative." This includes the efforts to develop more hybrid cars and to increase use of ethanol, an alternative fuel which can be produced from grains and grasses.

In the address, Bush proposed cutting the nation's consumption of gasoline 20% within 10 years.

On another front, Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) expressed displeasure with the funding proposal for levee fortifications and other projects to help Louisiana recover from Hurricane Katrina.

In a letter to Bush, he contended that the budget request would be a "step back" from the president's previous commitment.

joel.havemann@latimes.com

Times staff writers Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar, Julian E. Barnes, Richard Simon and Peter Spiegel contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0127777

Budget For Bush, Saving Tax Cuts Is A Tough Balancing Act (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

President Bush's budget, which he submits to Congress on Monday, will be an early effort to cement his legacy in domestic policy. The key question: Can he convince members of Congress that they can extend his cherished tax cuts, all of which expire by 2010, and still balance the budget?

Mr. Bush has pledged to show a path to erasing the existing $248 billion deficit a couple of years after he leaves office, partly so he can claim strong financial stewardship and, more importantly, so he can convince Congress to extend the tax cuts. If the projections are derided as fuzzy math or have unrealistic assumptions, Congress will scoff and ignore them.

Those projections will assume that Mr. Bush's tax cuts, which are estimated to cost about $450 billion over the next five years, are made permanent. But the White House is expected to leave out or underestimate other key costs, including an expensive fix to the alternative minimum tax and additional funding for the war in Iraq beyond 2009. It will also include strong revenue growth that some economists may see as unrealistic.

As the Bush budget will show, the deficit numbers are notoriously dependent on such assumptions. "The numbers don't tell the whole story," says Stan Collender, a budget expert who is managing director of Qorvis Communications LLC. Depending on how you do the math, he says, there's "either a big surplus coming or a big deficit coming."

Projections by the Congressional Budget Office show a $170 billion surplus in 2012. But that number quickly turns into a deficit when other widely expected costs are factored in, including a fix to the AMT, which is slated to snag 23 million Americans this year unless Congress acts, and more spending on defense and the war on terror.

"It's a little hard to see how there could be a meeting of the minds," Sen. Kent Conrad, (D., N.D.) told reporters the other day. "When you adjust the CBO forecast for the proposals of the president, you can see they just drive us right over the cliff in terms of massive growth of the debt."

The 2008 budget is expected to propose about a 10% increase for the Defense Department to $481 billion, as well as a separate request of $141 billion for the broader war on terror, including funding for the Iraq war. Mr. Bush is also expected to ask for another $93 billion in war funds for 2007, on top of the $70 billion Congress approved last year.

Other agencies are bracing for a squeeze, including the Securities and Exchange Commission, which expects flat funding in 2008 after several years of post-Enron increases. Other agencies have also been told to expect flat or small increases in 2008, according to people familiar with the administration's plans.

There will also be some new initiatives, including the president's proposal to provide a standard tax deduction to individuals who purchase health insurance either through their employer or on the open market. That plan, which would make employer-provided health insurance taxable as income and exclude as much as $15,000 of that income per family, is expected to cost the government about $30 billion to $40 billion a year for the first few years but eventually become "revenue neutral" within a decade.

The budget will also show plans to slow the current 7% annual growth rate in Medicare spending. Those savings are expected to come from squeezing health providers, like doctors and hospitals, which will undoubtedly spark a battle on Capitol Hill as those providers seek to escape the budget scalpel.

A Rare Bill In Congress (NYT)

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

The Democratic-led House has made the most of a sorry budgetary business, stripping out billions of dollars in earmarked pork from a spending measure urgently needed to keep the government running this year. The $463.5 billion bill is an omnibus mop-up device necessitated by the fact that nine of 11 major spending bills were left unfinished last fall by the Republican leadership in its final weeks of power. The Democrats, who promised to cut out special-interest budget goodies, killed thousands of earmarks custom-designed by lawmakers.

The stopgap measure roughly duplicates the spending levels of last year's budget, but has enough room for important changes neglected by the last Congress. More than $10 billion was voted for such programs as health care for wounded Iraq war veterans, Pell grants for students and housing vouchers for the poor, and for 500 additional health research grants. Democrats saved two vital Census Bureau initiatives that Republicans had tried to kill: the running survey of the effect of government programs on the poor and disabled, and the testing of new technology needed for the 2010 census.

DOJ_NMG_0127778

The House measure now heads to the Senate as that rare piece of legislative sausage devoid of expensive, toothsome pork. The rush to passage was necessitated by a Feb. 15 deadline to keep the government financed by cleaning up the leftover mess before having to move full time to writing next year's budget.

Earmarks — those undebated dipperfuls of taxpayer-financed contracts that tripled under the Republicans — will undoubtedly return in the new budget. The difference is that they will be subject to new ethics rules, which say lawmakers are supposed to own up to their provenance by specifying the beneficiaries and justifications of earmarks and disavowing that they will personally benefit.

Bush To Seek 3 Percent Raise For Civil Service And Military (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

President Bush will propose a 3 percent pay raise for federal employees and military personnel in his fiscal 2008 budget, scheduled for release on Monday, a senior administration official said yesterday.

Clay Johnson III, deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget, said the president's civil service pay advisers and Pentagon officials had acted independently in coming up with their pay recommendations. If accepted by Congress, the raises would take effect next January.

Under current practice, most of the money for the annual civilian pay raise is allocated across the board, as a nationwide increase, and a small portion is parceled out by locality to reflect labor market conditions. The new budget will propose using an additional factor -- recruitment and retention needs for special occupations -- in distributing raises, officials said. This would give Bush more leeway in salary adjustments.

The administration proposed a similar, three-way pay allocation process in last year's budget, but the recommendation was not taken up by Congress.

Federal pay is an important part of the Washington-Baltimore economy. The region is home to about 10 percent of the federal workforce, and the annual federal employee payroll (not counting the military and U.S. Postal Service) runs about $20 billion. Many corporations and nonprofit organizations use the federal raise as a benchmark when deciding their annual salary adjustments.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), a longtime advocate for federal employees, said he planned to study the budget proposal, particularly in the context of what he called "an already significant pay gap between federal employees and their private-sector counterparts."

Johnson said the proposal to provide the civil service and the military with a 3 percent raise next year was based on the Labor Department's Employment Cost Index, which tracks wage growth in the private sector. In most years, Congress relies on the index as a starting point for debate on government raises.

The pay proposal marks the second consecutive year that Bush's budget has called for equal adjustments in civil service and military pay. The fiscal 2007 budget proposed an average 2.2 percent raise for both groups. Bush put the raise into effect after Congress failed to complete work on fiscal 2007 spending bills.

The Washington-area congressional delegation usually supports equal adjustments in pay for the military and the civil service, and Hoyer and other area House members recently wrote Bush urging him to support a "pay parity" policy in 2008.

While the president's 2008 budget will propose comparable raises for the civil service and the military, Johnson said, he stressed that the recommendations resulted from "two independent agency processes. The goal is not parity, but that is what the two proposals ended being."

Bush To Urge Democrats To Consider His Domestic Policy (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127779

In an attempt to sustain key elements of a domestic agenda pronounced dead on arrival by congressional critics, President Bush will challenge the newly empowered House Democrats to give his health-care and energy proposals serious consideration when he addresses them today during a retreat in Virginia.

Confronted by the reality of a Congress now controlled by Democrats, Bush has maintained his trademark determination regarding Iraq, pushing forward with a military buildup despite widespread Democratic opposition.

On domestic matters, however, Bush has recently adopted the rhetoric -- but not the policy positions -- often associated with Democrats. He has invoked the menace of global climate change, lamented the nation's growing income inequality, and set ambitious goals to develop alternative fuels and cut gasoline consumption. He has also proposed a plan to make health insurance more affordable to the 47 million people in the country who lack coverage.

Congressional Democrats have greeted such offerings with suspicion. Leading House Democrats remain dismissive of Bush's health-care proposals, in particular. And as they met yesterday during their retreat in Williamsburg, caucus leaders said the onus remains on the president to reach out by backing the domestic initiatives -- including an increase in the minimum wage and a reduction in student-loan rates -- that the new House approved during its first weeks.

"Is he going to stand in the way, or is he going to join us?" asked Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Joel D. Kaplan, Bush's deputy chief of staff and a key figure in the development of the president's agenda, said the president's domestic plans confront "real challenges faced by real people, and they provide real solutions."

Under Bush's health-care-coverage plan, the federal government would create a tax deduction to offset the cost of health insurance. The value of employer-provided health insurance that exceeds the deduction would be taxed as income.

Because the deduction would apply to income before taxes for Social Security and Medicare are subtracted, Bush's plan would mean a tax cut for families who buy health insurance even if they pay little or no income tax. For a family earning $20,000 a year, the savings would be significant -- $2,295 a year, the White House said.

The tax plan would be complemented by a Bush proposal to redirect some of the federal health dollars now being spent by states on hospitals and other institutions, so that they can use them to help pay the cost of health insurance for the poor and for people who have difficulty getting coverage because of chronic health problems.

The White House thought that the idea's progressive tilt would be attractive to Democrats. But key Democrats almost immediately rejected the two plans, calling them the latest in a line of GOP efforts to push workers away from employer-provided health insurance and into individually purchased plans.

"We're not too enthusiastic about either of those proposals," said House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (Md.).

Senators Move Donor Disclosures At A Snail's Pace (LAT)

By Dan Morain

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — In a windowless office at the Federal Election Commission, a 10-year-old printer churns out 500 pages an hour — hour after hour.

"It's a mule," says J. Arnold Queen, the man who tends the Hewlett-Packard 8100-N, a discontinued model.

Overnight, the HP-8100 had spewed forth 2,000 pages. It can't crank out more until its trays are emptied. Tens of thousands more pages are backed up in the queue. It will be working through the day, into the night and over the weekend.

Like most beasts of burden, the machine is a throwback, part of an anachronistic and costly system that exists in large part to serve the members — the Luddites, some would say — of the United States Senate.

Unlike candidates for president and the House, political action committees and most state offices, senators refuse to transmit their campaign donation reports over the Internet.

Thanks to a labyrinthine process that takes weeks or months, they are able to delay public access to their campaign donors' identities — sometimes until after the election.

Now that seven senators are running for the White House and using money raised as senators to jump-start their campaigns, the practice is under renewed scrutiny.

DOJ_NMG_0127780

Senators have blocked repeated efforts, backed by 25 of their colleagues from both parties, to change the law.

"Here is something no one opposes. No one. Why hasn't it passed?" asks Steven Weissman of the nonprofit Campaign Finance Institute.

The answer, he and others say, is that senators don't really want it to pass. But no one argues against it publicly. It's killed in more subtle ways, away from public view.

Like all federal officeholders, senators were required to submit year-end campaign finance reports by Wednesday. Such reports are public documents. But that doesn't mean they are publicly available. Nor will they be any time soon.

"We've seen months go by when the records are not available," Weissman said.

"It's stupidity," said Bob Biersack, FEC spokesman.

"It's not an accident," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, which advocates more disclosure of campaign finances. "It's disclosure that no one can see."

It's not for lack of technology. Senators, good politicians that they are, use computers to track their campaign contributors and maintain campaign records. But rather than transmit this information electronically to comply with the disclosure laws, senators print the documents — which can run thousands of pages — and deliver them to the Senate's public disclosure unit two blocks away.

Many senators drop them in the mail. As long as they are postmarked by the filing date, they are in compliance with the law. Some reports may not arrive for days. The report for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) didn't reach the Senate office until Friday.

There, Senate staffers scan the reports, page by page, transforming them back to digital images. That can take two days.

Then they send the reconstituted computer files by e-mail to the FEC. There, the HP-8100 goes to work, printing and collating the material and preparing it for key-punchers.

A report on all of the Senate Democrats' campaign donors last year consumed 5,487 pages. A similar Republican report weighed in at 4,650 pages. At 500 pages per hour, that equates to between nine and 11 hours, paper jams notwithstanding — though Queen notes that the 8100 "just keeps on going."

The process — which occurs quarterly, and more often in election years — doesn't end there.

Once the reports are collated and boxed, a courier picks them up and drives them an hour or so to Fredericksburg, Va. There, a private contractor, ILM Corp., employs workers to type the information back into a computer — at a cost to taxpayers of $250,000 a year.

Since key-punchers are human, they make mistakes. In one case, a $200,000 entry was reported as $2.3 million.

Once that's done, the data are transmitted electronically back to the FEC — which then posts them online. The process can take months.

As a result, voters had no clue who donated to candidates in the closing weeks in six tight races in November, Weissman said. The reports for some challengers and incumbents in Missouri, Montana, Pennsylvania and elsewhere did not become public until after the election.

Donations came from a tobacco company; corporate law firms; and energy, insurance, cable television and Wall Street firms — information that might have helped sway some voters.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who chairs the influential Senate Rules Committee, is among those who endorsed legislation requiring senators to file electronically. The FEC has urged the change at least since 1997. Talk of requiring online filing comes as Congress considers legislation to expand disclosure requirements related to lobbyists. "It's time to bring the Senate into the modern era," Feinstein said in a statement this week.

Neither she nor another advocate of change, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), was available to discuss why the change is being blocked, or by whom.

Baca Defends Actions (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127781

Amid roiling turmoil in the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, chairman Joe Baca Friday refuted accusations that he had called Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a "whore," had mismanaged the group's political arm, thwarted the advancement of female lawmakers and was improperly elected chairman.

In a lengthy statement, Baca said he was "deeply troubled" by the allegations made by several of his colleagues in the 21-member caucus. All its members are Democrats, and both Baca and Sanchez are from California

Sanchez resigned from the caucus Wednesday, accusing Baca of telling people she's a "whore."

"A months-old internal CHC discussion has been repackaged into accusations with sexual overtones through irresponsible reporting and inflammatory headline writing," he said.

He reiterated his statement, issued Wednesday, that the claims were "categorically untrue."

Aides to Sanchez and Reps. Hilda L. Solis and Linda Sanchez, two California Democrats who have been very critical of Baca, could not be reached for comment. Linda and Loretta Sanchez are sisters.

Baca again dismissed Loretta Sanchez's charge that he had referred to her as a "whore" during a meeting with California state legislators, including Democratic Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez. Specifically, Baca noted news reports that Nunez had said he has "no recollection" of the remark.

Baca also disputed claims of Sanchez and three other Latina Democrats that his November election as caucus chairman had not followed the caucus's bylaws because it did not employ secret ballots.

"The election adhered to the established rules and procedures of the CHC so there should be no question about the validity of the process or the outcome," Baca said. "Our bylaws make no mention of secret ballots, simply requiring that there be an affirmative vote of a majority of the CHC Members."

Nonetheless, the caucus held a second vote Jan. 18, and Baca was elected again.

"Although this meeting was open to all CHC members, none of the members who have since expressed concern attended the executive session," he said.

Addressing accusations about the group's political arm, Baca said he had abstained from a vote to direct political contributions to his two sons, a move that had drawn criticism from half a dozen colleagues. He also noted that the sons had refunded the donations "upon concerns coming to light."

He also dismissed allegations of sexism, noting that he had appointed, or recommended, female lawmakers to various leadership posts. And he pointed out that his longtime chief of staff, Linda Macias, had been an "invaluable colleague and friend" for a dozen years and that the majority of his staff are women.

Who's A "Whore"? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

OK, so Loretta is all mad at Joe because he's using money from the club treasury for his boys, who Loretta totally can't stand, so Loretta and her sister, Linda, get some girls to go after Joe's boys, but he's elected to head the club, which makes Loretta go postal and she quits. And then Loretta says Fabian said Joe called her a whore! But now Fabian says he doesn't remember, and Joe's all like, "It never happened."

Sounds like junior high, doesn't it? It's not. It's the California congressional delegation. In particular, it's several Southern California Latino Democrats, hurling charges and countercharges about political money, family, voting improprieties and personality. But it comes down to this: Did Rep. Joe Baca (D-Rialto) call Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Santa Ana) a "whore"? And if so, why?

The trash talking went public this week when Politico.com reported that Orange County's Sanchez had quit the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, which the Inland Empire's Baca chairs. But the bad feelings stretch back a year, when caucus PAC money was being used to boost the political fortunes of Baca's sons, Joe Jr. and Jeremy. Jeremy needed the money to help his family keep the state Assembly seat being vacated by Joe Jr., who was trying to extend the Baca empire into the state Senate. Both Baca brothers lost, despite the infusion of PAC money, and it may be worth noting that their opponents were women: Gloria Negrete McLeod defeated Joe Jr., and his old seat went not to his brother but to Wilmer Amina Carter.

DOJ_NMG_0127782

Sanchez and four other Californians — including her sister, Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Lakewood) — and an Arizonan quit the PAC over the use of money for family members. But the Sanchez sisters and other female caucus members angry over the PAC money, the Baca family's dynastic aspirations and the poor treatment of women also complained that the caucus broke its own rules by electing Baca without a secret ballot. Loretta Sanchez said that was the real reason she finally quit.

This week she also claimed that Baca lobbed the W-word at her. Fun as it may be to imagine the two Democrats yelling profanities across the Rotunda, it turns out that Sanchez heard about the "whore" comment secondhand — from, she implied, Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles). Nunez says he remembers no such thing. Baca said it never happened.

Here are some universal truths: Our elected officials should not try to build family dynasties. Female politicians should be treated with as much respect as their male counterparts. Trash talking dirties everyone. And members of Congress should act like adults. Grow up.

FAA Looks For Money For New Air-Traffic Control System (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Federal aviation officials expect on Monday to begin introducing a proposal to finance a new air-traffic control system that they say will be needed to keep pace with increasing air travel over the next two decades.

Without a new system, officials say, passengers would face delays that would dwarf last year's snarls.

"In the long term, we could see real gridlock," said Federal Aviation Administrator Marion C. Blakey.

Few people in the aviation industry dispute Blakey's assessment of future air-traffic congestion, a problem that officials hope to fix by switching from a radar network to one that relies on satellites.

However, a debate is unfolding over how to finance the next-generation network, which could cost $69 billion to $76 billion, according to the Congressional Research Service. The Federal Aviation Administration and other government agencies want the system completed by 2025. They have not said how much it would cost.

The FAA would use its trust fund, which accumulates aviation-related taxes, to pay for the new system. The fund's balance has dropped to $1.8 billion, however, the lowest in a decade, officials said.

The officials say they must change how they collect money for the fund. Its largest source of funding -- taxes paid on airline tickets -- is not keeping pace with costs, they say.

The officials cite several reasons for the shortfall, but attribute it mostly to the growth of low-cost carriers. Those airlines charge less for flights, reducing tax revenue. Officials also note that airlines are using more small jets, adding to the workload of controllers.

Officials expect increased use of corporate aircraft and small private planes, known as very light jets, that are just hitting the market. Users of corporate jets and other private aircraft pay fuel taxes.

Blakey has hinted that the agency is considering a plan more in line with what airlines have advocated for years: replacing the ticket tax with user fees. Airlines want the FAA to charge fees for most planes, including private jets, that use controlled airspace.

It is not clear how broad the FAA proposal would be or how much it would rely on user fees, taxes or a combination of the two. Blakey has said only that the agency would try "to tie the actual costs of providing the services to the revenue that is coming in."

Owners of jets and small planes are lobbying against a change in the funding structure, saying it would unfairly hurt their businesses and aviation generally. They say the FAA has exaggerated its budget problems and has not explained how much the new system would cost. If the funding structure remains unchanged, they say, the trust fund would still accumulate billions of dollars to finance a new air-traffic system. They refer to estimates by the Congressional Budget Office that say the fund would have nearly $19 billion by 2016.

"I just don't understand why we need to change a system that works," said Phil Boyer, president of the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association.

DOJ_NMG_0127783

Parts of the FAA proposal would be included in the agency's budget, which is to be submitted to Congress on Monday. More details are to emerge after the agency's reauthorization proposal is made public in the next few weeks.

The planned air-traffic system would be vastly different than today's network, which dates to the 1960s and relies on radar and air-traffic controllers to direct pilots. Controllers must maintain substantial distances between planes and often move aircraft along slower, indirect routes because of the imprecision of radar data.

The new system, parts of which are being tested, would rely on satellites and Global Positioning System devices, which can locate an aircraft within a few feet. That would make it easier for controllers to handle more aircraft safely and more efficiently, officials said.

Pilots also would be able to monitor the location of other planes on screens in their cockpits, giving them a far better idea of what is going on around them and how to avoid trouble.

The system would require new equipment for planes, which could cost thousands of dollars per aircraft. The government would have to ensure that other countries adopt similar systems so planes would not need additional computers or software. The new technology must be proven to be as reliable as radar.

The government probably would not get rid of all of its radar stations because it would not be able to track planes involved in terrorism incidents in which satellite positioning systems are disabled.

Crashworthy Motor Vehicles (NYT)

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

The federal government is exploring ways to strengthen its tests and its ratings system for the crashworthiness of motor vehicles. The effort is long overdue but still likely to fall short of what's needed. In far too many cases, the tests are weaker than they should be and fail to address current kinds of accidents, like what happens when one of today's larger vehicles collides with a smaller one.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration tackles vehicle crash protection in two major ways. It sets minimum crashworthiness standards and requires the manufacturers to test their vehicles and certify that they comply. And it conducts its own more rigorous tests on a number of new-model cars and then converts the results into a five-star rating system to indicate which vehicles are more crashworthy and which are less likely to roll over. The theory is that consumers will be more interested in buying the safer vehicles, thereby giving manufacturers a strong incentive to surpass the minimum requirements.

There is little doubt that these efforts have helped to prod manufacturers to design safer cars. But the ratings are a victim, in some sense, of their success. Nowadays, a vast majority of vehicles get four or five stars, providing little way for consumers to detect differences and giving manufacturers little incentive to keep improving.

Worse yet, the tests have not kept pace with the times as more sport utility vehicles, minivans and pickups have taken to the roads. Fortunately, the agency is belatedly exploring ways to upgrade its crash tests and strengthen the five-star rating system. The secretary of transportation, Mary Peters, announced last month that vehicles could be subjected to more stringent rollover, front- and side-crash tests. New ratings may also be developed for technologies that help drivers avoid crashes, like electronic stability control and lane departure warning systems.

The agency signaled that it was not yet ready to address such important issues as collisions between large and small vehicles, collisions with narrow objects like telephone poles, and the protection of occupants in rollover crashes, on the grounds that more research is needed. For everyone's safety, consumer advocates and vehicle insurers should press hard for the strongest possible tests and standards.

OTHER NEWS:

Jobs Data Signal Growth Is Easing But Still Solid (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127784

U.S. employers were more cautious about taking on new workers in January, a hint that economic growth may be easing. But plenty of underlying signs suggest that a strong labor market will continue to lift wages and boost consumer spending in the months ahead.

The Labor Department Friday said nonfarm payrolls rose by 110,000 jobs last month following December's gain of 206,000 jobs. The smaller increase in January -- together with a rise in the unemployment rate to 4.6% from 4.5% in December and a tepid 0.2% gain in the typical employee's pay last month -- suggests the economy is slowing somewhat after a strong finish to 2006.

But the tone of the report wasn't entirely soft. Revised data showed that employers brought on 80,000 more workers in November and December than initially thought, which means employers have added an average of 170,000 jobs a month since November. That is more than enough to keep the economy growing at a pace that could stoke inflation, particularly if the unemployment rate stays low and wages keep rising faster than consumer prices.

The ambiguous signals from the labor market arrived as economists were trying to digest a separate report this past week that showed the economy bouncing back from a midyear slump to grow at an annualized, 3.5% inflation-adjusted rate in the fourth quarter. In leaving interest rates unchanged this past week, the Federal Reserve noted the recent signs of economic strength and said it remains concerned that inflation could flare up again.

Despite lukewarm job creation in January, a large, upward revision to last year's job estimates will likely keep those concerns alive. In its annual revision, based on a thorough count of unemployment insurance tax records, the Labor Department said the economy created more than 2.2 million jobs last year, 400,000 more than previously estimated. That helps explain why consumers seemed so resilient last year despite higher interest rates and a sharp reversal in the housing market, and it bodes well for economic growth this year.

"One reason the U.S. economy has weathered this downdraft in housing and autos is that it's been generating a lot of income" for consumers, said Robert Gay, a former senior economist at the Federal Reserve.

Indeed, the competitive labor market continues to boost wages. The average hourly wage of nonmanagerial workers in January was 4% higher than a year earlier, well above the current inflation rate of about 2.5%.

White-collar, service-sector workers like Mr. Gay, now a hedge-fund consultant in New York, have been in particular demand. Employment in the category of professional and business services, which includes accountants, consultants and lawyers, grew by 25,000 positions in January. The health-care field added 18,000 workers last month and an average 28,000 positions a month last year.

FairPoint Communications Inc., a Charlotte, N.C., telecommunications company, said it plans to add 600 jobs this year, to "support field operations" and mostly in the accounting, logistics, information-technology and human-resources departments.

Roy Krause, chief executive of Spherion, a staffing firm in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., said, "You're taking out of a lot of companies the 60-year-old middle-management professional that needs to be replaced somehow." He said Spherion's professional placements are running 8% to 10% higher than a year ago, compared with 4% to 5% growth for clerical or industrial placements.

Amid the vigorous labor market, the University of Michigan yesterday said its consumer-sentiment survey rose to 96.9 in January from 91.7 in December, hitting its highest mark in two years.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Department said factory orders surged 2.4% in December after a 1.2% gain in November, but underlying trends suggest the manufacturing sector could struggle in the months ahead as it works off stockpiles of unsold goods.

Economy Adds Fewer Jobs Than Expected (FT)

By Eoin Callan, Michael Mackenzie

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

The US unemployment rate rose this month as the economy added fewer jobs than expected, government figures showed.

The unemployment rate hit 4.6 per cent as employers added 111,000 workers to their payrolls in January, the department of labour said.

DOJ_NMG_0127785

The signs of cooling in the labour market are consistent with the Federal Reserve's view that inflation pressures are starting to moderate as the economy coasts towards a soft landing.

The increase in unemployment makes the central bank more likely to keep interest rates on hold as it waits to assess the full impact on consumer sentiment of a slowdown in the housing market.

Robert Mellman, an economist at JP Morgan, said: "The message from these figures is that the economy is not overheating. This gives the Fed less reason to be worried about inflation."

Ed Lazear, economic adviser to President George W. Bush, said: "This jobs report is just about perfect. It suggests that the economy is balanced. It suggests we can sustain this into the future."

The slower-than-expected job creation follows above trend economic growth in the last quarter, when the economy created 104,000 more jobs than previously thought, according to the latest figures.

The payroll increases were strongest in the service sector - which added 104,000 jobs, while the construction sector surprised many economists by adding 22,000 jobs, despite a housing slowdown.

Factories shed 16,000 jobs, underlining the weakness in the the manufacturing sector, according to the data on non-farm payrolls.

Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital said: "The data will leave expectations of a steady Fed through the first half of 2007 largely intact while encouraging some to flirt more actively with rate cuts toward the end of the year."

Equities rose as Treasury yields fell, with the benchmark 10-year bond yield down to 4.81 from 4.85 per cent. The dollar slipped a little against the euro and the yen.

Growth in average hourly earnings was slower than expected with an increase of 3 cents in January to $17.09. Over the year, both hourly earnings and weekly earnings rose by 4 per cent.

Employment Figures Fit "Soft Landing" Predictions (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

The nation's labor market softened slightly last month, with the unemployment rate edging up to 4.6 percent as job growth slowed, the Labor Department said yesterday.

The report fits with widespread government and private forecasts that the economy will slow to a cooler but still-solid pace of growth this year after expanding rapidly last year. That is expected to cause the drum-tight job market to ease and inflation pressures to ebb.

The Labor Department's report "paints a perfect picture of the U.S. economy and labor markets making a 'soft-landing,' " said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist at PNC Financial Services Group.

The jobless rate ticked up in January from 4.5 percent in December but remains low by historical standards. Much of the increase occurred because hundreds of thousands of workers poured into the labor force last month, likely drawn by booming job growth at the end of last year.

Employers increased their payrolls by 206,000 workers in December and by 196,000 in November, the department said, revising upward earlier estimates. That was more than the monthly number of new jobs, 100,000 to 150,000, that many economists think necessary to keep pace with growth in the labor force.

Employers turned more cautious in January, however, adding a more modest 111,000 jobs, the Labor Department said. Some of the biggest employment gains were in education, health care, finance and other services, as was the case last year.

Construction employment grew as job cuts by home builders were more than offset by hiring for nonresidential projects such as offices, hotels, factories and hospitals. Some of the gain was likely because of the unseasonably warm weather across much of the country in January, analysts said.

Manufacturing employment fell, with the losses concentrated in automaking, furniture and textiles, the Labor Department said.

"The end of the year was strong, so it was not unusual there was a little pullback" in hiring last month, said Roy G. Krause, chief executive of Spherion, a national staffing firm in Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

DOJ_NMG_0127786

Many economists predict that the unemployment rate will rise this year to about 5 percent.

The unemployment rate fell last month for African American workers, to 8 percent from 8.4 percent in December. The rate was the lowest since July 2001, but was still nearly double the rate for white workers, which rose to 4.1 percent from 4 percent. Latino joblessness rose to 5.7 percent from 4.9 percent.

Wage growth also slowed in January, which should help ease concerns at the Federal Reserve that a tight job market might drive inflation higher. Average hourly earnings for most workers rose 0.2 percent last month, the slowest pace since September, to $17.09.

Slower Job Growth, At Least For Now (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters, Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

Job growth slowed in January, the government reported yesterday, offering a tentative sign that the economy may be shifting down a notch from its unexpectedly robust pace of growth at the end of last year.

According to the Department of Labor's report, employers across the nation added 111,000 jobs last month, about half the monthly gains recorded at the end of last year and fewer than most Wall Street economists expected.

Unemployment rose a tenth of a percentage point, to 4.6 percent, the highest level since September, because of a substantial increase in the number of people entering the labor force seeking a job.

The weaker data for January soothed some investors in financial markets, who have been worrying that faster growth in jobs and wages may feed through to higher inflation. "We're looking at the ultimate rosy scenario," said Robert S. Gay, managing partner of Fenwick Advisors, a financial consulting firm. "Not too fast, not too slow."

But employers may be hiring at a faster clip than is immediately apparent. The Labor Department also acknowledged that employers added nearly one million more jobs from March 2005 through last December than it had previously estimated.

Last year, employment growth exceeded earlier estimates by more than 400,000 jobs. The magnitude of the change suggested that the Labor Department might be seriously underestimating the growth in employment.

"The size of the upward revisions was enormous," said Joshua Shapiro, chief United States economist with MFR. "You put the pieces of the puzzle together, and it sort of tells you that the 111,000 number is not something to focus on." January's number will be revised in February and March, and will be subject to an annual adjustment next year.

The reported changes to prior data were mostly because of the annual adjustment of the sample of businesses that the Labor Department surveys to put together its employment figures. The department also recalibrated its model of the birth and death of businesses — which feeds into its estimates of employment growth.

The adjustments fit an underlying picture of an economy that is somewhat stronger than previously thought, despite the continuing weakness in the housing market — which has affected employment in the housing sector. Early estimates put growth in the fourth quarter at 3.5 percent, faster than expected.

Indeed, the University of Michigan's consumer confidence gauge for January, which was released yesterday, rebounded to its highest level in two years, as cheaper energy encouraged expectations of a stronger economy, better jobs and higher wages.

Richard T. Curtin, who heads the university's surveys of consumers, noted that in January only 27 percent of consumers said they expected unemployment to rise over the next year, the lowest percentage in two years, down from 41 percent in the August survey. "Consumers expect a big increase in real incomes," Mr. Curtin added.

Wages did not grow much in January. Hourly wages increased 3 cents, or 0.2 percent, before inflation, the slowest since September. The total hours worked in the private sector declined to 33.8 a week, from 33.9 in December.

Though inflation in January has not yet been reported, it would not be surprising if it were to exceed the growth in hourly wages.

When the Federal Reserve voted on Wednesday to leave interest rates unchanged, it sounded its usual cautionary note about inflation. But this time, it was more optimistic that prices would "moderate over time," its statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0127787

Still, some economists remain nervous about wage growth. “Increases in wages should not necessarily lead to wage inflation of the sort that would worry the Fed if we continue to see productivity growth, but productivity growth has been slowing,” said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group.

Even so, Mr. Baumohl added, the Fed may find it difficult to raise interest rates just as workers are starting to see real wage gains. “It’s taken so long for workers to catch up, that you really don’t want to terminate that abrupt increase in income. The Fed is going to have to be very careful here.”

Yet, according to some economists, the Fed will not be faced with that decision because the labor market is about to take a turn for the worse as the boost from cheaper gas and the warm winter weather starts to fade.

“I think we’ll be looking at softer numbers,” said Jan Hatzius, chief United States economist at Goldman Sachs, “especially to the extent that you’ve gotten some help from weather. And there’s going to be payback for that. What it means is that seasonal layoffs in the winter weren’t as significant as they have been in past winters. And there’s going to be less seasonal hiring in the spring.”

The job figures, part of the Labor Department’s monthly employment report, underscored how the housing slump is still putting a drag on the economy. Last month, home builders and related businesses cut 11,400 jobs.

Still, other sectors have not followed housing down, as many economists had feared. For instance, hiring in commercial construction offset many of the losses in housing, and the construction industry as a whole posted a gain of 22,000 jobs.

Some of the sectors doing the most hiring in January were health care and social assistance (24,500 new jobs), food services (21,000 jobs) and government (14,000).

Cuts to blue-collar work forces were some of the deepest last month. Manufacturing continued to drag, losing a net 16,000 jobs in the month. Those losses were concentrated in the automobile industry, where carmakers and auto parts manufacturers eliminated 23,000 jobs. In all of 2006, auto and auto parts manufacturers shed more than 83,000 jobs, the government reported.

Despite Recent Oil-Price Rally, Stock Investors Hold On (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

If stock investors could spare a blanket, they might want to throw it on crude-oil prices, which are rising again. For now, they seem to be using their blankets to keep warm.

After a selloff in crude to begin 2007, colder weather throughout much of the U.S. has sent the commodity surging anew, up nearly 17% from its mid-January lows.

But while higher oil prices usually hurt stocks because of the impact of energy costs on businesses and consumers, this oil rally hasn't sent investors into a panic. Even after a small decline Friday, the Dow Jones Industrial Average is up 1.5% for the year after closing at a record Thursday.

Investors figure at less than $60 a barrel, off 23% from the midsummer high, oil prices aren't so bad. Still, they are paying attention to oil again, wary that if crude's rise continues, it could eventually hurt corporate profits.

"More than anything else, the effect of the oil price is very psychological," for both investors and consumers, says analyst Fadel Gheit, of brokerage firm Oppenheimer & Co. He says a return to retail gasoline prices over $3 a gallon could set off more conservation by consumers and possibly a stock selloff. For now, that scenario doesn't seem much of a risk.

After a rally in oil prices Friday, prices at the service station could be on the way up. Forecasts for cold weather and buying by traders who often like to guard against adverse news over the weekend sent crude prices up $1.72, or 3%, to $59.02 a barrel -- the highest finish so far this year. That trimmed oil futures' decline for 2007 to 3.3%.

The rally helped push the Dow lower Friday, though it had its best week in more than two months. The average fell 20.19 points Friday, or 0.2%, to 12653.49, up 1.3% for the week. Higher energy prices generally concern investors because they believe that when consumers spend more at the pump, it leaves fewer dollars to spend on other products and services.

Other stock indicators rose Friday. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index edged up 0.2%, or 2.45 points, to 1448.39, a six-year high and up 2.1% on the year. It rose 1.8% for the week. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.3%, or 7.50 points, to 2475.88, up 1.7% for the week and 2.5% on the year.

DOJ_NMG_0127788

Stocks were also held in check by the Labor Department's release of weaker-than-expected weekly employment data. Other economic signals were more upbeat. Measures of both consumer confidence and factory orders were up for December.

"The economy is stronger than most people think," says strategist James Paulsen of Wells Capital Management. "I don't think oil is down from [its summer highs] near $80 because the economy has slowed. If anything, it's accelerated."

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed; bonds rose. The 10-year note gained 2/32 point, or 62.50 cents per $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.828%.

The dollar strengthened, to 121.04 yen, compared with 120.71. The euro fell against it to $1.2967, from $1.3020.

Jobs Report Brings A Tepid End To A Strong Week (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

Wall Street ended a strong week narrowly mixed yesterday as the market absorbed a weaker-than-expected employment report that curbed investors' bullish sentiment after three straight days of gains.

The January jobs report, which showed the country's unemployment rate at a four-month high of 4.6 percent, came as a surprise on Wall Street. A reading of 4.5 percent had been expected. The Labor Department report signaled that employers were more cautious than expected in adding jobs in the new year. The economy added 111,000 jobs last month, below the 150,000 that had been expected.

Investors also received word from the Commerce Department that factory orders showed their biggest gain in nine months in December, rising 2.4 percent.

"They're by no means terrible numbers here," said Andy Richman, fixed-income strategist at SunTrust Bank's personal asset management arm. He said the readings indicate that the Federal Reserve's strategy of standing pat on interest rates is working.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 20.19 points, or 0.16 percent, to 12,653.49.

Broader stock indicators were higher. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 2.45 points, or 0.17 percent, to 1,448.39, its highest level in more than six years, and the Nasdaq composite index advanced 7.50 points, or 0.30 percent, to 2,475.88.

For the week, the Dow was up 1.33 percent, while the Nasdaq gained 1.66 percent and the S.& P., 1.84 percent.

Bonds were little changed, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury note up 4/32, at 9815/32, and the yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, falling to 4.82 percent, from 4.84 percent late Thursday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices fell.

Light crude oil settled up $1.72, at $59.02 a barrel, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Crude prices have risen this week on political concerns in the Middle East, and cold weather in the northeastern United States.

In a week full of corporate profit reports, the Fed's decision on interest rates and the jobs report stood out, and, as expected, played the greatest role in shaping investor sentiment.

The central bank's decision to leave short-term interest rates unchanged and its comments that the economy remains solid and that inflation appears to be in check helped drive stocks higher.

The Dow and the Russell 2000 index of smaller companies set closing highs Thursday.

The meandering trading yesterday after three days of gains was somewhat typical of Wall Street's behavior in the new year as run-ups have often been accompanied by a session or more of contemplation in which investors try to determine whether stocks are poised to move higher.

In corporate news, the Internet retailer Amazon.com fell $1.31, or 3.4 percent, to $37.39, after the company's fourth-quarter profit fell and raised concerns about thinning profit margins.

Intuitive Surgical rose $17.45, or 17.6 percent, to $116.77 after profit at the company, which makes robotic surgical gear, fell but came in better than Wall Street expected.

DOJ_NMG_0127789

The video game publisher Electronic Arts rose 59 cents, to $51.13, after the company's fourth-quarter earnings handily topped Wall Street's expectations.

Chevron fell 43 cents, to $74.04, after the company posted a decline in its fourth-quarter profit amid lower energy prices.

CA, the maker of business information software, rose $1.69, or 6.8 percent, to $26.69, after it raised its 2007 sales forecast.

The drop in gold prices pushed shares of mining companies lower. Barrick Gold fell 31 cents, to $29.98; Goldcorp fell 88 cents, or 3.1 percent, to $27.22.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average rose 0.16 percent.

The Current "Depression" (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

The good economic news keeps rolling in. Yesterday's new-jobs estimate for January, at 110,000, was below Wall Street expectations but it was accompanied by upward revisions of 81,000 jobs for the prior two months. Those revisions brought the 2006 monthly average up to 187,000 new jobs, or 2.2 million for the year.

Readers will recall that the current expansion was derided right through 2004 as a "jobless recovery." We now know the economy has created 7.4 million new jobs since mid-2003, as revisions by the Bureau of Labor Statistics have added hundreds of thousands to its original monthly estimates. Thus the hand-wringers have had no choice but to move on, turning their laments to allegedly "stagnant wages." Well, that's now vanishing too.

Let's look at the record of this expansion compared with that of the sainted 1990s. Economist Michael Darda has been looking at the numbers, and yesterday he put out a side-by-side employment comparison of the first five years of the 1991-2000 expansion with the current one that began in the fourth quarter of 2001.

Between 1991 and 1996, the unemployment rate averaged 6.4%, compared with 5.4% from 2001 to 2006. Today's jobless rate is now down to 4.6%. As for real (inflation-adjusted) wage growth, it averaged 0.6% annually for non-farm workers in the first half of the 1990s compared with 1.5% a year so far in this decade. "This cycle as a whole has witnessed twice the average real wage growth than the first 64 months of the previous expansion," Mr. Darda writes. For the last 12 months, real wages have risen even faster, at a 1.7% clip.

Anything else to worry about? Well, there's always the "trade deficit," though exports are now booming (up 10% last year), especially to the countries with which the U.S. has signed free-trade agreements. So moving right along, this week's bad news is said to be the U.S. "savings rate," which according to the official measure was "negative" for a whole calendar year for the first time "since the Great Depression," as Martin Crutsinger of the Associated Press helpfully put it. Hooverville, here we come!

As a statistic, however, the official "savings rate" is nearly as useless a guide to prosperity as the trade deficit. In the government accounts, what is called the savings rate is literally income less consumption. But the government defines income too narrowly and consumption broadly. For example, "income" doesn't measure capital gains (whether realized or not), the rising value of your home, or even increases in your retirement accounts.

Think about how you calculate your own personal "savings rate." Do you merely add up what you make in salary in a year minus what you spend? Or do you sneak a peak at whether your IRA increased in value, or check the sale price your neighbor got on his home to figure out what you might be able to get for yours? By any normal definition, "savings" should include your increase in total assets -- in other words, your gains in overall wealth.

For our part, these columns long ago began to watch a far more instructive figure known as "household net worth." That number, released by the Federal Reserve, includes all assets (tangible and financial) held by individuals less their liabilities (mortgage and other debt). At the end of last year's third quarter, U.S. household net worth had climbed to $54.1 trillion. That was an increase of more than $3 trillion over the previous four quarters. Rest assured, that's a much higher figure than during "the Great Depression," AP notwithstanding.

None of this means we should be complacent about economic growth. There are two genuine clouds on the horizon -- namely, inflation risk and political risk. Inflation remains somewhat higher than is comfortable, and we still expect the Fed will consider further interest-rate hikes if today's weak dollar and soaring commodity prices lead to a jump in the official inflation indicators later this year. As for politics, the Democrats now running Congress explicitly reject the tax cuts and freer trade that have helped to propel the current prosperity. If history is any guide, sooner or later this is a recipe for trouble.

DOJ_NMG_0127790

DNC Turns Focus To White House (WP)

By Dan Balz, Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

With Congress in their control and their eyes now on the White House, Democratic Party leaders took their first look at the party's field of presidential candidates yesterday at a forum in which the three front-runners presented their positions on Iraq and jockeyed over who can defeat the Republicans in 2008.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York presented herself as a tough, experienced pragmatist. Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois offered himself as an inspirational critic of politics as usual. And former senator John Edwards of North Carolina made himself the keeper of the Democratic flame, delivering a call for Democrats to reclaim their heritage.

Addressing the Democratic National Committee's winter meeting, Clinton put further distance between herself and President Bush on Iraq. "I want to be very clear about this," she said. "If I had been president in October of 2002, I would not have started this war. . . . If we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president, I will."

For Clinton, who supported the 2002 resolution authorizing the U.S. invasion and then defended the mission long after the initial combat phase ended, the pledge to stop the war represented another break with Bush's Iraq policies.

Edwards drew a rousing reception with a sharp attack on Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq and a populist appeal for Democrats to return to their roots as defenders of the union workers, the poor and struggling middle-class families. "Brothers and sisters, in times like these, we don't need to redefine the Democratic Party," he said. "We need to reclaim the Democratic Party."

Obama stated that he had repeatedly spoken out against the war before the invasion in 2003, but he pitched most of his message in a different direction. Warning that campaigns should be about more than skeletons in the candidates' closets and gaffes along the way, he urged Democrats to fight against the cynicism that he said has turned politics into a blood sport and has blocked consensus and cooperation on solving the country's problems.

"There are those who don't believe in talking about hope," he said. "They say, 'Well, we want specifics, we want details and we want white papers, we want plans.' We've had lots of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope. And over the next year, over the next two years, that will be my call to you."

The audience that filled the large ballroom at the Hilton Washington Hotel whooped and cheered and often rose to their feet in response to the candidates' rhetoric.

Besides the three front-runners, three other candidates also spoke yesterday: Connecticut Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, a former general chairman of the DNC, and two veterans of the 2004 campaign, retired Army Gen. Wesley K. Clark and Ohio Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich.

Today, the Democrats will hear from Delaware Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., whose campaign began in controversy and apology this week over a comment in which he described Obama as "articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy." Others on today's schedule include New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack and former Alaska senator Mike Gravel.

Yesterday's speakers refrained from attacking each other, using the forum as a brief opportunity to sound the main themes of their campaigns and distinguish themselves from their rivals.

Clinton described herself to party leaders as the Democrat best equipped to take on the Republicans in 2008. "I know a thing or two about winning campaigns," she said. "When our party and our candidates are attacked, we have got to stand up and fight back. . . . I know how they think, how they act and how to defeat them."

The candidates agreed on expanding health care and reducing dependence on foreign oil, but at times, yesterday's event sounded like an echo of candidate forums in 2003-04, with Iraq still the dominant issue and the Democrats debating what to do next.

Dodd, the leadoff speaker, demanded that Democrats, who now control Congress, do more than pass a nonbinding resolution on Iraq that is soon to be up for debate.

DOJ_NMG_0127791

"Frankly, I am disappointed that we can't find a way to do more than send a meaningless message to the White House -- a White House, I would add, that has said it will ignore anything that we have to say about the war in Iraq," Dodd said. "The American people sent us a message this past November; the voters were clear. They want a change in the policy in Iraq."

Edwards, who made no reference to his initial support for the war while he was in the Senate, called for Democrats to block the troop buildup, quoting the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s words during the Vietnam War that "silence is betrayal." But he said the White House is counting on Democrats not to fight the new deployments.

"They don't think we have the backbone and courage to stand up to them," he said. "They don't think we are in this to stop the escalation of this war and to bring our men and women home from Iraq. They're counting on us to be weak, to be political and to be careful. This is not the time for political calculation."

Clinton defended efforts to pass a bipartisan, nonbinding resolution putting Congress on record in opposition to the president's new plan. To scattered antiwar protests, she said, "There are many people who wish we could do more, but let me say that if we can get a large, bipartisan vote to disapprove this president's plan for escalation, that will be the first time that we will have said no to President Bush and began to reverse his policies."

Obama, who called this week for combat troops to be out of Iraq by March 31, 2008, said criticism of the president alone is no longer a sufficient strategy for Democrats. "It was enough to run against George Bush during this past congressional election," he said. "It will not be enough now. . . . Every candidate for office in the next election should put forward in clear, unambiguous, uncertain terms exactly how they plan to get out of Iraq."

Clark, who has not set up a campaign committee, offered sharp criticism of the administration for "condoning torture, using rendition and these secrete detention camps, by creating a sense of callous disregard for the innocent lives lost in that conflict and by taking us to an unnecessary war in the first place."

Kucinich, who opposed the war, said Congress now should end it by cutting off funds. "Democrats have an obligation to reclaim Congress's constitutional power to end the war," he said.

Democratic Hopefuls Split Over The Best Path To Peace (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney, Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — To shouts and cheers from thousands of Democrats assembled here, the party's leading presidential contenders condemned President Bush's war in Iraq on Friday but sharply differed over how to end it — and particularly whether Democrats should settle for a nonbinding resolution expressing the Senate's opposition to Mr. Bush's war policies.

The debate played out before an electrified audience of Democratic National Committee members who are eagerly anticipating the presidential race of 2008, and clearly cheered by the last election results. But the event spotlighted divisions among three leading contenders for the party's nomination — Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards — over how the party should seek to end the war.

It was Mrs. Clinton, the Democratic senator from New York who voted for the war and has since turned against it, who drew the most attention. Talking over a handful of hecklers, she argued that a bipartisan resolution, supported by a large number of senators and soon to be debated on the Senate floor, was the most powerful way for Congress to begin the process of blocking Mr. Bush from moving ahead with his plan to send 21,000 more troops to Iraq.

To this audience of hard-core Democrats, which has been against the war since Howard Dean rocketed to fame at a similar meeting four years ago by denouncing Democratic supporters of Mr. Bush's Iraq policy, Mrs. Clinton offered her toughest language yet as she sought to distance herself from the war.

"I want to be very clear about this: If I had been president in October of 2002, I would not have started this war," Mrs. Clinton said, her voice echoing across the ballroom at the Washington Hilton as thousands of delegates watched her image on two flickering video screens that flanked her lectern.

"If we in Congress don't end this war before January of 2009, as president I will," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0127792

But Mrs. Clinton faced strong opposition from the left in the form of Mr. Edwards, a former senator from North Carolina, who said that his former colleagues should not support the nonbinding resolution next week and should instead vote for measures to cut off funds for the war.

"This is not the time for political calculation," said Mr. Edwards, who voted for the war in 2002 and renounced his vote before beginning his second bid for the presidency. "This is the time for political courage."

"They're counting on us to be weak, to be political and to be careful," he said of the White House.

Mr. Obama, a senator from Illinois, said earlier this week that he was likely to support the resolution, but he made no reference to it at the meeting with Democrats. Instead, drawing clear contrasts with Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Edwards, Mr. Obama noted that he had opposed the war from the start.

"I was opposed to this invasion — publicly, frequently, before it began," Mr. Obama said to waves of cheers and applause. "I thought it was a tragic mistake. But whether you were for it or against it then, we all have a responsibility now to put forth a plan that offers the best chance of ending the bloodshed and bringing the troops home."

Over Friday and Saturday, the Democratic National Committee will hear from 10 Democrats who are — or may be — running for president. The order of the candidates was decided by a draw. To the luck of committee members, the three candidates who have drawn the most interest all spoke Friday morning, providing a revealing palette of comparisons and drawing thousands of Democrats.

The other prospective candidates who spoke were Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut. Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio and Wesley Clark, the retired Army general.

The meeting had all the energy and pizazz of a political convention: candidates had supporters (some more than others), bumper stickers, placards. Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton took the stage to the flicker of camera flashes in the audience.

"Love you!" one woman shouted out to Mr. Obama.

"I love you back," he said, flashing a grin.

Mr. Obama, Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Edwards all drew a notably warm reception. None stirred the kind of wild response that Mr. Dean did in 2003, but, as several Democrats noted, the reaction from this crowd of party insiders may be one of the most imprecise ways of measuring who is most likely to win the Democratic presidential nomination.

Mr. Obama spent little time on Iraq, instead arguing that the biggest opponent candidates face this year is not one another but cynicism.

"It's a cynicism that asks us to believe that our opponents are never just wrong, that they're bad; that our motives in politics can never be pure, that they're only driven by power and by greed; that the challenges that we face today aren't just daunting, but they're impossible," he said. "And if this is true, then politics is not a noble calling, it's a game; it's a blood sport with folks keeping score about who's up and who's down."

Mr. Obama suggested that in this environment, people should not look to campaigns for dry lists of programs. "There are those who don't believe in talking about hope. They say, 'Well, we want specifics; we want details; we want white papers; we want plans.' We've had a lot of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope."

Mrs. Clinton, speaking over isolated shouts of "cut the funding," argued that the nonbinding resolution was the most effective way to counter Mr. Bush's attempt to send more troops to Iraq. She said that as of now, war opponents did not have enough votes to override a veto on legislation to cut funds or, as she and others have proposed, to cap the number of troops.

"There are many people who wish we could do more, but let me say that if we can get a large bipartisan vote to disapprove this president's plan for escalation, that will be the first time that we will have said no to President Bush and begin to reverse his policies," she said.

Mr. Edwards called the resolution meaningless.

"It is a betrayal not to stop this president's plan to escalate the war when we have the responsibility, the power and the ability to stop it," he said. "We cannot be satisfied with passing nonbinding resolutions that we know this president will ignore."

And Mr. Dodd echoed that position. "Frankly, I am disappointed that we can't find a way to do more than send a meaningless message to the White House," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127793

Edwards Continues Swipes At Senate White House Rivals (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, February 2, 2007

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards continued to move to the left of his leading presidential rivals Friday, saying Senate Democrats' efforts at passing a non-binding resolution are "not enough."

Saying repeatedly that "silence is betrayal," Edwards argued that Senate Democrats, two of whom spoke before and after him at the Democratic National Committee's Winter Meeting, are being too timid in engaging the White House on the Iraq War.

"They are counting on us to be weak, to be political, to be careful," Edwards said. "This is not the time for political calculation."

The Democratic vice presidential candidate of 2004 clearly targeted his main competitors, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), in his remarks. Befitting their frontrunner status, both received rousing receptions at the meeting Friday.

However, Clinton's speech was interrupted by anti-war protesters with the group Code Pink, who shouted at the former first lady to bring the troops home and get behind a binding resolution.

Clinton addressed their concerns to a point, but said though she wished she could do more, Democrats still don't have enough votes in the Senate, despite their new majority.

Clinton instead chose to focus on the past and the future of the increasingly unpopular war.

"If I had been president in October 2002, I would not have started this war," Clinton said. She later added, "If we in Congress don't end the war before January 2009, as president, I will."

Obama for the most part stayed away from the substantive points of disagreement on the war, saying only it should not have been started. He instead focused on a message of hope over cynicism and made a plea for thoughtful debate on the issues.

"It's going to be cynicism we're up against," Obama said, adding later, "The times we're in are too serious to let the cynics win this time."

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), the only sitting senator and White House candidate to speak Friday morning who declared he will not support a non-binding resolution, said he wanted Senate Democrats to go further than what is being proposed.

"A real bill with real teeth and real accountability is what is needed," Dodd said.

Dodd, who was joined by about 25 vocal supporters waving his campaign signs, asked the gathered committee members, guests and media not to overlook his campaign in the crowded field.

"I'm standing before you to ask you to give me a chance," Dodd said. "Give me a chance to be heard."

Retired Gen. Wesley Clark, the only potential 2008 candidate speaking who had not filed papers either to form an exploratory committee or declare an all-out bid, played coy after his speech, saying only, "I haven't said I won't."

The Winter Meeting is scheduled to continue Saturday morning when Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.), former Sen. Mike Gravel (D-Alaska), New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) and former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) will speak.

Hillary Vows To End War (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton said yesterday she would end the Iraq war as president if the conflict was still raging when she took office.

"If we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president, I will," the New York Democrat said at the Democratic National Committee Winter Meeting here.

Iraq and economic populism were by far the dominant issues among the half-dozen presidential contenders who sought their party leadership's support at the DNC meeting. Mrs. Clinton and her chief rivals repeatedly brought the overflow crowd at the Washington Hilton to its feet in cheering each denunciation of President Bush's war policies.

DOJ_NMG_0127794

After well-received speeches by Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who called for early troop withdrawal from a war they said never should have been waged, Mrs. Clinton was under pressure to stake out an equally strong policy position before the fiercely anti-war audience.

"I want to be very clear about this: If I had been president in October 2002, I would not have started this war," said the former first lady, who has been criticized by anti-war voices for voting to authorize the war and steadfastly refusing to support calls for a military pullout.

Mrs. Clinton has refused to say her vote for the war was a mistake and has proposed a cap on troop levels instead of troop reductions. A group of anti-war hecklers could be heard in the packed hall when she talked about her support for a Senate resolution opposing Mr. Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, a resolution some of her rivals have called weak and ineffective.

But she defended the nonbinding resolution being debated in the Senate.

"I understand there is frustration and outrage," Mrs. Clinton said, adding that "if we can pass a resolution disapproving of the troop escalation, that will be the first time we said no to President Bush." She also called for cutting funds for the Iraqi army if it does not achieve certain benchmarks.

Of the three top-tier candidates, Mr. Edwards drew the strongest responses for his emotional message of economic populism as he talked of poverty in America, "children who go to bed hungry" and do not have health care -- repeating the challenging refrain: "Will you stand up for them, will you stand up for America?"

He condemned the Senate resolution challenging the troop buildup in Iraq as meaningless, and in a pointed remark that some saw as a thinly veiled criticism of Democrats such as Mrs. Clinton, he said: "This is not a time for political calculation. This is a time for political courage. We have to stand up against George Bush's escalation of this war."

Denouncing those in the party who want to change its policies to broaden its appeal to more moderate voters, Mr. Edwards said, "We don't need to redefine the Democratic Party, we need to reclaim it."

Mr. Obama, who was received like a celebrity, also condemned the war, saying that the party's candidates had "a responsibility to put forward a plan to get us out of Iraq and [end] the bloodshed." He called for a phased withdrawal from Iraq in three to four months.

But much of his speech was a more muted, reflective critique of modern-day campaigning, which he said has turned politics "into a game, a blood sport" in which one's opponents "are not just wrong, but they are bad. This is not a game, this is not about digging up skeletons. This is not a contest for TV cameras. It's a contest for America," Mr. Obama said.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut also criticized the Democrats' compromise resolution on the war.

"Frankly, I'm disappointed," Mr. Dodd said. "It's time to get our troops out of the country and we're debating a nonbinding resolution. It's time to send a bill to the president with real teeth in it."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico and former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa are scheduled to address the DNC today.

'08 Dems Split On Iraq (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Newsday, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, facing a cascade of criticism from anti-war Democrats and party rivals, further distanced herself Friday from her pro-Iraq-war vote, vowing to end the conflict quickly if she's elected president.

Speaking at the Democrats' winter conclave with eight other presidential hopefuls, Clinton argued it would be politically impossible to defund President George W. Bush's plan to increase Iraq troop levels -- even as 2008 rival John Edwards decried her position a betrayal.

"If we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president I will," said Clinton, who supports a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops and a cap on forces at 140,000, approximately the number there now.

Addressing her October 2002 vote authorizing the invasion, Clinton said, "If I had been president in October of 2002, I would not have started the war."

DOJ_NMG_0127795

A majority of Americans supported the war at the time. About half the Democrats in the Senate bucked public opinion and voted against war, including current Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin (D-Michigan).

Clinton's statements didn't impress a handful of anti-war protesters who briefly interrupted her address to the Democratic National Committee. And Edwards, who has recanted his yes vote on the war and urges a quick withdrawal, demanded that the Democrat-controlled Senate force a confrontation with Bush.

"It is a betrayal not to stop the president's escalation when we have the responsibility, the power and the actual tools to prevent it," the former vice presidential candidate said in a direct challenge to Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who haven't supported efforts to defund the 21,500-troop escalation. "Being satisfied with nonbinding resolutions we know this president will ignore is a betrayal."

The typically sleepy DNC winter meeting took on the fervid atmosphere of an auto show three months after the party seized Congress, with no less than nine prospective presidential candidates rolling onto the stage like 2008 concept cars.

At times, Edwards and Obama seemed to play tag-team against Clinton, hinting that Clintonesque calculation and caution needed to be abandoned for a bolder, more sincere approach.

"Cynicism ... caused our politics to become small and timid, calculating and cautious," Obama said. "We spend all our time thinking about tactics and maneuvers."

Echoed Edwards: "This is not the time for political calculation, this is the time for political courage."

Clinton, who postponed this weekend's trip to New Hampshire, will travel to the state Feb. 10 to 11, in a campaign that already seems to be simmering a year before the first vote is cast.

"You know, sometimes you feel like you're part of a reality TV show," Obama quipped. "You feel like this is 'American Idol' or 'Survivor.' You're trying to figure out, are you going to go to Hollywood, are you going to be voted off the island?"

Iraq Plans Divide Democratic Hopefuls (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger, Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — The 2008 Democratic presidential candidates, who have been nearly unified in support of universal healthcare, abortion rights and alternative energy, have begun an increasingly harsh debate over an issue that will probably define the early part of the campaign: when to remove troops from Iraq.

Until recently, most Democratic presidential candidates, like the party generally, found success by bashing President Bush's Iraq strategy without offering comprehensive alternatives.

But this week, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), in a departure from his own past statements, introduced legislation that would begin a phased redeployment of troops by April and require that all combat troops leave Iraq by March 2008.

Obama's announcement set him at odds with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who has declined to specify a date for the removal of all troops from Iraq. Last week, Clinton proposed placing a cap on the number of U.S. troops and threatening Iraq's government with a withdrawal of support.

Clinton's approach, in turn, drew a caustic attack this week from Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) — a noteworthy development in a campaign that had been marked by collegiality. Biden said Clinton's proposed strategy for Iraq would "produce nothing but disaster."

Also coming in for Biden's scorn was former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), who six months ago offered a plan for withdrawal and became the favorite of many antiwar activists. Edwards called for an immediate reduction of 40,000 troops, with all forces to leave the country — though not the region — within 18 months.

"John Edwards wants you and all the Democrats to think, 'I want us out of there,' but when you come back and you say, 'OK, John, what about the chaos that will ensue? Do we have any interest, John, left in the region?,' well, John will have to answer yes or no," Biden said in an interview with the New York Observer. He added: "So all this stuff is like so much Fluffernutter out there."

The jockeying and jostling over Iraq in the primary campaign were displayed anew Friday as six candidates addressed an energized crowd at the Democratic National Committee's winter meeting in Washington. The candidates drew loud applause when they condemned the Bush administration's Iraq policy.

DOJ_NMG_0127796

But Clinton was interrupted by seven antiwar protesters as she spoke. She has neither repudiated her vote in favor of the war in 2002 nor backed proposals to cut off funding for the war.

Speaking over the hecklers, Clinton said: "If I had been president in October of 2002, I would not have started this war." Then she added, "If we in Congress do not end this war before January of 2009, as president I will."

But Clinton has been reluctant to specify how she would do that. She and most other Democrats have appeared more comfortable talking about their immediate opposition to Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq by 21,500.

The raucous forum Friday showed the candidates sharpening their differences over how to respond to the planned troop escalation, adding a new element to their differences over longer-term plans for Iraq and when forces should withdraw.

Clinton defended her decision to support a nonbinding bipartisan resolution opposing the troop escalation, which is expected to be debated in the Senate next week. She told the Democratic meeting that the resolution, if approved, would mark the first time Congress had taken a stand against the president over the war.

Others in the Democratic primary field said the Senate should pass something tougher.

"I am disappointed we can't find a way to do more than send a meaningless message to the White House," said Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.). "I don't believe spending a week debating a nonbinding resolution is the change that America voted for." Dodd has not advocated a specific withdrawal date but has called for drawing down forces in Iraq and cutting off funding for expansion of the war.

Edwards also criticized the nonbinding resolution as insufficient. Obama has not yet decided whether to support it.

Obama had previously opposed setting a date for withdrawing U.S. forces from Iraq. But as conditions deteriorated, he decided, with the advice of President Bill Clinton's former national security aide Anthony Lake, to propose his legislation this week setting a timetable for the complete withdrawal of combat troops under certain circumstances. On Friday, Obama pointedly called on all candidates to offer specifics about how they would end the war.

"It was enough to run against George Bush during this past congressional election; it will not be enough now," he said. "The American people are expecting more. They want to know what we are going to do."

Biden, who is to address the winter meeting today, has offered a multipart plan that calls for Iraq to become federated states. The states would share oil revenue, but the country effectively would be divided into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish enclaves.

Once the plan was implemented, Biden says, he would hope to get most U.S. troops out of the country in 18 months.

He, like many candidates, also calls for trying to settle the sectarian differences in Iraq by engaging Iraq's neighbors, as well as major world powers.

Like Clinton, Dodd and Edwards, Biden voted for the 2002 resolution authorizing the war but has long criticized the administration's conduct of the conflict.

Democratic presidential hopefuls Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio and former Sen. Mike Gravel of Alaska have long opposed the war. Both advocate an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces.

Two Democratic governors seeking the presidency, Bill Richardson of New Mexico and Tom Vilsack of Iowa, also oppose the war.

Richardson, who supported the war's goals initially, has called for a phased withdrawal.

Vilsack says troops should be removed from much of the country, but he advocates leaving some forces along the Iranian border.

Clinton Promises To End War If Elected (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton said Friday she would not have attacked Iraq if she were president in 2002 and would end the war if elected, as she tried to blunt rivals like John Edwards who are stoking anti-war passions in the Democratic Party.

Clinton, raising her voice at one point to be heard above anti-war hecklers, suggested that calls from Edwards and others to cut off funding for President Bush's troop increase are unlikely to win approval in a narrowly divided Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0127797

"Believe me, I understand the frustration and the outrage," Clinton said in a speech to the Democratic National Committee meeting that brought the party's nine White House hopefuls together for the first time. "You have to have 60 votes to cap troops, to limit funding to do anything. If we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president, I will."

The New York senator's comments were her strongest against the war and signal an effort to confront one of the biggest threats to her front-runner status. As the conflict nears the four-year mark, she has been on the opposite side of the most outspoken anti-war activists who are a force in the Democratic primaries.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois reminded the party's rank-and-file - twice - that he was against the Iraq invasion from the beginning.

"But whether you were for it or against it then, we all have a responsibility now to put forth a plan that offers the best chance of ending the bloodshed and bringing the troops home," Obama told the audience.

Edwards voted with Clinton in 2002 to authorize Bush's war against Iraq, a vote he defended during his 2004 presidential race but has since said was a mistake. The former North Carolina senator has gone from being a war apologist to one of the most outspoken critics of the invasion in this campaign.

"Silence is a betrayal," Edwards said, one of 11 times he used the word betrayal in his 18-minute speech. "It is a betrayal not to stop this president's plan to escalate the war when we have the responsibility, the power and the ability to stop it. We cannot be satisfied with passing nonbinding resolutions that we know this president will ignore."

Edwards was referring to a measure being debated in the Senate that would say lawmakers disagree with the president's decision to increase troop levels in an effort to stabilize Baghdad. Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, another 2008 candidate, also criticized the effort as meaningless.

"I don't believe spending a week debating a nonbinding resolution is the change that America voted for" in November when Democrats won a majority in Congress, Dodd said. "With all due respect, a real bill and real teeth and real accountability is what is needed in our country again."

Clinton said while the resolution may not be perfect, it represents the first time Congress has stood against the president on the war.

"There are many people who wish we could do more," Clinton said.

"You can!" came a call from a small gathering of activists from the peace group Code Pink. Others in their group standing along a side wall chimed in, calling for a binding resolution that would end the war immediately, while some nearby audience members asked them to quiet down.

"But let me say," Clinton said, her voice rising above the din, "that if we can get a large, bipartisan vote to disapprove this president's plan for escalation, that will be the first time that we will have said no to President Bush and began to reverse his policies. Now, I want to go further."

"Bring them home, then," said a man dressed in desert camouflage that said "Iraq Veterans Against the War." Clinton said she has proposed capping U.S. troop levels and pulling funding for Iraqi forces, but won't cut funding for U.S. troops while they are on the battlefield.

"And let me add one other thing, and I want to be very clear about this," she said. "If I had been president in October of 2002, I would not have started this war."

Former Gen. Wesley Clark, who has not indicated whether he will run, said he's the only potential candidate with the battlefield experience to succeed in Iraq.

Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich called for an immediate end to the war - the same message he ran on in 2004. But it's now is being echoed by several other candidates in a stronger position to win the nomination.

Democratic 2008 Hopefuls Put On A Show (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

Barack Obama best encapsulated what the Democratic party's increasingly feverish presidential nomination contest is becoming.

DOJ_NMG_0127798

"I sometimes feel you are part of a reality TV show – like American Idol or Survivor," the African-American senator from Illinois told a packed gathering of spell-bound Democratic activists in Washington on Friday.

"You wonder: are you going to be the first person to be voted off the island?"

Judging by the rock star reception he was accorded at the beauty contest of Democratic 2008 hopefuls, Mr Obama will keep the viewer ratings high until the very last moment.

With almost two years to go before George W. Bush's successor is chosen by the US electorate, media scrutiny of the nine Democratic party aspirants already resembles the final stretch. The Democratic National Committee gave each a chance to present their wares to the nation.

Following detailed ground rules more redolent of the televised presidential debates that take place in the two months before election day, candidates were permitted a maximum 100 banners each in the conference hall, they could speak for seven minutes only and introductions were limited to one minute. At times the enthusiasm was deafening.

Each candidate sought to underline the need to face up to what they presented as the epoch-moving challenges before the US of tackling global warming, providing universal health insurance to all Americans and ending the war in Iraq.

Hillary Clinton who, alone among the candidates, has not formally renounced her 2002 vote authorising Mr Bush to go to war, was periodically interrupted by anti-war hecklers.

But the former first lady, who leads Mr Obama by more than 20 points in most polls, went further on Iraq than she had gone before: "If I had been president in October 2002 I would not have started this war," she said.

"If we do not in Congress end this war by January 2009 [when the next president is inaugurated], then I will."

In spite of the long distance before the party primaries are held next January and February, it was clear that centre-left issues would dominate the nomination contest – Iraq, the economic anxieties of the middle class, the "haemorrhaging" of manufacturing jobs to China and elsewhere, healthcare and climate change.

One of the loudest cheers came when John Edwards, who ranks third in the polls behind Mr Obama and Mrs Clinton, said that it was "time to stand with the men and women of organised labour".

Mrs Clinton also drew cheers when she said the Bush administration's growing trade deficit had turned China into America's creditor: "How do you get tough on your banker?" she asked. "It is time to start standing up for the American worker."

By far the most emphatic ovations came in response to Mr Obama's at times electrifying oratory in which he called for an end to cynicism in politics and insisted that this presidential contest should not be a "blood sport". But to judge by the mood of the parade and the state of national opinion polls, the increasingly hated war in Iraq will dominate the campaign over the next 12 months.

"This is not a game – this is not a contest for the TV cameras: it is a serious moment in America and the American people are in a sober mood," he said. "We have 130,000 young Americans fighting a war halfway round the world in Iraq that should never have been waged. We don't have time to be cynical."

Democrats Control The Hill, But Not Themselves (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Yesterday was the first cattle call of the Democratic presidential campaign and -- holy cow! -- these candidates can moo.

"Each candidate has been given seven minutes to speak," announced Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean before the first of six Democratic candidates took the stage at the Hilton Washington. He further announced that an "official timekeeper" will hold up warning and "time's up" signs. "After 10 minutes, wild gesticulations will take place," he threatened.

This quaint exercise in Democratic Party discipline lasted about, well, seven minutes. The first candidate, Sen. Chris Dodd (Conn.), took the floor for 20 minutes and 15 seconds, ignoring Dean's hovering, the removal of Dodd's image from the projection screens, and the fact that he drew applause for saying "Let me conclude." Former senator John Edwards (17:40) wasn't far behind, trailed by Sens. Hillary Clinton (16:12) and Barack Obama (15:30).

DOJ_NMG_0127799

The closest to the limit was Rep. Dennis Kucinich (12:38), but this was probably because the audience treated his appearance as a chance to start conversations or to visit the restrooms. "Can you hear me in the back?" Kucinich called above the din. "Because I can hear you."

Now in control of Congress, Democrats were eager to demonstrate that they could make the trains run on time yesterday. They started the proceedings with an ROTC color guard. And Dean sternly read out the ground rules. "Each candidate was given the opportunity to play 30 seconds of music and can have up to 100 campaign signs evenly placed around the room."

But the Democratic National Committee is not exactly a precision drill team. The first speaker, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, wasn't ready when his time came to speak. Clinton, for her part, showed flagrant disregard for Dean's sign restrictions; her supporters hoisted about 300. And although most candidates chose the usual favorites for their theme music ("Our Country," "America the Beautiful"), Dodd went with the Temptations:

If you want to play hide and seek with love let me remind you (It's all right)

The lovin' you're gonna miss in the time it takes to find you. (It's outta sight)

But even in the confusion, the candidates found ways to establish a pecking order. Obama, rock star of the pack, got nearly a minute and a half of applause, leaving Edwards in the dust with just 30 seconds. Kucinich, who unintentionally drew laughter when he referred to 2009 and "my inauguration as president," used his brief moments on the stage to mention his third wife, Elizabeth -- seven times.

Reid, though not technically under the seven-minute rule, opened the proceedings with a poor example. After a 10-minute speech, Reid said "Thank you very much" and earned a lengthy standing ovation. But to the surprise of many in the hall, Reid remained at the lectern. "I want to talk a little bit about the West," he announced, rambling on for eight more minutes.

Four years ago at another DNC winter meeting, Dean's presidential ambitions soared with his famous claim to represent the "Democratic wing of the Democratic Party." Yesterday, the remarks were more lengthy than lofty.

Dodd, in his Phil Donohue hairdo, opened by noting that "sometimes, the introductions go on longer than my remarks." Not this time. He went on about Bill Clinton, Franklin Roosevelt and his 2-year-old daughter. At 10 minutes, he offered what could have been a rousing finale: "We're not going to take fear for an answer any longer in America."

During the applause, Dean stood up and attempted to reclaim the microphone. But Dodd wouldn't budge. As the timekeeper raised the red "TIME" sign repeatedly over the next 10 minutes, Dodd quickened his pace and added phrases such as "Let me also add here quickly."

Obama, next up, was already two minutes over his time when he proclaimed, "We don't have time to be cynical." By 13 minutes, he seemed to have tired himself out, for he announced that candidates should put forward their Iraq plans in "clear, unambiguous, uncertain terms."

Retired Gen. Wes Clark, who turned in a respectable time of 13:35, gave the impression that somebody had told him he had been insufficiently emotional. "It feels great," he announced. Also: "I feel that pain." And: "Makes me sad. But also, I get impassioned. To be honest with you, I get a little bit angry." And, finally: "We must also be strong."

Edwards must have thought he said "long." Two minutes over his time limit, Edwards stated his already-obvious view that "silence is betrayal." Four minutes over time, Edwards announced that "we cannot walk away" -- then remained planted for several more minutes.

After the Kucinich intermission, Clinton greeted the crowd with an announcement: "I'm here to start a conversation with our country." A couple of audience members took that offer seriously, and, eight minutes into Clinton's speech, began heckling her about Iraq. This made Clinton's speech louder, not shorter. "I've been fighting for more than 35 years," she said after talking for more than 13 minutes.

The timekeeper stood up and raised the red sign. Dean rose from his chair and stood at Clinton's shoulder. The candidate, having used 230 percent of her allotted time, surrendered the microphone.

DNC Backing Expected For D.C. Vote In House (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127800

The Democratic National Committee is expected to throw its support today behind legislation to give the District a full seat in the House of Representatives, kicking off a grass-roots lobbying effort to get it passed.

A resolution in favor of the bill will be considered today at the group's winter meeting in Washington. It has the backing of party leaders, including DNC Chairman Howard Dean.

Donna Brazile, who authored the resolution and ran Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign, said the DNC's action "will allow us to begin a 50-state campaign" in which party supporters urge their legislators to vote for the bill.

The D.C. voting rights bill, reintroduced last month, has sparked hopes among city activists and politicians that the District could get a full seat in the House after decades of seeking more representation. The measure would permanently add two seats to the House -- one for the District, which is heavily Democratic, and the other for Utah, a Republican stronghold. The District would still not have voting senators.

The District's congressional delegate, Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), can vote only in committees and on amendments to legislation. She co-sponsored the bill with Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who has been trying to line up Republican support.

Norton met Thursday with Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and other House leaders, who are grappling with Democrats' concerns about the bill. Some are concerned that the measure awards Utah an extra electoral college vote and leaves the District's electoral votes unchanged.

Party members also worry that Utah's only Democratic congressman, Rep. Jim Matheson, could be hurt politically if the state's districts are redrawn to add an extra seat. There is no set timetable for hearings on the bill.

Democrats have long supported the principle of D.C. voting rights. "What's different now is the DNC is endorsing a specific resolution of that question," said Ilir Zherka, executive director of advocacy group D.C. Vote.

Brazile, the chairwoman of the DNC Voting Rights Institute and a former Norton chief of staff, said she hoped that after the resolution passed, Dean would write to every member of Congress urging them to back the legislation.

In addition, she said, the party could "utilize not just their enormous mailing list, but their ability to help galvanize Democrats" at a grass-roots level, working with groups such as MoveOn.org.

Norman J. Ornstein, a political expert at the American Enterprise Institute, said it was unclear how effective a grass-roots campaign for the legislation would be.

"MoveOn.org is going to be, first, consumed by the war, and after that, probably by the presidential campaign," he said.

But, he added, Brazile's involvement was significant. "She's got credibility out there," he said.

Asked to comment, MoveOn.org official Noah Winer said the group "fully supports full voting representation in Congress for D.C. and what Donna Brazile is doing."

Although Democrats control both houses of Congress, the bill's passage is far from assured. It would need 60 votes to avoid a filibuster in the Senate. Republicans have been divided over the measure, with some saying that a full seat for the District would be unconstitutional.

Norton has been pressing to get the bill to the House floor by next month. Democratic congressional staffs are examining ways to fine-tune it before sending it to the Judiciary and Government Reform committees.

House leadership is leaning toward a change in the legislation to make the potential new Utah seat at-large, in order to protect Matheson, according to a Democratic aide close to the discussions. Leaders also are weighing the possibility of adding the House seats next year, to avoid special elections.

Utah has been seeking an extra seat since the 2000 Census, when it fell just short of the numbers needed to expand its delegation. State lawmakers argued that thousands of Utah's Mormon missionaries working abroad should have been counted.

Sen. Clinton To Visit New Hampshire Next Week (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 3, 2007

MANCHESTER – Presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton will visit the state in a week, after cancelling an appearance this weekend due to a death in the family.

DOJ_NMG_0127801

The announcement of a Granite State visit comes as a new poll showed Clinton remains very much in the good graces of the state's likely Democratic Presidential primary voters.

Clinton will be in the state Feb. 9 and 10 to "begin her conversation with New Hampshire residents," her Presidential exploratory committee announced.

Details of the visit were not released.

The survey this week by the Manchester-based American Research Group shows that the New York senator and former first lady widened her lead over Illinois Sen. Barack Obama in the first-in-the-nation primary state by 14 percentage points in the past month.

The same poll found Republican Arizona Sen. John McCain slightly widening the lead he had last month over Rudolph Giuliani, but it also found former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney now tied with the former New York mayor and within striking distance of McCain.

The primary campaign is quickly gearing up, but the election is many months off and Granite State voters are just beginning to take a good look.

"I fully expect these numbers to move around a lot as the year goes on," said American Research Group president Dick Bennett. But here is how the races set up:

Among Democrats, Clinton leads Obama, 39 to 19 percent, with former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards at 13 percent. No other candidate received more than 2 percent, and 21 percent of likely Democratic primary voters were undecided.

Among Republicans, McCain receives support from 27 percent of likely GOP primary voters, followed by Romney and Giuliani at 20 percent each, and former House speaker Newt Gingrich at 11 percent. No other candidate drew more than 1 percent, while 21 percent of likely Republican primary voters were undecided.

Pollster Dick Bennett said his firm surveyed 600 likely voters in each party primary between Jan. 31 and Feb. 1. The margin of error is 4 percent.

In ARG's late December poll, Clinton drew 27 percent; Obama, 21 percent; and Edwards 18 percent, while McCain received 29 percent compared to 25 percent for Giuliani - a statistical dead heat - and 9 percent for Romney.

Since the December poll, top-tier candidates Romney, Giuliani, Clinton, Obama and Edwards filed Presidential exploratory committees. McCain had filed a committee in November.

Clinton has received heavy national and New Hampshire-based media attention since she announced, "I'm in."

She cancelled this weekend's visit in order to attend the funeral of her father-in-law, Dick Kelley.

Bennett said Clinton's chief strength is women voters, who, he said, made up 57 percent of the likely Democratic primary voter sample in the random survey. He said Clinton was backed by 43 percent of the women and 33 percent of the men in the sample. Obama was supported by 15 percent of the men and 24 percent of the women polled, while Edwards was supported by 15 percent of the women and 11 percent of the men in the sample.

Bennett said 68 percent of the likely Democratic primary voters said they were registered as Democrats, while 32 percent said they were registered independents. Clinton was supported by 39 percent of the Democrats and 39 percent of the independents, while Obama was supported by 23 percent of the Democrats and 12 percent of the independents. Edwards received support from 13 percent of the Democrats and 11 percent of the independents.

Bennett said Clinton has helped herself by leaving no question that she is a candidate when she filed her exploratory committee, while Giuliani has been less certain.

"Giuliani says he is unsure, yet, and gives what voters view as an obtuse answer to the question of whether he is in," Bennett said. "That hurts him because you have McCain and Romney, who are both clear that they are in."

Bennett said Giuliani had "a perfect opportunity in front of the perfect audience" of Republican State Committee members last weekend to say with certainty that he will be a candidate.

"He didn't pull the trigger and that hurt him. People want their President to be definitive," Bennett said. "His numbers among Republicans will probably improve if and when he announces."

McCain, meanwhile, has lost much support from independents since last spring, Bennett's poll indicates.

Bennett said the drop is probably due to McCain's support of the Bush administration's position on the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0127802

Bennett said his April 2006 poll showed that 54 percent of likely New Hampshire Republican primary voters backed McCain. By December, 29 percent of independent votes backed him, and now, 25 percent support him.

Giuliani is supported by 24 percent of independent Republican primary voters in the new poll, while Romney is backed by 17 percent.

Among Republican primary voters who say they are registered Republicans, McCain received 28 percent, Romney received 21 percent, Giuliani is at 18 percent and Gingrich is at 14 percent.

Another New Hampshire poll released earlier this week showed Giuliani and McCain tied and Clinton with a substantial lead. The SurveyUSA poll, completed for WBZ-TV in Boston, was taken Jan. 26-28.

Among 582 self-identified likely Democratic primary voters, Clinton led Obama 40 to 25 percent, with Edwards at 23 percent. Among 412 likely Republican primary voters, Giuliani received 33 percent, McCain, 32 percent, and Romney, 21 percent.

What Hillary's Humor Reveals (LAT)

By Meghan Daum

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

THIS WEEK, Hillary Clinton tried out a joke in Iowa. "We face a lot of evil men," she told voters in Davenport. "People like Osama bin Laden come to mind. And what in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?" Clinton then smiled big and chortled, cueing the audience that this was not an oral presentation in a women's studies class but, indeed, a joke.

Questioned later by reporters, who weren't sure if they got it, Clinton said: "You guys keep telling me, 'Lighten up! Be funny!' I get a little funny and now I'm being psychoanalyzed."

The clip made the expected blogospheric rounds and wound up on "The Daily Show," but I think the only psychoanalysis this incident warrants is an examination of just why Clinton's search for a sense of humor has been tougher than locating a lost contact lens in the Dead Sea.

Surely it shouldn't be this hard. Just about every profile ever written about her has quoted friends and colleagues who point out her sense of humor, frequently prefaced with the word "wicked." Where's all that cutting hilarity when the world is telling her to "lighten up?"

It's possible, I suppose, that Clinton's friends' taste in humor is such that coy jabs at her husband (or could it be Newt? Or Kenneth Starr? Or President Bush himself?) passes for biting wit. But it's more likely that her flat footedness is a symptom of a double standard that rarely comes up in conversations about the challenges faced by powerful women. If there's anything that can hinder a woman's credibility faster than becoming visibly pregnant or getting caught watching Lifetime, it's revealing the ability to be genuinely funny.

Of course, in politics, men have never exactly given Oscar Wilde a run for his money either. Considering that, in 1996, Bob Dole was the wryest guy on the national campaign trail since, well, all the other times he ran for president or vice president, we should know better than to expect constant knee-slappers from these folks, at least intentional ones. But Clinton's problems have been thrown into high relief because her chief competitor for the Democratic presidential nomination, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, appears to be as charismatic as she is stiff.

Obama has yet to let his handlers drive him into poll-driven blandness; so far, he looks like a natural. And although we don't know whether he has the chops to sell himself as president, his body language suggests that he's not working quite as hard as Clinton is. Stoop-shouldered and never quite sure what to do with his hands, Obama resembles the goofy math geek whom the girls had secret crushes on in high school because he made them laugh.

Clinton, hyper-focused wonk that she is, has a personality that has long appeared to be the product of focus groups and advisors from the Professor Henry Higgins Finishing School for Formerly Radical Broads. She has been so ravaged by the media, the public and, it would seem, her own perfectionism that she comes across less as a human being than as a historical figure whose legacy depends on keeping her humanity out of the equation.

DOJ_NMG_0127803

It's possible she's right about that. But the fact that we're seeing a black candidate who seems infinitely more relaxed with himself than his female competitor speaks volumes about just how much we're likely to punish women who step outside the bounds of corporate-flavored gravitas.

Part of this is Clinton's own fault — the very act of saying "you keep telling me to be funny" is depressing evidence of her burdensome self-consciousness. But then again, female humor is easily bent into the worst cliches about women. Funny men, after all, are considered smart, confident and sexy. But wisecracking chicks risk accusations of bitterness, hormonal instability and the assumption (no matter what they look like) that they're using wit to compensate for physical unattractiveness.

As a result, a lot of ambitious women have been conditioned not only to tone the comedy down (remember the old dating adage, "Laugh at his jokes, but don't be funnier than him"?) but to resist witty self-deprecation, a genre that some old-school feminists were too tin-eared to interpret as anything other than a sign of low self-esteem. What's left is stridency, earnestness and painstakingly rehearsed jokes ripe for reducing to male-bashing sound bites. The effect: the Cathy comic strip character with a campaign bus. Ouch.

Is Clinton funny deep down? I'm willing to bet she is, only because I doubt she could have survived the last 15 years without either a sense of humor or a serious Quaalude habit. But I'd also bet most of us will never see it, no matter how hard she tries. Even if she learns how to tell a joke, the colluding forces of media savagery, Washington banality and a culture in which female power is not yet entirely compatible with having a real personality will render her something less than human. Will it cost her the nomination? Who knows. But it's already cost her much more than that.

Mobilized Online, Thousands Gather To Hear Obama (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

At his first rally since announcing his presidential exploratory committee, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) appealed yesterday for support from the young people who had mobilized for the event online.

The gathering of several thousand students at George Mason University in Fairfax underscored the potential power of online communities in the 2008 campaign. Its genesis was a group created last summer on Facebook.com, a Web site frequented by college students who post profiles and assemble virtually.

Barack Obama for President in 2008 now has more than 50,000 members, and its founders have created an offline presidential draft committee, Students for Barack Obama.

"This is a remarkable achievement, a remarkable event that speaks to what young people can do when they put their minds together," said Obama, who is scheduled to officially announce his candidacy next Saturday in Springfield, Ill.

"No one is more cynical about politics than young people," he said, adding that they would not tolerate "a politics that's all about slash and burn, nastiness and negative ads, and name-calling and gridlock."

"One thing that's been incredibly clear throughout this whole process is his commitment and dedication to students and all the young people of America. He sees our generation as a critical part of his campaign," said Meredith Seagal, a junior at Bowdoin College in Maine and executive director of the draft committee.

Another Facebook group, Barack Obama (One Million Strong for Barack), was started less than three weeks ago and has already recruited 200,000 members. "When you go on Facebook, as you always do, sign up," Farouk Olu Aregbe, who founded that group, told the crowd yesterday.

Jonathan Hicks, 19, a sophomore at American University, said he learned about the event through the Facebook group. "The majority of people to my knowledge found out through Facebook," he said. "Technology is changing. Politicians need to use it more, and more often, if they want to reach the youth of America today."

In his 25-minute speech, Obama promised that a better kind of politics -- led by young people -- is possible.

"You guys don't have much of a memory of the possibility of a politics that transcends and brings people together," he said. "[At] each and every juncture of our history, somebody has been audacious enough to say, 'We could do better.' . . . And more often than not, it's young people who've done it."

For Obama, No News Is Good News (POL)

DOJ_NMG_0127804

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 2, 2007

Senator Clinton's opening slogan was, "Let the conversation begin." Senator Obama just wanted the conversation to end.

The Democratic presidential hopefuls are making appearances in Washington on Friday at the Democratic National Committee's Winter Meeting. I stopped by the hotel where they are congregating to catch a Thursday night preview with Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who is officially announcing his candidacy this week.

But it turns out that Obama, riding an astonishing wave of glowing publicity for a candidate 21 months from an election, already has a bubble around him that is tighter than the one that surrounded Texas Gov. George W. Bush, who spent long hours of the fledgling days of his candidacy in bull sessions with reporters.

A flier for DNC members said, "Senator Barack Obama Cordially invites you to an Evening Reception." It was held in a medium-sized reception room. Cocktails, sold by the hotel, were $6.75 and domestic beer was a buck less. "Space is limited, therefore this event is for DNC Members ONLY," the flier said. "Members can bring one guest to the event." The room was jammed and a line snaked onto the promenade as Obama workers checked their lists like it was a nightclub.

Reporters were barred – a somewhat unusual, although not unheard of, policy for a meet-and-greet-type event in a public place like a hotel. The White House, which keeps fairly strict control of the press, typically allows reporters into large receptions in a hotel, at least while President Bush is speaking, although it closes fund-raisers at residences. The Senator came, and an aide said he was "mostly just going to speak his mind." That included a closing line that got a good laugh from the supportive crowd.

As Obama left the hotel reception, smiling and saying, "Thank you AGAIN," I introduced myself and said, "Good evening, Senator, may I walk with you?" He replied, "You can walk with me. That doesn't mean you can ask questions." I chuckled, thinking he was kidding. "But you can certainly walk with me," he added. The Senator then underscored, "I'm sorry. I'm not answering questions."

The encounter pointed to some of the unusual dynamics of the '08, where several of the candidates – including Obama – are celebrities who have to manage the attention being thrust on them, rather than the more usual situation where a hopeful is desperate to gin up coverage.

Hillary Clinton, eager to overcome concerns about electability, has taken the opposite tack and is showcasing the warm and humorous side her aides have always insisted they see, conducting town halls and Web chats and holding availability with reporters after a recent appearance in Iowa.

Obama, whose hurdles include questions about the substance that will accompany the appealing persona, is taking no chances. Wanting to assure him I wasn't going to ask him a hardball question, I said after his aides had cut off his greetings and photos with DNC fans, "Senator, I was just hoping to ask what you want to accomplish this weekend." He replied: "It wouldn't be fair to everybody else. We didn't do a press avail for everybody else. Absolutely no questions this evening."

Even President Bush, who brings discipline to his interactions with the reporters, will have an on-the-fly, unscripted conversation without calling it a "press avail." So as Hillary tries to pierce her bubble, however tentatively, Obama appears to be building one.

An aide disputed that, saying that the Senator's purpose was to meet DNC members. "I don't think he's getting into any bubbles since he walks among reporters all the time and takes questions," the aide added.

On Friday morning, with a script, Obama showed why he is known as such a riveting speaker, wowing a crowd of 900 with a 16-minute address calling for the nation "to find the will to pass health care for all by the end of the first term of the very next president of the United States." He went on: "We don't want another election where voters are simply holding their noses and feel like they're choosing from the lesser of two evils." That drew applause, and he said the candidates' real fight is not against each other but against "the cynicism that has become so pervasive."

"We have always been at our best in this country when we aim high," he said. "This is our time."

Several of the candidates, including Obama, announced their exploratory committees in the totally controlled forum of a Web video. In his remarks Friday, the senator referred to the glitzy nature of politics today. "You know, as you look at all the cameras gathered around and the click of the photographers, and the pundits – " Obama was interrupted by a shriek of "I love you," and ad-libbed, "I love you back." Then he continued: "Sometimes you feel like you're part of a reality TV show. You feel like this is 'American Idol,' or 'Survivor.' You're trying to figure out if you're going to go to Hollywood, or you're going to be voted off the island. But that's not why I'm here. That's not why YOU'RE here. The decisions that have been made by this president and the challenges that have been ignored over the last six years have brought this country to a sobering place. … It's not a game. It's not a contest, with the TV cameras. It's a serious moment for America."

DOJ_NMG_0127805

The winter meeting is a chance for the candidates to mingle with activists and sign up high-powered volunteers right at the starting gate. One attendee said Democrats were "kicking the tires." One top strategist pointed out: "It's like when you're playing golf. You can't win on the first hole, but you sure can get off to a bad start."

It's an opportunity to buy a Hillary travel mug, a donkey cookie cutter, a Gore 2008 button or a bumper sticker asking, "Who's Going to Clean Up After the Elephants?" The New York delegation held a closed-door "Hillary Ambassadors" meeting, and Sen. Joseph Biden's campaign gave out free red, white and blue bumper stickers saying, "Biden President '08."

Ten Democratic hopefuls are scheduled to speak to the three-day meeting, which has the theme, "Strong Leadership for America's Future." Later, they're holding meet-the-candidate receptions. Retired Army Gen. Wes Clark got a jump on the competition by working the halls briefly on Thursday night, then leaving rapidly. Organizers of the Nevada Democratic Caucus – one of the first nominating events, to be held Jan. 19, 2008 – drew an overflow crowd with a "Winning the West" reception featuring nachos and fajitas. They gave out information kits with "Fast Facts on Nevada" ("Important: Nevada is pronounced "Nev-Atta"), with "Clark County Hot Spots" that include houses of hash, coffee and bagels, but no casinos.

Obama, whose optimistic message seems to answer the yearning for bipartisanship that voters expressed at the polls in November, revealed this week that he will make his official announcement about a Presidential campaign at the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Ill., on Feb. 10.

Democratic sources say Obama's strategists decided not to engage in the "home run derby" that the DNC Winter Meeting has become in recent years. They see the meeting as an important introductory conversation with members he hasn't met, and an opportunity to reacquaint with members he has. They promised a show of energy when he appears at a "Yes We Can!" rally that Students for Barack Obama is holding in the Johnson Center Atrium at the hoops Cinderella school George Mason University in Fairfax, Va.

Joe Biden Courts Al Sharpton (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, February 2, 2007

"I thought you were drowning in giving me flattery," Al Sharpton told Joe Biden when the Senator paused for breath at the end of his appearance on Sharpton's radio show yesterday.

The conversation began with Biden telling Sharpton, "You're one of the most articulate people in the country," and got friendlier from there.

There was, though, one second when Biden picked a word wrong, and you sort of saw him teeter on the brink of a new flap:

"I didn't know anybody tougher or straighter than Shirley Chisholm."

Straighter, as in "clean as a whistle," of course.

Romney Says Sen. Clinton "Timid" On Iran (AP)

By Alex Dominguez

AP, February 2, 2007

BALTIMORE (AP) - Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney on Friday accused Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of "timidity" regarding the security threat posed by Iran.

In a speech to a retreat of conservative congressional Republicans, Romney lashed out at Clinton for telling a pro-Israel dinner that a dialogue with countries hostile to Israel - including Iran and Syria - is needed to promote peace in the Middle East.

"At this point, We don't need a listening tour about Iran," Romney told the Republican Study Committee. "Someone who wants to engage Iran displays a troubling timidity toward a terrible threat of a nuclear Iran."

In a speech Thursday night at a Manhattan dinner held by the nation's largest pro-Israel lobbying group, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, Clinton called Iran a danger to the U.S. and one of Israel's greatest threats.

DOJ_NMG_0127806

But the New York senator also said, "We need to use every tool at our disposal, including diplomatic and economic in addition to the threat and use of military force" when dealing with Iran.

"I have advocated engagement with our enemies and Israel's enemies," Clinton said. "I believe we can gain valuable knowledge and leverage from being part of a process again that enables us to get a better idea of how to take on and defeat our adversaries.

"U.S. policy must be clear and unequivocal: We cannot, we should not, we must not permit Iran to build or acquire nuclear weapons," Clinton told the audience. "In dealing with this threat ... no option can be taken off the table."

Responding to Romney's criticism, Clinton spokesman Mo Elleithee said Friday: "Senator Clinton believes that no option should be taken off the table when it comes to preventing Iran from developing nuclear weapons. Given his record of flip flops, the only thing that's timid are Governor Romney's convictions."

Romney, who served one term as Massachusetts governor, said that rather than engagement, economic and diplomatic isolation should be the priority.

Last year, when former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami visited Harvard University, Romney criticized the visit and ordered state agencies not to cooperate if asked for assistance.

On Thursday, some 1,700 attendees applauded as Clinton cited her efforts on behalf of the Jewish state and spoke scathingly of Iran's decision to hold a conference last month that questioned whether the Holocaust took place.

"To deny the Holocaust places Iran's leadership in company with the most despicable bigots and historical revisionists," Clinton said, criticizing what she called the Iranian administration's "pro-terrorist, anti-American, anti-Israeli rhetoric."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly called the Holocaust a "myth" and said Israel should be "wiped off the map" and its Jews returned to Europe.

Iran insists its nuclear program is designed to produce energy, not weapons. Ahmadinejad said Thursday that his government is determined to continue with its nuclear program, despite U.N. Security Council sanctions imposed over its refusal to halt uranium enrichment, a process that can produce fuel to generate electricity or for the fissile core of an atomic bomb.

Romney Attacks Hillary Over Iran (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, February 2, 2007

BALTIMORE - Speaking to GOP lawmakers Friday, Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney criticized recent comments made by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) regarding Iran.

The frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination said during a speech at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee Thursday night that she "needs to understand Iran" and wanted to engage in conversations about the region.

Romney, in remarks to the Republican Study Committee, said if Clinton needs to "understand Iran, [she] hasn't been paying attention."

The former Massachusetts governor expressed his concern over a nuclear Iran and detailed a "five-point plan" for dealing with the country.

The plan includes imposing tough sanctions, effecting diplomatic isolation and helping the people of Iran "understand that nuclear technology is a source of peril, not a source of pride." He expressed the need to cultivate and empower moderate Muslim countries in the Middle East, especially those that surround Israel, in order to further discourage extremism.

Romney also described a "circle of suspects" - a list of countries that make fissile material in the region. These countries should also be monitored, he said, so that they do not become safe havens for religious extremists.

Romney Explains Shifts (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, February 2, 2007

BALTIMORE – Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney laid out his conservative credentials, explained his shift on social issues and took a few shots at two potential opponents Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0127807

Appearing before the conservative Republican Study Committee, Romney stuck to his usual explanation for his change of heart, but presented himself not as a convert but as a student who had received an education on key social issues.

The one-term governor said his time on Beacon Hill had "confirmed some principles and educated me on some principles." Romney told about 50 members of the GOP group that he ran as a fiscal conservative, but "learned some unexpected lessons about social conservative issues."

"Massachusetts became center stage for the most important social issues of our time," he said, detailing his efforts to limit stem cell research, thwart same-sex marriage and curb abortion rights.

At the end of his governorship, the man who ran supporting abortion rights and some gay rights said he'd undergone a transition.

"This fiscal conservative became a social conservative as well," he said.

After reporters were shooed out of the hotel ballroom, the Republicans asked Romney to elaborate on his abortion views.

According to one who remained in the room, Romney used a familiar anecdote to describe his change on the issue.

Romney, recounting a meeting with Harvard University scientists in 2004, recalled how they nonchalantly explained their cloning of embryos. That, Romney notes, was the moment when he first realized how the sanctity of life had become so cheapened.

In a brief press availability after what Romney described as a "probing follow-up" to his speech, the former governor said he felt like he had passed the examination.

In an interview, Rep. Wally Herger, R-Calif., said he was satisfied with Romney's explanation.

"I felt very comfortable," said Herger, who is so far uncommitted in the presidential contest but offered that he could "absolutely" back Romney.

Rep. Darrell Issa, another California Republican, noted that while Romney said what he needed to say to the conservative audience, his address was short on specifics.

"There wasn't a lot there," said Issa, who has also yet to weigh in on 2008. "He touched on a lot of broad themes that require a lot of money."

Asked about Romney's accounting of how he had come to oppose abortion rights, Issa acknowledged that it was "artful," but probably not quite as clear-cut as Romney tried to make it.

Unmistaken were two shots the former governor took at Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y. and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. – both presidential contenders.

Discussing his views on Iran, Romney noted that in addressing pro-Israel AIPAC Thursday night in New York, Clinton said the United States needs to "understand" Iran better. Emphasizing the quotation, Romney added that Clinton had also called for America to "engage" Tehran.

"Somebody who doesn't 'understand' Iran hasn't been paying attention," Romney said, adding that Clinton's view amounted to a "troubling timidity" toward the prospect of a nuclear Iran.

"We don't need a listening tour of Iran," he said.

Responding, Clinton campaign spokesman Mo Elleithee said the senator "believes that no option should be taken off the table when it comes to developing nuclear weapons."

"Given his record flip flops," Elleithee said, "the only thing that's timid are Governor Romney's convictions."

Romney's tweak of his GOP rival wasn't as pointed, nor as public.

A staffer in the room for Romney's private exchange with Republicans said that the former governor drew a standing ovation when he called McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform "a horrible policy."

Then, with a grin, Romney added: "I could have, of course, just called it campaign finance reform."

McCain's camp declined to comment.

Hagel For President (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127808

No, we don't mean this as an endorsement. The Journal doesn't endorse candidates, and on the big issues of the day we don't much agree with Chuck Hagel in any case. But with the Nebraska Republican loudly agitating for a rapid withdrawal from Iraq, we think it's time the Senator tested his ideas somewhere other than the Sunday talk shows.

If Mr. Hagel thinks his foreign-policy vision is superior to President Bush's or to Senator John McCain's, he should stop booing from the gallery and get into the fight for the Republican Presidential nomination. The primaries are only a year away, and the GOP field awaits a genuine antiwar candidate. It's one thing to win the Beltway media primary, another to prevail among actual voters, as Mr. Bush has done twice.

We'd have thought Mr. Hagel would relish such a contest, especially given his remarks last week about his colleagues. Along with Democrat Joe Biden, the Senator co-sponsored a resolution condemning Mr. Bush's "surge" strategy for Baghdad. And while debating the resolution last week, the Nebraskan said that "I think all 100 Senators ought to be on the line on this. What do you believe? What are you willing to support? What do you think? Why were you elected? If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes. This is a tough business."

That "tough" point in particular could use some fleshing out. Our guess is that only in Washington is it considered courageous for a politician to criticize a war that he voted for when it was popular but that public opinion has since turned against. And to do so by offering a "resolution" that has no force of law and is thus meaningless except for the message of American irresolution it sends to our enemies.

Somehow it seems far "tougher" to stand by one's original vote for the war even when it becomes unpopular, as Mr. McCain and Senator Joe Lieberman have done. Or, if you are truly antiwar, to have the courage of those convictions and attempt to cut off funds, as Senator Russ Feingold and Congressman Dennis Kucinich propose. The latter would at least mean taking some responsibility for what happens next.

As far as we can tell from his speeches, Mr. Hagel's larger vision for the Mideast is that the U.S. was much better off before Mr. Bush introduced all that "democracy" nonsense. He'd return to the status quo before 9/11, fighting the war on terror with the Arab dictators we have. The Senator also favors "engaging" Syria and Iran, and he says that "in the Middle East, the core of instability and conflict is the underlying Arab-Israeli problem."

Whatever one thinks of these views, they are not unique or innovative. John Kerry campaigned on them in 2004, but maybe the country has since changed its mind enough to embrace them in 2008. If Mr. Hagel believes what he says, he'll stop insulting shoe salesmen by comparing them to Senators and get into the ring himself.

Arkansas Underdog (WSJ)

By Paul Greenberg, Kane Webb

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. -- Once upon a pre-Clinton time, the announcement by the former Arkansas governor, Mike Huckabee, that he's running for president would have been stop-the-presses news in these latitudes. And while it's still front-page, above-the-fold stuff, Arkansas has been there, done that, and is doing it again. These days we seem to grow presidential candidates as bountifully as we do tomatoes and watermelons.

Hillary Clinton's in the race, right? Officially now, we mean. She's said to have been a first lady of this state way back when. Also, former NATO commander Wesley Clark, now of Little Rock, Ark., ran for president last time out and, far as we know, hasn't ruled out a reprise in '08.

Now there's Mike Huckabee of Hope, Ark. (Ring a bell?) He's just the latest to put Arkansas on the political map. Or rather to keep it there. Back when Bill Clinton was still largely an unknown -- can you imagine? -- and Arkansas Chic still all the rage, circa 1992-ish, Vernon Jordan pronounced this small, wonderful state the Political Capital of the Universe.

He had no idea.

So does Mike Huckabee have a chance? He was a Republican governor of this largely one-party Democratic state for a decade, so he's used to battling long odds. Now he's launched a longshot presidential campaign.

It may not last till spring if his first week on the campaign trail is any indication. Instead of toughening up for the road ahead, our thin-skinned former governor peeled off yet another layer of epidermis. "The Huck" followed up his Sunday morning presidential announcement on "Meet the Press" by meeting the press back here in Arkansas. After giving a perfectly proper speech at the state's Republican Party headquarters, he immediately tore into the local press, as is his wont. This time he was sore about a series of hotly debated stories in the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette about the destruction of a computer hard drive and his depleting an emergency fund during his final days in office.

DOJ_NMG_0127809

He couldn't just criticize Them Lyin' Newspapers and be done with it. He had to go on to compare a reporter for the Democrat-Gazette to Janet Cooke and Jayson Blair.

Goodness. Lend this man a little perspective; he tends to be about two quarts high on hyperbole. Ms. Cooke and Mr. Blair are the evil twins of reckless, fabricating, plagiarizing journalism, the worst of the worst. That's a pretty serious charge -- or rather, it would be if anybody around here could take it seriously.

But we weren't surprised. Any more than we would be by a splendid piece of oratory from the same source. Mike Huckabee, at times, can be the most elevating of speakers -- we still haven't come down from his speech welcoming the Little Rock Nine back to Central High on the 40th anniversary of the crisis there, or his steadfast yet gracious performance July 15, 1996. That was the long, long day when his predecessor, Jim Guy Tucker, convicted for conspiracy and mail fraud in connection with the Whitewater investigation, at first refused to be pried out of the governor's office.

But, too many other times, Brother Huckabee just likes to wallow in the old invective, and the pettier his complaint, the longer he wallows. The man spent most of a fine administration snubbing the Arkansas Times, a free weekly tabloid that, of course, just loved all the attention. (He actually had the little weekly removed from the list of publications that got his public schedule. Petty, to say the least.)

Now he launches his presidential campaign by throwing some mud at a reporter for the Democrat-Gazette. How does he suppose that kind of thing will play in Peoria? Or Poughkeepsie? And coming from a dark-horse presidential candidate out to charm the national press, how would it play along the New York-Washington media axis? If he keeps it up, how long before the cable-news promos are asking: "Mike Huckabee: Legit longshot or loose cannon?"

The Huck's tendency to go into vendetta mode violates the first rule of smart politics and public discourse in general: Never get into a fight with someone who's not as well known as you are. It bumps up their status and lowers yours. Mr. Huckabee needs to learn to cut down the big trees, not mess with the little saplings. Besides being unworthy of him personally, it wastes all his high-powered rhetoric. If this candidate isn't more careful, a nickname like Gov. Petty may stick to him the way Slick Willie did to another presidential hopeful from Arkansas.

What a pity that would be. He has a lot of potential as a presidential candidate, and a record of accomplishment here in Arkansas -- from getting health care to kids whose families couldn't afford it to fixing our interstate highways. He's been willing to take on the educational establishment in order to improve our schools, and early on he finally simplified this state's once byzantine requirements for something as basic as renewing your car tags.

Does he stand a chance nationally? Candidate Huckabee said it himself: The American people love an underdog. It's hardly an original thought, but he's spot on. We the People love the up-from-nothin' kid, the outta-nowhere man, the longshot who catches the favorite at the wire. We love the underdog, that is, right up until the moment he makes a slip and reminds everybody why he was a longshot in the first place.

One of Mike Huckabee's Republican rivals in this campaign, Mitt Romney, had a father who ran for president, too. Briefly. George Romney broke from the gate with a rush in another presidential campaign just getting under way during an increasingly unpopular war. Then he let it slip that he'd been "brainwashed" about Vietnam.

Some of us had thought George Romney might get a little credit for that kind of humility and candor. Naturally he didn't. The guy was an ex-presidential candidate as soon as he'd spit out just a couple of syllables -- brainwashed. So long, underdog.

Mike Huckabee's campaign will be history soon, too, unless he learns to cool it. Which may not be possible for the Huck, given his showman's personality and rhetorical impulses. The man is a Baptist preacher and former radio broadcaster who may secretly yearn to be a stand-up comic. He can't pass up an opportunity to say something that sounds clever at the time, but then comes back to haunt him on Tim Russert's show.

Our advice: Be careful out there, Brother Huckabee. Your presidential campaign is one careless wisecrack from being over.

DOJ_NMG_0127810

Mr. Greenberg is editorial page editor of the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, where Mr. Webb is assistant editorial page editor.

Powerful Fla. Storms Kill 19, Raze Homes (AP)

By Jim Ellis

AP, February 3, 2007

LADY LAKE, Fla. (AP) - Disaster crews with dogs went from one pile of debris to another in a search for bodies Friday after powerful storms, including at least one tornado, smashed hundreds of homes across central Florida and killed 19 people or more.

It was the second-deadliest combination of thunderstorms and tornados in Florida history, cutting a 40-mile swath of destruction across four counties just before daybreak, terrorizing residents of one of the nation's biggest retirement communities, and leaving trees and fields littered with clothes, furniture and splintered lumber.

Residents helped pull the dead from the ruins.

"It was scary, really scary," said Patrick Smith, who lives in the Paisley area, where at least 13 deaths were reported. He said he saw a weather alert on television, grabbed his wife and "went straight to the floor." After the storm passed, he pulled the bodies of a man and his 9- or 10-year-old son from a neighboring house.

(AP) Maria Helena, 34, holds her son, Diego, 2, as she walks around a tree that went through her mobile...

Full ImageFlorida's emergency management chief, Craig Fugate, said it could take several days to determine the exact number of dead, and the main priority was finding survivors who may be trapped.

Gov. Charlie Crist declared a state of emergency in four counties, but the worst damage was reported where the twister touched down in northern Lake County and eastern Volusia County. In typical tornado fashion, the storm hopscotched across the landscape, demolishing some homes and leaving others virtually untouched.

"Our priority today is search and rescue," said Crist, who toured the damaged area in his first natural disaster since taking office last month. "Everything's being done to get them the aid and assistance that they need."

Lake County spokesman Christopher Patton said there were 19 confirmed deaths, all in Lake County, about 50 miles northwest of Orlando. The dead included at least two high school students, authorities said. Numerous injuries were reported, but officials could not immediately estimate how many.

Officials in Lake and Volusia counties ordered dusk-to-dawn curfews in heavily damaged areas to prevent looting and injuries to residents trying to sift through wreckage in the dark.

(AP) Marianna Campos, 10, hugs her aunt, Maria Jasso, 47, after her aunts home was destroyed by a...

Full ImageAuthorities said hundreds of houses, mobile homes and other buildings were damaged or destroyed. Volusia County reported a preliminary estimate of $80 million in damage involving 500 properties.

The storm left yards strewn with chairs, beds and clothes, knocked tractor-trailers onto their sides as if they were toys, and tore away roofs. Debris hung from trees, and some homes were thrown off their foundations.

Bernadette Fields, 67, said two of her neighbors in mobile homes were blown through a bedroom wall into Lake Mack. Their bodies were found by their own dog, she said.

Dozens of rescue workers - many hardened by experience with Florida's multiple hurricanes - went from house to house, spray-painting big red X's to mark the husks of buildings that they had checked. Often they found people who awoke to the storm's roar and watched their homes disintegrate around them.

Lee Shaver, 54, said he and his wife, Irene, and their dog had "about 10 seconds" to take shelter in a closet before their roof was torn off.

(AP) Volusia County Sheriff Ben Johnson, left, shakes hands with Governor Charlie Crist at Volusia...

Full Image"Every muscle and bone in my body shook," said Lee Shaver outside his damaged home in The Villages, one of the nation's largest retirement communities.

"It was terrifying. You're not thinking consciously. You're just trying to save your life," added his 55-year-old wife.

Tornado watches had been posted hours before the twister struck, and warnings were issued between eight and 15 minutes before they touched down, said meteorologist Dave Sharp of the National Weather Service in Melbourne.

DOJ_NMG_0127811

But few people were listening to the radio or watching television at that hour, and few communities in the region have warning sirens.

"The most dangerous tornado scenario is a threat for killer tornadoes at night, and that was the case," Sharp said.

(AP) A wooden plank sticks out of the back of a car after severe storms hit the area of northern New...

Full ImageThe weather service estimated the tornado had winds of between 136 mph and 165 mph, Sharp said. But that was based on where the twister first touched down and did not include some of the hardest-hit areas, which researchers planned to examine Saturday, he said.

Vern Huber, 87, said his weather radio alarm went off around 3:30 a.m. and he and his wife, Louedna, 81, huddled in the hall and put pillows from the couch on top of themselves.

"It was a deafening roar," Huber said.

In Lady Lake, the Church of God was demolished, its pews, altar and torn Bibles left in a jumbled mess. The 31-year-old, steel-reinforced structure was built to withstand 150-mph winds, the Rev. Larry Lynn said.

By daybreak, parishioners gathered on the lot where the church once stood, hugging each other and consoling Lynn. They planned to clear the debris and hold Sunday services on the empty lot.

"That's just the building, the people are the church. We'll be back bigger and stronger," Lynn said.

While Lake County got the worst of it, Volusia County officials reported that 69 homes were damaged in New Smyrna Beach. A county medical clinic in DeLand was severely damaged.

"We heard a big boom then we heard the freight-train noise. All five of us got in the closet," said Linda Craig, 44, who lives in Hontoon Island, a heavily damaged area of Volusia County.

The winds lifted one tractor-trailer and dropped it on another, pinning the driver in the cab of the second semi, said Kim Miller, a spokeswoman with the Florida Highway Patrol. The driver's injuries were not considered life-threatening.

About 10,000 customers were without power. Several counties opened shelters for those who lost their homes.

Friday's storms were reminiscent of past tornados during years where El Nino was a weather factor, as it was again in this case, said state meteorologist Ben Nelson.

The 19 deaths made Friday's tornado the second-deadliest in Florida history, surpassing a 1962 tornado outbreak that killed 17 in the Panhandle.

The state's deadliest tornado event on record happened in February 1998, when five twisters hit near Orlando over two days, killing 42 people and damaging or destroying about 2,600 homes and businesses.

Associated Press reporters Curt Anderson, Damian Grass, Suzette Laboy, Stephen Majors, Adrian Sainz and Ron Word contributed to this report.

Titillating Or Not, Washington Gossip Blossoms (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — Some big doings in the nation's capital this week.

Item: Dennis Hastert, the former House speaker, had his gallbladder removed.

Item: Karl Rove was spotted at a performance of "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf" at the Kennedy Center.

Item: Representative William Lacy Clay, a Missouri Democrat, got his braces taken off.

Item: A photograph of Paul Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank, revealed holes in his socks.

Item: Senator Norm Coleman, a Minnesota Republican, nearly committed the etiquette-crime of entering the Senate chamber without a tie (he found a loaner at the last minute).

As the globe warms, Iraq burns and a presidential campaign heats up, Washington finds itself red-hot in gossip, or what passes for such here. Never in memory has the political world been so awash in items about every little burp and wart and appendectomy of our nation's leaders.

Ten publications carry a total of 14 columns focusing on political tidbits that appear regularly, up from three columns a decade ago.

DOJ_NMG_0127812

They include the Reliable Source and In the Loop columns, The Washington Post's entrenched offerings (the paper's Web site started a new enterprise, the Sleuth, last month); In the Know and Under the Dome, which dish in the tabloid The Hill; and Heard on the Hill, which appears in Roll Call.

The Examiner offers Yeas and Nays, while the latest entry, The Politico, nourishes its politerati with Shenanigans and the Crypt.

So what does this all mean?

"It means I have to spend a lot more of my time fielding calls and e-mails from gossip columnists," said a slightly exasperated Jim Manley, the top communications aide to Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic majority leader.

Mr. Manley had just finished responding to an e-mail message from a Roll Call reporter about whether Mr. Reid knew the date of Valentine's Day. (That day's Politico had broken the Watergate-like development that Mr. Reid had made a remark suggesting he thought it was February 12.)

As of now, Washington's gossip is tame compared to the sexier, snarkier variety from Hollywood and New York — that is, unless anyone considers it sexy that Representative Nita M. Lowey, a New York Democrat, is suffering from inflammation of the fascia (or foot problem, The Hill reported).

The most recent salacious Washington story, the Mark Foley intern case, was more squirm-provoking than fun. It is hard to recall a good, old-fashioned, career-killing scoop in any Washington gossip page.

That will change as the "Washington gossip wars" intensify, promises Chuck Conconi, a longtime editor at Washingtonian magazine who for many years wrote a gossip column in The Post.

"If you're in Hollywood and you write something about Brad Pitt that turns out to be wrong, so what, it will probably help him," Mr. Conconi said. But in Washington, he said, "If you're wrong, it can end a senator's career. So politics is going to breed more caution." At least for now.

Chuck Todd, editor of the online political clearinghouse Hotline, calls the gossip phenomenon "pack gossip journalism," a byproduct of the celebrification of politics and the attendant proliferation of media to cover it. "Look, Washington is Hollywood for ugly people for a reason, and this reflects it," he said.

Mr. Todd said Hotline was selective in the quality of material it elected to republish from the various and multiplying outlets.

"We're only going to cover the Denny Hastert gallbladder removal story once," he vowed. "We're not going to cover every angle of the Denny Hastert gallbladder story."

And thank goodness for restraint.

Will We Lose In The Stem Cell Race? (WP)

By Joseph Fuller, Brock Reeve

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Americans take it for granted that they are the world's leaders in the life sciences. And it's true that, today, American companies account for 60 percent of global pharmaceutical sales and 75 percent of biotech sales, and that they dominate the market for medical devices. But complacency is a powerful enemy; our leadership position is not a national birthright. We could fumble it just as we fumbled leadership in the consumer electronics and automotive sectors.

In science and technology-intensive fields, fumbling is particularly easy. Less than 30 years ago, five of the world's top 10 pharmaceutical companies, including the two largest, were European. Between 1980 and 1984, Europe invented more than half of the world's new drugs. Observers assumed that Europe would lead the anticipated revolution in biotechnology.

Today, however, American companies account for more than three-quarters of worldwide biotech revenue and have almost 4,500 products in development -- 2 1/2 times as many as European companies.

How did we turn the tables?

-- Government actions and court decisions allowed the patenting of living organisms and made it possible for private researchers to commercialize discoveries funded by federal grants. Further, Stanford University, which controlled key patents, ensured their widespread and rapid adoption.

DOJ_NMG_0127813

-- In Europe, the countries of the European Union had independent regulators until the 1990s. The patentability of living organisms remained uncertain until 1998. And state-funded academic institutions had little incentive to encourage academics to pursue commercially oriented research.

-- Between 1985 and 1995 the U.S. government invested more than $50 billion in the biological sciences. Federal spending during that period dwarfed the amount spent in Europe and encouraged private-sector investment.

-- With the availability of affordable, fundamental patents and a supportive public policy environment, between 1987 and 1997 investors bet some $6 billion of risk capital on the fledging sector in the United States, roughly five times as much as their European counterparts.

Can we repeat that success in new areas of science, such as stem cell research? Many Americans assume that once the current restrictions on federal funding of embryonic stem cell research have been lifted, America will surge to the forefront. A quick glance at the field seems to bear that out. The fundamental patents underlying embryonic stem cell research were developed in the United States and are held by the Wisconsin Alumni Research Foundation (WARF). Many leading scientists are based in this country. With private philanthropy supporting institutions such as the Harvard Stem Cell Institute, and public money in states including California, New Jersey, Connecticut and Maryland supporting research, history seems poised to repeat itself.

But closer examination suggests that such confidence might be misplaced. If one analyzes the state of the industry along some of the same critical dimensions that contributed to our come-from-behind win in biotechnology, unnerving patterns emerge.

-- While Stanford granted 73 nonexclusive licenses in less than a year, WARF has awarded just 13 licenses in eight years under economic terms that many believe have slowed the sector's growth.

-- The ongoing political debate over the appropriate use of embryonic stem cells and the low level of government support have denied stem cell research the catalyst provided to biotechnology -- even as other countries are investing aggressively.

-- The entry of individual states into the breach left by the federal government has helped drive research activity. But it has also created a patchwork of regulations and funding levels that constrains research collaboration.

-- Expensive and restrictive enabling patents, political controversy and the absence of federal research money, coupled with a long time to market, have made venture capitalists reluctant to invest. In 2005, just over $100 million in venture capital went to stem cell ventures, compared with $500 million in biotech ventures at an equivalent stage.

-- Constraining federal research support to a selected area -- such as certain cell types and lines -- is not a sensible research policy. Advances with stem cells from amniotic fluid and the pulp of baby teeth have been in the news recently, but as the authors of those studies point out, such cells, while promising, cannot take the place of embryonic cells. These restrictions divert valuable time and effort in a way that is not occurring in Britain or Singapore.

In short, the stem cell sector is at risk of experiencing a failure to launch at the national level. Yes, some progress is being made: WARF has just revised some of its licensing policies; venture capital activity has picked up recently; and academic research and clinical centers, disease foundations and patient-advocacy groups are adopting a more aggressive stance in breaking down existing barriers. But will this be enough? Or will foreign governments, using America's biotech success as a model, systematically encourage the development of stem cell research and, not satisfied with emulating our competitive performance, succeed in outstripping us?

Joseph Fuller is a founder of the Monitor Group. Brock Reeve is executive director of the Harvard Stem Cell Institute.

Happy Birthday, Mr. Reagan (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

Next Tuesday would have been Ronald Reagan's 96th birthday, which is amazing when you consider he is, in a way, more with us than ever: his memory and meaning summoned in political conversation, his name evoked by candidates. I remember 10 years ago when there was controversy over the movement to name things for him -- buildings and airports. I was away from home at the time, and I realized that to talk to people in Washington about it, I'd have to land at JFK, take the FDR Drive and go through the Lincoln Tunnel.

DOJ_NMG_0127814

This is America; we remember our greats. You tell yourself who you are by what you raise a statue to.

The other day a friend asked: What do you think made him so likable to many who disagreed with him and who look back with nostalgia on his White House?

It's funny that people like to talk about this even though they know the answers. There was the courage to swim against the tide, to show not a burst of bravery but guts in the long haul. The good cheer and good nature that amounted to a kind of faith. The air of pleasure Reagan emanated on meeting others, and his egalitarianism. He thought everyone, from Nobel Prize winners to doormen, equal. Not that he wasn't aware of status. When he stood behind Errol Flynn for a still photo to promote "Santa Fe Trail," he knew of Flynn's towering reputation. Between shots, Reagan kept quietly pushing little piles of dirt together. When he had a mound, he stood on it so that he was, literally, of equal stature. He told the story on himself for years because it was funny, and he believed in laughter. He was a little like Art Buchwald in this; he thought laughter was a value of its own. I think he thought that people who shared a laugh had in fact just voted for something together: something funny and human just got said or done.

Lesley Stahl of "60 Minutes" was CBS's White House correspondent during the Reagan administration, and I asked her what she remembered most. She said, "We reporters would stake out 'the driveway' to see who was going in to see the president. In the first few years there was a stream of people who came to argue against his budget-cutting proposals. They would march up that driveway in a huff, smoke coming out of their nostrils as they rehearsed their angry arguments about why he was destroying the lives of poor people, or schoolkids.

"I remember specifically a group of mayors from big cities, livid about cuts to their welfare programs, school-lunch programs, etc. They were there to give the president a scolding; they were going to tell him. And in they'd march. Two hours later, out they came. We were all ready with the cameras and the mikes to get their version of the telling off. But they were all little lambs, subdued....He had charmed them....The mayors told us Reagan agreed with them. That they had persuaded him....

"Thirty minutes later Larry Speakes was in the press room telling us the numbers would not in fact change. The mayors had 'misunderstood' the president. Still, I'll bet anything if you talked to those mayors today, they would tell you Reagan was a great guy."

She mentioned "his personal touch, his gallantry." You knew he was a good man and you knew he meant it. So you understood how he could be the biggest supporter of FDR and the New Deal in 1944, and the most persuasive voice for Barry Goldwater in 1964. He'd thought it through and changed, not overnight but in time and with effort. He could change his mind on abortion in the same way, and not because he feared the base. Reagan was the base.

Last week I was at a gathering of old Reagan hands and I asked aloud if something that I'd heard might be true. It was that Mikhail Gorbachev now lives in California and has a pool. The minute I said it, a longtime Reagan friend laughed. He knew where I was going. Reagan always said what he really wanted to do with a Russian premier was get him in a helicopter, ride over Southern California, point down at the million little houses and million little pools, and say "Mr. Gorbachev, that's how the proletariat lives in America."

But it wasn't true. Mr. Gorbachev lives in Moscow, where he has a think tank, a former cabinet secretary told me. Mr. Gorbachev had given the secretary a tour, and proudly noted that he paid for the building by renting out two floors. "Gorbachev has discovered the free market," the secretary said.

It was almost as good.

This led the Reagan intimate to remember being on a private plane with him one day. They had a steak and fine wine. "Reagan said to me, 'You know, I believe everyone in America can have these things.' I said, 'You really believe that?' Reagan said, 'Yes, I do.' " The intimate said to me, "See, I don't believe that, that anyone here can do it." Then he paused. "But it's good to have a president who does."

Lately we are hearing of President Reagan's famous 11th commandment: "Speak no ill of a fellow Republican." It's a good rule for both parties, but it's good also to remember how he approached it in practice. Ronald Reagan turned his own party upside down, enraged its establishment, and threatened its immediate future when, in 1976, he mounted a fierce challenge to an incumbent Republican president. He ran full and hard against Jerry Ford and it was bitter -- the stakes were high, the issue freedom at home and abroad. Reagan lost, his challenge doomed Ford in the general election, and four years later Reagan roared back. And when he won the nomination he turned around and seriously considered as his running mate...Jerry Ford.

DOJ_NMG_0127815

When he ran against Ford, it wasn't personal. And when he almost picked Ford as his vice president, that wasn't personal either. It was more like this: This is America. We have been arguing about everything for 200 years. It's what we do. It's our glory.

Our politics then were grimmer yet had a lighter touch. The Soviets could nuke us tomorrow; let's have a hellacious brawl. It was a serious time, but I don't think we were in general so somber, so locked in. The 11th commandment meant the fight should never be mean, low or unnecessarily injurious to the person, or the party. But a fight could be waged -- should be waged -- over big, big things.

That he knew that is part of why we remember him as great. It's part of why when you next fly to Washington, you'll land at Reagan National Airport.

Lone Starlets (NYT)

By Mimi Swartz

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

THE last few months have provided hard times for iconic Texas women and the Texans — and others — who worshipped them. Last September, we lost both a former governor, Ann Richards, and a former state first lady, Nellie Connally. When the columnist Molly Ivins died on Wednesday, it seemed that a certain kind of Texas woman might be gone forever.

If you've read the obituaries, you know the type: the funny, brave, irreverent kind, who spoke out against a life in a (supposedly) brutal, backward state. It was Ms. Richards who insisted that the elder President Bush was born with a "silver foot in his mouth," and Ms. Ivins who insisted that the younger one had rightfully earned the nickname of "Shrub." Mrs. Connally, less well known outside the state, was almost as funny and probably more beloved here, because she delivered her barbs in private.

As befits most icons, all of these women went by their first names among people who didn't know them. They will be remembered for their strength and their wit, but what stays with me even more is their fragility and their anger. I wrote about them all over the years, and with each of their deaths I found myself thinking, amid the tributes, that being a Texas icon of the female variety probably wasn't all it was cracked up to be.

You can make the case that fury goes with the territory here. The male-dominated, rough-and-tumble Texas these women grew up in wasn't hospitable to ladies in smarty pants; all three had to come up with novel ways to satisfy their needs and ambitions in a circumscribed world.

Ms. Ivins and Ms. Richards in particular were very interested in bringing about social change; the relationship between the state as a whole and the liberal coterie of which they were an integral part is one of the great, doomed romances of Texas history. Mrs. Connally was far from a liberal Democrat — her husband, Gov. John Connally, famously jumped from the Democratic Party to the Republicans — but she, too, triumphed over a youthful shyness to serve as her spouse's most undying loyalist, whether he was pushing for school reform in Texas or, later, trying to escape scandal in Washington.

In other words, rather than flee the state for friendlier waters, all three far preferred to stay and swim upstream. All three, in fact, felt a deep obligation to their home state: it energized them as it defined them — favorably — to the outside world, which always felt better when it could look down on Texas.

Nellie Connally had little choice but to play the part of the gracious, loving wife; there wasn't much else a woman of her generation could do (she was 87 when she died). She was a former beauty queen who married a true prince of Texas and became a very popular first lady. Yet when I last interviewed her in 2003 she was living in a two-bedroom apartment overflowing with memorabilia, waiting each day to have her two allotted drinks with Dan Rather at 5:30. She had attentive children and grandchildren, but she had by then lost a daughter to suicide, struggled with breast cancer, and endured her husband's very public bankruptcy.

And, of course, after the deaths of her husband in 1993 and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis the next year, she alone lived to tell the tale of what happened in President John F. Kennedy's car on Nov. 22, 1963. I heard her describe it three times to three different audiences during the course of a few weeks. (It was Nellie, ever smoothing things over, who said, "Mr. President, you can't say Dallas doesn't love you," just before the shots were fired.) As horrible as that memory was, it kept her tied to history, and, more important, to the love of her life — a man who suffered from such profound arrogance and vanity that his personality has come to overshadow his many accomplishments.

DOJ_NMG_0127816

When you saw Ann Richards's weathered face you knew just what 73 years of life had cost her. Sure, she had given herself over to the harsh Texas sun on too many outings; but, like Nellie Connally, there had been other costs: she, too, had played geisha, not to an ambitious husband but to a group of ambitious Texas liberals. It was Ms. Richards who had planned the drunken, irreverent costume parties — memories of the time are hazy, but she once went, or dressed a friend up, as a tampon. Then she got up next morning to pack the children's lunches.

She did it all, pretty near perfectly for a while: a beautiful young woman of supreme competency with a tart tongue and ambitions far beyond the P.T.A. Triumphing over all that — as well as smoking, drinking and divorce — formed part of her campaign story when she ran for governor in 1990, and made her victory all the sweeter.

But her pain, smoothed over in folksy public speeches and slick campaign commercials, could catch you up short: when I traveled with her during her first gubernatorial campaign I marveled at how trussed up and hostile she was, how her coterie of female supporters were protective to a fault, trying to shield her from criticism. In the end, she lost her taste for the fight, and essentially ceded the 1994 gubernatorial election to George W. Bush.

Being a decade younger than her friend Ann Richards, Molly Ivins never had to serve as anyone's geisha, and she never would have. But she was a big, smart, ungainly girl in a state where a female could suffer something close to capital punishment for those crimes; in self-defense she turned the cracker vernacular on the crackers and won fame for herself in the process, playing the Professional Texan. (Those hacks in the Legislature wouldn't have given a Smith graduate from ritzy River Oaks the time of day, but a hard-drinking, foul-talking, big-boned country girl? Well, that worked.)

But in private, Ms. Ivins, too, battled alcohol, and had her coterie of human shields; they were protecting a woman whose loneliness was as incomprehensible as it was omnipresent. She was a performer who rarely allowed herself to be offstage, which, of course, ensured that the majority of us kept our distance.

There aren't so many iconic women left in Texas, now — Lady Bird Johnson and the oil baroness Lynn Wyatt come to mind — but maybe that's to the good. We don't have to fight so hard to be heard, or noticed, or to avoid being taken for a hick. It's easier for us, but for everyone who knew them, maybe, not quite as much fun.

Russia Clashes With U.S. On Mideast Policy (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Russia urged ending the isolation of the anti-Israeli militant group Hamas and including Syria in Middle East peace talks, exposing fissures in a high-level diplomatic group that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gathered yesterday in Washington to validate her new effort to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The Russian proposals run directly counter to Rice's strategy of rallying what she calls "mainstream" Arabs to isolate what she calls "extremist" elements in the region.

"I don't think that to resolve this problem, just like any problem that exists in the world, that you could do it through boycott and isolation," Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said at a news conference after a meeting of the "Quartet," which also includes the European Union, the United Nations and the United States.

Lavrov, with Rice seated next to him, said that "Syria could play a constructive role," specifically citing a recent meeting between Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, and Khaled Mashal, the exiled leader of Hamas's political wing, that Damascus had arranged. U.S. officials were furious at Abbas for agreeing to the meeting, Palestinian officials said.

Rice shot back that the United States, "even at the highest levels," has spoken to Syrian officials and that "Syria knows what it needs to do to be a stabilizing force."

Lavrov, asserting that "it is counterproductive to isolate anybody," said Russia believes that the Syrian-brokered meeting helped facilitate a dialogue between rival Palestinian factions and "will lead to positive results."

The Russia-U.S. clash over policy in the Middle East came amid some of the worst factional fighting in months between Palestinian forces; at least 18 Palestinians, including two children, were killed yesterday in fighting between Hamas gunmen and forces loyal to Abbas's Fatah party. Rice, when asked if the violence risked making the diplomatic gathering irrelevant, said that the group expressed concern and that "obviously innocent people are being caught up in this violence, and it needs to stop."

DOJ_NMG_0127817

U.S. officials were miffed at Lavrov's intervention, which overshadowed the group's endorsement of Rice's plans to bring together Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and push them to accelerate a long-dormant peace plan.

A senior administration official, briefing reporters on the condition that his name not be disclosed, said the Russians did not suggest any of the ideas in preliminary meetings nor in yesterday's gathering of foreign ministers. "That is their view, but it isn't shared by others," he said.

During the briefing, the official pointedly -- and gleefully -- noted that the Russians contributed only $10 million of the $700 million in aid received by the Palestinians in 2006, suggesting that Moscow was at best a bit player in the region. He also dismissed the impact of the Palestinian meeting in Syria, saying it is "hard to see a positive influence was applied."

During the news conference, Lavrov said Russia supported the communique issued by the Quartet, which called for a Palestinian government "committed to nonviolence, recognition of Israel and acceptance of previous agreements and obligations."

The United States has led an international boycott of the Hamas-led government in an effort to persuade it to abandon its pledge to seek the destruction of Israel. Months of talks between Abbas and Hamas, seeking to forge a unity government that would empower him to negotiate a peace agreement, have not been successful.

The U.S. official boasted that the administration's campaign of isolating Hamas has been successful. He said the U.S. government believes that Hamas has been able to smuggle in only about $46 million in the past 10 months -- for a government that costs about $150 million a month to run. He said U.S. officials have succeeded in identifying and thwarting the delivery of about $400 million in funds that countries had planned to donate to the Hamas government. Instead, he said, the countries -- mainly Arab -- were persuaded to give the money directly to Abbas's independent presidential office.

Rice, accepting an approach long advocated by Europeans and Palestinians, plans to urge Olmert and Abbas to begin discussing the contours of a final peace deal. Previously, the administration argued that such negotiations would be premature until the Palestinians and the Israelis met the initial requirements of the stalled peace plan. Now, Rice says that sketching a "political horizon" would boost the confidence of the two sides to make those early steps.

"There is simply no reason to avoid the subject of how we get to a Palestinian state," Rice said yesterday. "I think, in fact, the political horizon of a Palestinian state can help to show the Palestinian people what is possible."

"Quartet" Backs Revived Middle East Peace Efforts (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — A group of world powers Friday blessed the latest American effort to restart the Middle East peace process, but not before signaling that divisions remained among its members.

The so-called quartet — comprising the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia — released a statement expressing support for a round of U.S.-led talks due to begin this month. It also reaffirmed its support for an economic boycott of the Palestinian government until the ruling Hamas movement agrees to foreswear violence and recognize Israel.

But in private talks, European officials signaled that they wanted to move faster than the Americans toward a deal to create a Palestinian state, diplomats said. And the Russian delegation urged the group to lift its economic boycott of the Palestinian government, saying the measure punished ordinary Palestinians without forcing Hamas to reform.

The new U.S. effort is based on the idea that progress toward peace can be accelerated by sketching the outlines of a final peace deal, the hope being that giving the Palestinians a glimpse of their "political horizon" would motivate them to make the sacrifices needed to get there.

This approach would allow the Palestinians and Israelis to temporarily bypass the initial requirements set out in the step-by-step "road map" to peace originally laid out by the quartet, conditions now seen as an impediment to progress. These steps, to which both sides agreed, include disarming Palestinian militant groups and clearing residents from illegal Jewish outposts in the West Bank.

But in recent discussions, it has become clear that some European and Arab governments want to put more emphasis on working toward a final deal, whereas the United States and Israel stress that the initial steps must not be completely neglected.

DOJ_NMG_0127818

Israeli officials argue that if the first-stage requirements are not met, neither the Israeli public nor the Palestinians will accept their leaders' eventual deal.

Some European and Arab officials fear that if tangible progress is not made within the next few months, the approach of the American presidential election and deepening international conflict over Iran's nuclear program could again put the talks in a deep freeze.

"We are all happy about the opportunity we have before us, but it is important to take it," a European diplomat said.

Germany, which currently holds the rotating presidency of the European Union, has been pushing to make the quartet more influential in the peace discussions. Although the United States has been eager to win its partners' support, the quartet's meetings have been infrequent and its role secondary.

At a news conference in Washington, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said he was pleased the quartet had made plans to meet again after U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sits down with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas this month.

"We can only be credible if this becomes a long-term, sustainable process," he said.

American officials have been pushing for the new talks in part to solidify support for the United States among Sunni Arab governments in the Middle East, whose backing Washington badly needs in its efforts to stabilize Iraq and challenge Iran.

They also hope that progress in the talks will strengthen Abbas in his struggle against Hamas.

Yet most observers say the effort faces long odds, in part because of the precarious political position of Olmert and Abbas.

In their statement, the quartet members expressed "deep concern" about the latest fighting in the Palestinian territories between Hamas and Fatah, Abbas' movement.

David Makovsky, a senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said it would be tricky for the Palestinians and Israelis to rough out a peace plan with the right amount of detail.

"The question is, will this 'political horizon' be in high definition, or will it be so blurry that it's meaningless?" he said. "You want it to have enough resolution that it can give people a sense of drive and focus, but not so much that it will enable opponents of these leaders to pick it apart. It's unclear you can strike a balance like that."

U.S., Russia Clash Over Syria In Mideast (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 3, 2007

The United States and Russia clashed on Friday over Moscow's suggestion that Syria should be included in efforts to advance an Israeli-Palestinian peace settlement.

"Syria could play a constructive role," Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said after a meeting of world powers to discuss Mideast strategy.

However, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed little enthusiasm for such a prospect. "I hope that it (Syria) will in fact try and play a positive role rather than a negative one," she told reporters.

The Bush administration has resisted expanding diplomatic ties with Syria, which it blames for lending support to radical Islamic groups Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian territories.

The U.S. has also expressed reluctance to reach out to Syria and Iran in a regional effort to reduce violence in Iraq, arguing that both countries' actions show they have little interest in stabilizing the area.

Still, said Lavrov, "It is counterproductive to isolate anybody."

Rice said that dormant Mideast peace talks should resume despite an outbreak of violence among Palestinian factions.

"It doesn't help to talk about a timetable, but it does help to talk about a commitment," Rice said after her meeting at the State Department with foreign ministers from the United Nations, the European Union and Russia.

The gathering of would-be peacemakers came amid renewed fighting between Hamas militants and security forces loyal to the former ruling Fatah Party that has raised new alarm about a possible Palestinian civil war.

More than 100 Palestinians have been killed in internal violence since Hamas won parliamentary elections last year and formed a Cabinet.

DOJ_NMG_0127819

Despite that violence, "there's simply no reason to avoid the subject of how we get to a Palestinian state," Rice said.

The international leaders reiterated the conditions they set for the Hamas-led Palestinian government to receive vital overseas financial aid and international political recognition.

Those include recognition of Israel, renouncing violence and embracing prior agreements between Israel and the Palestinians to work toward peace.

That statement was signed a year ago, days after Hamas won a surprise victory in Palestinian elections.

Hamas has refused to meet the terms, however, leading to a cutoff of direct international aid and a breakdown of services and order in the Palestinian territories.

World powers have largely abandoned hope that Hamas radicals will drop the anti-Israel positions and are looking for a new approach.

Rice was asked about the violence in Gaza and other Palestinian areas.

"We expressed our concern about events on the ground in the Palestinian territories. Obviously innocent people are being caught up in this violence and it needs to stop," she said.

But, she said, "The Palestinian people have waited a long time for a state and the Israeli people have waited a long time for the peace and security that would come from having a democratic neighbor."

The four-way meeting, convened by Rice, risked appearing irrelevant in light of the internal Palestinian disarray.

Any eventual political accommodation with Israel would require a Palestinian government unified and capable enough to negotiate lasting terms.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the internal divisions are issues for the Palestinians alone to resolve.

The United States is looking for ways to revive peace efforts partly as a way to reassure Arab allies that it wants to improve the Palestinians' plight and solidify those allies against Iran.

Shiite Iran has close ties to Hamas, which the West considers a terrorist organization.

One goal of the session was to demonstrate tangible support for secular Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

"The international community is going to do everything it can to settle the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians," German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said before the meeting. He attended the session because Germany currently holds the European Union's rotating presidency.

Cease-fires between the two sides in recent weeks and months have quickly fallen apart — the most recent was announced early Tuesday.

In the latest fighting, gunmen waged battles in the streets with mortar shells, rockets and heavy machine guns.

Abbas appealed Friday for calm.

"I call on all parties in Gaza to stop these actions that harm the Palestinian people," he said.

U.S. Talks With Palestinians And Israelis Gain Support (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — Middle East peace negotiators gave broad endorsement on Friday to American designs for three-way talks led by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and involving Israeli and Palestinian leaders. But discord immediately surfaced with Russian comments that Syria, too, could play a constructive role.

After the meeting here of representatives of the so-called quartet of the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union, Ban Ki-moon, the new United Nations secretary general, read a statement from the group expressing hopes that Ms. Rice's meetings in the Middle East this month "could begin to define more clearly the political horizon for the Palestinian people, and help engender a sense of partnership."

The talks, which officials said could include discussions of such sweeping issues as the shape of a final peace treaty and the nature of a Palestinian state, would not be a substitute for the internationally agreed framework for actions required of Israelis and Palestinians, which was drawn up in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0127820

That so-called road map called for the Palestinians first to disarm militants and eliminate terrorist organizations while Israel froze the building of settlements.

The quartet, in its statement, said it "affirmed the primacy of the road map, and welcomed United States efforts to accelerate progress on the road map."

At a news conference after the meeting, though, Sergey V. Lavrov, the Russian foreign minister, expressed his country's view that "we are in favor of involving all those who can contribute to progress and to this process, and definitely in this case Syria could play a constructive role."

In looking for solutions to problems all across the Middle East, he added, "we believe that it is counterproductive to isolate anybody."

The United States maintains diplomatic relations with Syria, but State Department officials say no deeper engagement is warranted until the government in Damascus halts support for radical organizations, including Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian territories.

"I think Syria knows what it needs to do to be a stabilizing force," Ms. Rice said. "And Syria doesn't need the United States to tell it what it could do to be a stabilizing force."

Mr. Lavrov underscored another difference with American policy, saying that resolving the Israeli-Palestinian dispute requires dealing with Hamas, which swept legislative elections in the Palestinian territories about a year ago.

"I can only repeat that we are convinced that it is necessary to work with Hamas to try to influence their position so that Hamas would accept those principles that were formulated by the quartet," Mr. Lavrov said. "In order for this to happen, what is necessary is to conduct persistent work with Hamas, and Russia is doing that."

When Ms. Rice travels to the region this month, she will meet with Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister beleaguered by a clumsy war in Lebanon and financial scandal in his party, and with Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president whose Fatah movement is battling Hamas politically and on the streets.

The official statement expressed deep concern over the continued factional violence, and Ms. Rice argued that fighting on the streets — and years of political stalemate — did not render the quartet's work irrelevant.

"The Palestinian people have waited a long time for a state, and the Israeli people have waited a long time for the peace and security that would come from having a democratic neighbor that was willing to live in peace with them," Ms. Rice said. "And so I don't think we want to delay any longer the development of a political horizon for these people, and I think it would give great cause for hope in this region."

In their statements, the mediators reaffirmed that the Hamas-led government must adhere to international terms for ending violence and dealing with Israel in order to receive international financial contributions and political support.

In the absence of those actions by Hamas, the four negotiating partners reaffirmed that nations should embargo financial aid to Hamas institutions in the government.

A senior administration official, speaking anonymously under standard diplomatic rules, said after the meeting that more than $700 million in assistance flowed last year to organizations under the control of Mr. Abbas and his party, or to charitable groups in the Palestinian territories, while Hamas received about $110 million.

The official said the government in Moscow had sent only about $10 million in aid to the Palestinians last year. A proposal before Congress would send about $86 million to Mr. Abbas's security forces and other medical and humanitarian aid.

Major Powers Endorse US Initiative On Israeli-Palestinian Peace (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 3, 2007

Major powers endorsed a US plan to accelerate efforts to achieve an Arab-Israeli peace deal and establish a Palestinian state.

But the initiative was marred by renewed Palestinian factional violence, a rift with Russia over whether to bring Syria into the process and a weary skepticism that Israeli and Palestinian leaders are strong enough to lead their people to peace.

DOJ_NMG_0127821

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hosted the meeting of her counterparts from Russia, the European Union and United Nations following a day of clashes in the Gaza Strip between forces loyal to the Western-backed Palestinian president, Mahmud Abbas, and the radical Islamic movement Hamas.

At least 25 people died in the fighting before the two sides agreed on a truce late Friday, but there was no certainty the ceasefire would stop the worst violence yet in a year-long power struggle between Abbas' secular Fatah party and Hamas.

In a final communique read out by UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, the so-called Mideast Quartet expressed its "deep concern" over the factional fighting and called for an end to continuing Palestinian militant attacks on Israel.

But the main purpose of the meeting, the first in five months for the largely inactive group, was to provide backing to Rice's effort to jump-start the Quartet's still-born 2003 "road map" for Israeli-Palestinian peace.

The plan envisaged a three-phase effort focused first on ending Palestinian attacks on Israel and restricting Israeli activities inside the occupied territories and then moving on to steps towards the establishment of a Palestinian state, a goal it hoped to achieve in 2005.

But the plan never moved beyond stage one, torpedoed by Palestininian attacks on Israel and harsh Israeli clampdowns on the territories.

On Friday, the group supported Rice's new approach to move forward on two fronts -- strengthening Abbas' ability to govern and ensure security while, in parallel, holding talks on critical "final status" issues like the borders of a Palestinian state and the future of Jerusalem.

"There is simply no reason to avoid the subject of how we get to a Palestinian state," Rice said at a joint press conference with Ban, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, Frank-Walter Steinmeier of Germany and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana.

Rice declined to set any new timetable for the process.

Friday's meeting was a prelude to a three-way meeting later this month between Rice, Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Washington has billed the encounter as the premiere for its new peace drive, but given the political weakness of both Abbas and Olmert, success is far from guaranteed.

Although he is the elected Palestinian president, Abbas saw his authority eclipsed when Hamas won elections a year ago and gained control of the self-rule government.

The Quartet responded by suspending critical aid to the government, provoking an economic breakdown in the territories.

Olmert has been severely weakened by his perceived mismanagement of last year's war against the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon.

"We're doing this in an environment where, frankly, there is a lot of stress on each of the parties," a senior US official acknowledged.

"The conditions are such that expectations may outstrip the ability of the parties right now to deal with their situation," he said.

Steinmeier, participating because Germany currently holds the rotating EU presidency, was equally cautious.

"We are realistic enough to know it's not something that can be achieved overnight," he said.

Abbas has been trying for months to negotiate a unity government pact with Hamas which would meet the Quartet's conditions for lifting the aid embargo -- recognition of Israel, a renunciation of violence and compliance with past peace agreements with the Jewish state.

Hamas has refused.

The Quartet on Friday reaffirmed the boycott would remain in place until a Palestinian government that agrees to the principles is in place.

But that unity frayed when Russia argued publicly in favor of opening a dialogue with Syria -- which hosts Hamas' hardline leadership -- a stance Rice has ruled out.

"Syria could play a constructive role," Lavrov said, calling the "boycotts and isolation" backed by Washington "counterproductive."

DOJ_NMG_0127822

Russia Decries Hamas Boycott (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

Russia urged the United States and Europe yesterday to end a boycott of the Palestinians' Hamas-led government, exposing divisions in the group of international mediators known as the Quartet as it met in Washington in an effort to restart Middle East peace talks.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hosted the meeting at the State Department on a day when fighting in the Gaza Strip raged between Hamas and the rival Fatah party, claiming at least 17 lives on the deadliest day thus far in a violent power struggle.

"We expressed our concern about events on the ground in the Palestinian territories," Miss Rice told reporters. "Obviously, innocent people are being caught up in this violence, and it needs to stop."

The Quartet -- consisting of the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations -- expressed support for Washington's initiative to begin talks between Israel and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who also leads Fatah.

Miss Rice, who is expected to visit the Middle East later this month, plans to convene a three-way meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Mr. Abbas, although the date and place have yet to be announced.

But at a press conference after yesterday's meeting, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said the U.S. and EU policy of boycotting Hamas is not working.

"I don't think that to resolve this problem -- just like any problem that exists in the world -- you could do it through boycott and isolation," he said. "We are convinced that it is necessary to work with Hamas to try to influence their position, so that Hamas would accept the principles formulated by the Quartet."

The United States and European Union refuse to speak directly with Hamas officials in the Palestinian government and have cut off most international aid to the Palestinians until Hamas renounces violence, recognizes Israel's right to exist and accepts previous Palestinian agreements with the Jewish state.

Russia will continue its contacts with Hamas because it "received support from the Palestinian people during the elections a year ago," Mr. Lavrov said.

A senior U.S. official, responding to Mr. Lavrov's comments, acknowledged that the Quartet does not have a "uniform contact policy" on Hamas. Asked if Russian influence has helped so far, the official said that Hamas is less comfortable saying "no," although it is not yet saying "yes."

The United States and the European Union consider Hamas a terrorist organization.

Mr. Lavrov also said that Syria can play a "constructive role" as a mediator between Fatah and Hamas, but Miss Rice countered that "there is no need for [Syria's] mediation."

In Gaza yesterday, Fatah and Hamas gunmen attacked two universities and a radio station and each other on the streets. At least 24 persons died and about 250 were wounded in a 24-hour period since a cease-fire collapsed Thursday. Another cease-fire was arranged late yesterday.

18 Palestinians Killed In Gaza Fighting (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 2 -- At least 18 Palestinians, including two children, were killed in heavy factional fighting across the northern Gaza Strip on Friday, leaving a truce reached this week in ashes.

The street battles between gunmen from the rival Fatah and Hamas movements brought the two-day death toll among Palestinians to at least 24. The two groups have been locked for the past year in a political struggle for control of the Palestinian Authority.

More than 220 people were injured in the fighting, described by witnesses in Gaza as some of the most sustained since Hamas took day-to-day control of the Palestinian government 10 months ago. In terms of casualties, the violence ranks among the worst in a year.

DOJ_NMG_0127823

"I call on all parties in Gaza to stop these actions that harm the Palestinian people," said Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a Fatah leader.

The fighting, confined largely to northern Gaza, appears increasingly resistant to efforts by party leaders to stop it. Many of Gaza's streets, lined with barricades and echoing with the crackle of gunfire, were abandoned Friday as marauding gunmen torched meeting halls, security compounds and parts of the campus of Islamic University, which is affiliated with Hamas.

Over the past year, partisan violence has flared at moments of political stress between Fatah and Hamas leaders, who met with Egyptian mediators Friday in an effort to end the current fighting. After the meeting, Hamas and Fatah officials called for an immediate cease-fire and for all armed men to leave the streets, although it was unclear whether the order would be followed.

Hamas, a radical Islamic movement that does not recognize Israel's right to exist, deposed Fatah in January 2006 parliamentary elections that were supported by Israel and the United States.

The victory gave Hamas control of the Palestinian ministries, although disagreement with Fatah leaders arose immediately over control of the 70,000-plus members of the security services. Hamas formed its own security branch in Gaza, which is now involved in the fighting against the Fatah-controlled services. The movements also have potent armed wings, which often do not respond to orders from their parties' political leaders.

About 70 Palestinians have been killed since December, when Abbas, a relative moderate, threatened to call early elections if Hamas did not agree to form a power-sharing government that included Fatah and some smaller parties.

The United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations, the group of Middle East peace intermediaries known as the Quartet, cut off most aid to the Palestinian Authority soon after Hamas's election victory. The Quartet, which met Friday in Washington, is demanding that Hamas recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by previously signed agreements with the Jewish state as conditions for renewed aid.

The embargo has impoverished the Palestinian government and much of the territories, especially Gaza, where a high proportion of the population relies on Palestinian Authority salaries. But Hamas has refused to moderate its position and characterizes Abbas's threat to call early elections, including for his own office, as an attempt to overthrow its elected government.

Abbas is scheduled to meet next week with Khaled Mashal, the exiled leader of Hamas's political wing, in the Muslim holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia. The two made little progress toward forming a unity government during a rare meeting last month in the Syrian capital of Damascus. King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia invited them to Mecca earlier this week to continue those talks in hopes of ending the factional fighting.

The rattle and bang of rifle and rocket-propelled grenade fire rang out across the northern strip throughout Friday, the Muslim day of prayer, and a column of black smoke billowed over Islamic University in the heart of Gaza City.

For the second straight day, Fatah forces stormed the campus and came under fire from the Hamas-controlled security force. After an operation there Thursday, Fatah officials said they had seized a large cache of assault rifles and captured seven Iranians, whom they described as "explosives experts."

Hamas, a Sunni Muslim movement, has accepted millions of dollars from Shiite Iran during the international aid embargo. But Hamas officials denied the presence of Iranians in Gaza, and Fatah officials presented no proof of the arrests.

Among the dead Friday was a commander of Fatah security services, who party officials said had been executed by Hamas gunmen. Health officials said two children, ages 5 and 7, also died of their wounds.

16 Die In Gaza Factional Clashes (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood, Rushdi Abu Alouf

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

GAZA CITY — Fighting between rival Palestinian forces continued to rage across the Gaza Strip, killing at least 16 people Friday in violence that laid waste to a days-old cease-fire.

As gunmen battled in the streets, Egyptian officials sought to broker a fresh truce between the ruling Hamas movement and its main rival, Fatah. By day's end, the two sides had announced a tentative agreement to restore the cease-fire reached Tuesday, but it seemed at best a fragile deal as heavily armed men continued to stalk the streets.

DOJ_NMG_0127824

Some of the most intense fighting took place when Hamas gunmen attacked bases used by security forces loyal to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who leads Fatah.

Hamas militants launched mortar rounds and crude Kassam rockets at a main base for security forces in Gaza City and at Abbas' compound nearby. Abbas was not in Gaza at the time.

Fatah forces struck back with heavy machine guns and by setting fire to a building at Islamic University, a Hamas stronghold, where more fierce exchanges took place. Hours later, attackers set fire to Al Quds University, which is affiliated with Fatah.

The dead included at least two children and three Hamas fighters. Most of those killed were Fatah members of the various security forces, including a regional commander of the national intelligence service.

More than 140 people were injured in Friday's violence, a continuation of skirmishing a night earlier that killed six people and left dozens hurt. The earlier fighting began when Hamas gunmen attacked a truck convoy that the group said was carrying arms from Egypt to Fatah's forces. Fatah and Egyptian officials denied the accusation.

For most of Friday, gunfire crackled through the largely deserted streets of Gaza City. Many people remained indoors, and even restaurants along main avenues were shuttered.

"I call on everybody, regardless of their political affiliation, to put an end to this bloodletting," Abbas said, speaking to reporters in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Abbas is expected to travel to Saudi Arabia next week to meet with Hamas leaders for talks on a power-sharing arrangement that could end the factional tensions. Saudi officials invited the two sides for the talks in the Muslim holy city of Mecca. Abbas met last month with exiled Hamas leader Khaled Meshaal in Damascus, the Syrian capital, but they did not reach an agreement.

The groups have been locked in a power struggle since Hamas defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections in January 2006. Several cease-fire agreements have broken down as tensions between the rival militias surged and political leaders' appeals for calm went unheeded.

The violence has worsened since December, when Abbas said he would call new elections as a way to break the months-long political standoff.

Hamas leaders reject the idea of early elections, which they view as illegal and an attempt to topple them. Abbas has not formally declared elections, or set a date.

More than 70 people have died in factional clashes since mid-December.

Friday's flare-up came as Middle East peace mediators were meeting in Washington to consider how to bolster Abbas and restart the stalled diplomatic process between Israel and the Palestinians.

The Bush administration has said it will step up its involvement. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans to travel to the region this month for a three-way meeting with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that is meant to spur informal discussions on the outlines of a possible final agreement.

But prospects for a breakthrough appear remote given the weak political standing of both Olmert and Abbas. Olmert has been highly unpopular among Israeli voters since the war in Lebanon last year, and Abbas is hobbled by the internal turmoil with Hamas.

Months of talks between Hamas and Fatah over a power-sharing arrangement have foundered in large part because of differences over how to divide Cabinet portfolios and Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel.

Abbas has sought to persuade Hamas to accept a political plan that would satisfy the West and bring an end to an aid embargo against the radical Islamist group, which many nations consider a terrorist organization.

In An Israeli Town Prone To Attacks, New York's Mayor Denounces Terror (NYT)

By Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127825

SDEROT, Israel, Feb. 2 — Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg touched down by helicopter on a bare patch of dirt here on Friday, bringing his message against terror to a town shaken by persistent attacks from Palestinian militants firing rockets over the border from Gaza.

"I think this town, as much as any place you'll ever visit, tells you why we can never negotiate with terrorists," he said to a throng of reporters jostling on a hill overlooking Gaza, where violence between Palestinian factions has escalated in recent days. "Israel has a right to exist, and nobody should force on Israel anything."

He said that the country needed to work with its Arab neighbors, but added that if groups did not renounce terrorism, abide by their accords and recognize Israel's right to exist, "I personally think Israel shouldn't talk to them."

In a tour that lasted just under an hour, Mr. Bloomberg made the traditional stops for a visitor here, including one to examine a pile of spent and rusty rocket shells at the police station.

But what was striking in this town of roughly 23,000 was the sense of normalcy, despite the few rockets that had fallen just the night before. There were snaking rows of tidy, red-tile-topped houses, children walking through the streets and clusters of young people at sidewalk cafes. Even Mr. Bloomberg seemed to reflect that atmosphere, hauling out his well-worn joke to take credit for the morning's sunshine.

"The mayor brought good weather, that's the mayor's job," he told Eli Moyal, the mayor of Sderot, as the two walked together.

Just beneath the everyday veneer, though, lies the conflict's toll. Outside a youth center, Mr. Bloomberg met Yonatan Abukasis, whose 17-year-old daughter was killed in 2005 as she shielded her younger brother from an exploding rocket.

"I have two daughters, and I can't imagine," Mr. Bloomberg told Mr. Abukasis, who thanked the mayor for coming. "It's a reminder, all of us, how terrorists try to take away our freedoms. Sadly, some people pay with their lives, as in your case."

At the center, which is dedicated to the girl, a cluster of about three dozen small children greeted the mayor, singing songs for the festival of Tu Bishvat, which celebrates the new year of trees, and waving tiny Israeli flags.

In keeping with the traditional way of observing the holiday, the mayor planted a tree, helping hoist it up and shoveling dirt around the base.

Beside the tree, David Fendel, who is from Long Island and is head of an academy here, expressed his frustration to the mayor, saying that he could not understand how the American government could give aid to Palestinians. Mr. Bloomberg responded, "Well, it's up to the State Department to decide."

Still, Mr. Fendel told him that he appreciated Mr. Bloomberg's "whole attitude."

"You chose to come to Sderot," he said. "People living in fright and we're peace-loving."

On the hill overlooking Gaza, another man, Avi Farchan, approached Mr. Bloomberg and told him that missiles had destroyed his house. He gave the mayor a letter to give to President Bush seeking to end the aid.

Mr. Bloomberg, who traveled the town in an armored car and was accompanied by his New York police detail and a member of the Israeli secret service, told reporters that he was not fearful about visiting.

"I'm not afraid of terrorists," he said.

Yuval Donio Gideon, an official with Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said that Israelis appreciated his making the trip. "We think this is important, as the mayor of New York City that he's here and he's identifying with Israeli daily problems."

U.S. Takes China To WTO Over Subsidies (WP/AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

The Bush administration, under pressure from the Democratic-controlled Congress to do something about America's soaring trade deficit, filed a trade case yesterday against China in a dispute involving government subsidies.

The complaint, filed with the World Trade Organization in Geneva, alleges that China is using government support and tax policies to bolster local companies in competition against U.S. and other foreign firms.

"We are seeking to level the playing field to allow U.S. manufacturers to compete fairly with Chinese firms," U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab said in announcing the case.

DOJ_NMG_0127826

The action will trigger a 60-day consultation during which trade negotiators will try to resolve the dispute. If that fails, a WTO hearing panel will be convened to handle it.

A victory by the administration would clear the way for the United States to impose economic sanctions against China if it refuses to change its subsidy program.

Schwab's announcement that a case was being filed came two days after Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. faced stiff questioning before a congressional panel where both Democrats and Republicans accused the administration of doing too little to deal with a swelling trade deficit with China.

An official with China's delegation to the WTO said the Chinese would have no immediate comment on the case.

Democrats in Congress praised the administration's action, saying they hoped it signaled a more aggressive policy toward what they say are unfair Chinese trade practices.

"Forcing China to eliminate its illegal subsidies will keep world markets open to U.S. goods, keeping jobs at home," said Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont).

"This case represents a step in the right direction, but it must be part of a much more aggressive program to take actions against violations of WTO obligations," said Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich), the head of a House Ways and Means Committee trade panel.

John Engler, a former Michigan governor who heads the National Association of Manufacturers, said he was disappointed that other major trading partners, including Japan and the European Union, refused administration requests to join in filing the case. "We hope that other countries will reconsider joining the case, recognizing it is not fair to have the United States do all the heavy lifting," Engler said.

This is the second WTO case the administration has filed against China in the past year. Last March, it accused China of using a tax system deemed illegal by the WTO to block imports of American and other foreign-made auto parts into China.

Paulson told the Senate Banking Committee on Wednesday that he believed a high-level dialogue that began last December with top Chinese officials offered the best approach to dealing with trade issues.

The administration has been trying to get China to allow its currency to rise in value against the dollar. U.S. manufacturers contend that the Chinese currency, the yuan, is undervalued by as much as 40 percent, giving Chinese products a huge competitive advantage against American goods.

US-China Tensions Rise Over Subsidies (FT)

By Eoin Callan, ichard McGregor

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

The US on Friday launched a major trade dispute with China over alleged subsidies for manufacturing exports in an escalation of economic tensions with Beijing.

Susan Schwab, the US trade representative, said: “Our decision to bring this case to the World Trade Organisation comes after our efforts at dialogue failed.”

The escalation by the Bush administration follows pressure from the new Democratic majority in Congress and for tougher action over a record annual trade deficit with China of $214bn.

The US filing alleges China “uses its basic tax laws and other tools to encourage exports and to discriminate against imports of a variety of American manufactured goods”.

“The subsidies at issue are offered across the spectrum of industry sectors in China - whether in steel, wood products, information technology, or others,” said Ms Schwab.

The action by the Bush administration was viewed as part of a strategy to win Congressional approval for the renewal of the president’s fast-track trade negotiating authority when it expires on June 30.

The executive negotiating authority is viewed by White House advisers as necessary to advance their economic agenda during President George W. Bush’s last two years in office.

Edward Alden, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, said: “It’s a smart move politically, though practically it’s a far bigger and more complicated case than anything the US has attempted against China so far.”

DOJ_NMG_0127827

Sander Levin, chairman of the trade subcommittee in House of Representatives, said: "This case represents a step in the right direction, but it must be part of a much more aggressive program to take actions against violations of WTO obligations."

Max Baucus, chairman of the Senate finance committee, said: "I hope that today's action is a signal that the US trade representative will take more vigorous action in the future when China or any other country fails to abide by trade agreements."

Daniel Griswold, an analyst at the Cato Institute, a conservative think tank, said the case would "give the US leverage with China to compel it to change its tax laws".

"I think this strategy does carry the risk that it will create tensions and maybe even harden the Chinese position," he said.

The dispute process allows time for the case to be resolved through dialogue and was several steps away from a "full-blown trade war", the analyst said.

US manufacturers welcomed the dispute and urged the White House to pursue the case to its conclusion.

John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said: "Pursuing WTO cases like this one helps respond to widespread concern that trade is unfair and that the system does not work for us."

The US case may target the range of export tax rebates offered by China to local firms, many of which were introduced in the late nineties in the wake of the Asian financial crisis. The rebates were aimed at shielding Chinese exporters from the impact at the time of rapidly depreciating currencies in Asia, which made the goods of their regional rivals cheaper on overseas markets.

China has cut the rebates in some sectors in the last two years, but many remain, despite booming exports and a swelling trade surplus with both the US in particular and the world as a whole.

The US action also appears to attack the range of incentives offered by the both the central and local governments in China to attract foreign investment.

U.S. Trade Effort On China Suffers 2 More Setbacks (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The Bush administration's efforts to ease economic strains with China suffered two setbacks Friday with the resignation of a top official in charge of the China dialogue and an announcement that talks on a critical trade dispute had failed to resolve differences.

The United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, said Friday that "our efforts at dialogue failed" to resolve disputes over the American charge that China had illegally subsidized several industries to promote exports. She said Washington would bring the issue to the World Trade Organization, a major escalation in American pressure.

"We would have preferred to work this out," Ms. Schwab said. "We regret that was not possible."

The dispute was over Chinese subsidies of steel, wood products, information technology and other products that compete with goods made in the United States, Ms. Schwab said. Trade officials noted, however, that going to the trade organization would simply open a new phase of talks that could take years.

Meanwhile, the resignation of Timothy D. Adams as under secretary of the Treasury for international affairs was the second departure in five months of the person at Treasury in charge of the overall dialogue with China.

The departure of Mr. Adams comes at a time of rising impatience in Congress over the "strategic economic dialogue" started by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. in September as one of his principal objectives on the international stage.

The dialogue is aimed at improving understanding and the atmosphere for resolving a range of economic disputes, particularly over the American demand that China allow its currency, the yuan, to float more freely on international exchange rates.

A higher value of the yuan would presumably affect the trade balance by making exports to America more expensive and American exports to China cheaper, economists say. The yuan has risen about 6.5 percent in the last year and a half but Mr. Paulson told a Senate committee this week that China had moved too slowly to make its exchange rate more flexible.

In his resignation letter to President Bush, whom he had served as an adviser in the 2000 presidential campaign and in Treasury posts since then, Mr. Adams said that he wanted to return to private life to spend more time with his wife and children.

"I refuse to give anything but my best as I endeavor to make a difference in public service," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127828

Family reasons were also cited last fall in the departure of Mr. Adams's predecessor in the job of overseeing the dialogue, Deborah Lehr, a China specialist with experience in government and the private sector. Ms. Lehr resigned only six weeks after her recruitment by Mr. Paulson. Treasury officials are expected to name a new envoy to handle the dialogue soon.

Mr. Paulson praised Mr. Adams for his service, especially for his work on China. As under secretary, Mr. Adams also worked on changes at the International Monetary Fund and in coordinating economic policy with American allies around the world.

There has been speculation in Washington that Mr. Adams was growing impatient with the pace of progress on the China initiative. But when Treasury officials were asked about this some weeks ago, they said there was no truth to the rumors that Mr. Adams planned to leave.

Acquaintances of Mr. Adams said that his decision to go was fueled less by policy matters than by the lack of a personal chemistry with Mr. Paulson, who came aboard the administration only last summer.

Mr. Adams was said to have chafed when Ms. Lehr was appointed as the China envoy last fall, and then again this winter as others have assumed the role of organizing the dialogue. Mr. Adams is a political insider with ties to the campaign apparatus of the Bush team, and Mr. Paulson is a former executive at Goldman Sachs who freely acknowledges his lack of interest and even distaste for politics.

Some friends said that Mr. Adams had always intended to leave the administration before the end of its second term, having served as a top official to Mr. Paulson and two predecessors, Paul H. O'Neill and John W. Snow, both of whom were ousted from the job by the White House.

"I haven't seen any daylight between what I've heard Tim say about China and what I've heard the secretary say," said Tony Fratto, a former assistant secretary of the treasury for public affairs and now a White House spokesman. Mr. Fratto added that he would be surprised if any policy differences with Mr. Paulson led to Mr. Adams's decision to resign.

Nevertheless, Mr. Adams's departure means that yet another person will have to take over the economic talks with China only a few months before the next meeting, which is in May, at a time of mounting criticism in Congress that the dialogue has produced few results other than setting up an elaborate process to talk about the issues.

Mr. Paulson told the Senate Banking Committee that he shared the senators' "frustration" that the talks had not yet produced results. Treasury officials say he is hoping to produce tangible signs of progress on trade, commercial ties and currency before the next meeting.

But the failure of the trade talks on the decision to take the issue to the World Trade Organization suggests that the benchmarks already sought by the administration are proving difficult to meet. The move on manufactured goods announced by Ms. Schwab follows another such action last year, in which the United States took China to the World Trade Organization over what Washington regarded as China's failure to import American-made auto parts.

Currencies: G-7 May Cast A Wary Eye On Valuations Of The Yuan, Yen (WSJ)

By Joellen Perry

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

When finance ministers from the Group of Seven leading industrial nations meet in Germany next weekend, look out for a tussle over two Asian currencies.

U.S. officials will continue to focus on China's weak yuan at the talks, which take place in the former industrial powerhouse of Essen. But European policy makers have said they will push for a discussion about Japan's currency to be included in the talks, as well. They say the yen's low value gives Japanese exporters an unfair edge against competitors that have to pay for their costs in euros. After losing 10% against the euro in the past year, the yen hit record lows in January against the European Union's common currency, which is used by 13 nations, including Germany and France.

Japan is expected to fight back, and this time will find the U.S. on its side. Though Japan has often been criticized in the past for manipulating the yen's value, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said last week that the yen's value now accurately reflects Japan's economic situation. Though the yen recently hit four-year lows against the dollar, and U.S. car makers have also complained about the currency's weakness, U.S. Treasury officials are reluctant to champion any artificial adjustment in the yen at a time when they are pushing for a market-valued yuan.

DOJ_NMG_0127829

Japan's timid recovery is part of the reason its currency is low. Rock-bottom interest rates, at 0.25%, have also made the currency a prime player in the global "carry trade," in which investors borrow in low-yielding currencies like the yen to invest in more lucrative currencies elsewhere. Carry trades further weaken the yen as traders sell off the currency. With domestic consumption and consumer-price data still muted, significant interest-rate rises from the Bank of Japan seem unlikely in the short term, so the yen will likely stay low.

That is a particular problem for countries that use the euro. Exports helped last year to power the euro bloc to its fastest economic growth since 2000. Policy makers worry a feeble yen, on top of the euro's recent rise against the dollar, will undercut that expansion. Manufacturing survey data for January show a stronger euro has already begun dampening export growth across the region.

A flagging yen also underscores the euro zone's widening disparities. Productivity increases and meager wage growth have helped Germany gain against reform laggards like France and Italy to become the world's largest exporter in terms of value. "We are more sensitive to the exchange rate because we are less good than Germany in terms of structural competitiveness," says Christian de Boissieu, chairman of the French Prime Minster's Council of Economic Analysis.

More fundamentally, as the euro strengthens simultaneously against the dollar and the yen, European policy makers worry the currency is unfairly bearing the burden of global imbalances. When the dollar slid last year, in part on fears of the U.S.'s huge trade deficit, Asian economies with trade surpluses and currencies pegged to the dollar helped stem the slide by buying dollars. At the same time, jittery investors world-wide switched dollar-denominated assets for euro ones, pushing up the European currency's value.

Trade Boom (WP)

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

THE STRONG growth in the U.S. economy reported this week for the last quarter of 2006, and the year as a whole, had a lot to do with burgeoning American exports. In the first 11 months of 2006, they reached $1.1 trillion, a 13 percent increase over the same period in 2005. Though the U.S. trade deficit is still huge, recent figures show exports growing at three times the rate of imports; sales to China are up by a third. Moreover, U.S. exports to the handful of countries with which there are free-trade agreements are booming disproportionately: Though Mexico, Canada, Chile and other free-trade-pact partners make up only 7 percent of the non-U.S. global economy, they are buying 42 percent of the American goods and services sold abroad.

All this good news is one reason congressional Democrats should support President Bush's request to renew his trade promotion authority, which expires July 1. The authority allows the president to negotiate bilateral and multilateral trade agreements and submit them to a single, up-or-down vote by Congress; without it, the deals Mr. Bush has cut with Latin American, Middle Eastern and Asian countries would have been impossible. Important bilateral trade pacts with South Korea, Malaysia and Thailand, which could give another big boost to American exports, probably won't be finished by midyear, so the extra time will be needed.

Much more important, quiet talks between Bush administration and European Union officials in recent weeks have raised hopes that the global trade negotiation known as the Doha round can be raised from the grave where it was buried last summer. Doha offers the promise of enormous benefits to U.S. exporters and the world economy as a whole. The World Bank has estimated that it could lift 10 million people out of poverty in the poorest nations. But it will require big cuts by rich countries in subsidies for agricultural exports in exchange for reductions in tariffs on industrial goods and services by middle-income countries such as Brazil and India.

Mr. Bush took an important step toward reviving Doha last week by proposing a new farm bill that would reduce U.S. agricultural subsidies by $18 billion in the next five years. The average annual funding in the bill is $17 billion, the ceiling U.S. negotiators have talked about in bargaining with the European Union. In exchange, Europe would be expected to reduce its subsidies by 54 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0127830

A lot of Democrats got elected in November by running against free trade; more than three dozen of them recently wrote to the new House Ways and Means Committee chairman, Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), asking for a reversal of "the troubling results of the administration's trade agreements and trade policies." Fortunately, Mr. Rangel and Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.) of the Senate Finance Committee appear to recognize the harm that would be caused if Congress torpedoed the Doha round. They have signaled a willingness to talk with the administration about the renewal of trade promotion authority; Mr. Bush, for his part, recognized in a speech last week that trade "can also lead to hardships for our workers and their families" and offered to work with Congress to improve assistance programs for those affected. With flexibility on both sides, a deal should be possible.

Chinese Official Warns Against Independence Of Courts (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 2 — "Enemy forces" are seeking to use China's legal system to Westernize and divide the country, and the Communist Party must fend them off by maintaining its dominance over lawyers, judges and prosecutors, China's top law and order official said in a detailed speech whose text was published Friday.

The official, Luo Gan, who is a member of the governing nine-man Politburo Standing Committee, said in an address published in the state-run magazine Seeking Truth that judicial officials had the responsibility to "prevent infiltration that might threaten national security."

Mr. Luo said that China is now part of the global community and that it must consider "international factors" when making judicial decisions. But he drew a sharp line between such interests and allowing greater leeway for lawyers, judges and prosecutors to make decisions independently as they do in the West.

"There is no question about where legal departments should stand," Mr. Luo said. "The correct political stand is where the party stands."

The speech appeared to amplify President Hu Jintao's past calls to guard against a Western-inspired "color revolution" of the kind that brought political change in Central Asia, Central Europe and Lebanon.

Lawsuits filed against party and government entities have sometimes made the courts a forum for public expressions of discontent.

Some Chinese lawyers and rights advocates have sought to use the country's laws and courts, which on paper resemble legal and judicial structures in place in Europe and the United States, to check abuses of power and enforce individual freedoms enshrined in China's Constitution.

China's highest profile cases attract attention from the media and international human rights groups that follow developments in China, which is especially sensitive given its designation as host of the 2008 Olympics.

In practice, prosecutors and judges answer to Political-Legal Committees run by the Communist Party. Verdicts in cases that involve delicate issues are decided by ranking party officials, often including Mr. Luo himself, Chinese legal experts say.

Some Chinese and Western legal scholars say the party's direct control may diminish over time, as courts handle millions of routine cases and establish legal precedents. But Mr. Luo gave no indication that party leaders are seeking to encourage a drift in that direction.

"Given the vital functions of political and legal organs, enemy forces always try to use them as the breaking point to Westernize and divide our country," Mr. Luo said. "Any mistake made by such organs may be used by enemy forces."

Despite his generally suspicious tone, Mr. Luo called on judicial authorities to be more attuned to the international impact of their decisions, while protecting foreign business and nongovernment organizations operating in China legally.

"Authorities should consider the possible international influence of and reaction to their decisions," he said.

But he listed a number of political challenges that he said would require closer integration between legal officials and other party and government units.

He said many people in China's more mobile and better educated society slipped through what he referred to as the "management net," mainly work units that once acted as the party's political eyes and ears. Officials need to restore more control over such people, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127831

"There can't be any 'free people' who are outside the management net," he said. In particular, he said, organizations that provide telecommunications and Internet services must take "full responsibility" for preventing the spread of harmful information.

Mr. Luo said the courts should play a bigger role in defusing mass incidents of social unrest by "safeguarding justice and fairness." That appeared to be a plea to resolve protest incidents through legal means rather than relying on police crackdowns.

But he echoed recent calls to punish the "tiny minority" of troublemakers who try to mobilize social discontent. And he dashed hopes that China is prepared to phase out its extrajudicial system of re-education through labor, which often singles out political activists who have not committed crimes.

He said this system, known as laojiao, should be improved, not scrapped.

Journalist Group Criticizes Press Freedoms Under Hu Jintao (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 2 — A leading media watchdog group on Friday accused President Hu Jintao of China of seeking to bring the media to heel and instigating an expanding crackdown on the press despite China's pledge to enhance media freedoms before the 2008 Olympics, which are to be held in Beijing.

Reporters Without Borders, based in Paris, said in its annual report on press freedoms that conditions for the news media and for journalists had deteriorated in China.

"The press is being forced into self-censorship, the Internet is filtered, and the foreign media very closely watched," the group said in the report, which was released Friday.

It continued, "Faced with burgeoning social unrest and journalists who are becoming much less compliant, the authorities, directed by President Hu Jintao, have been bringing the media to heel in the name of a 'harmonious society.' "

The group cited the five-year sentence given to a Hong Kong reporter, Ching Cheong, and a three-year sentence for Zhao Yan, a researcher in the Beijing bureau of The New York Times, among other efforts to intimidate journalists.

"In both cases they were convicted after shoddy trials with no defense witnesses," the group said.

In total, the group estimated that 31 journalists were serving jail terms in China and that the authorities had convicted 52 more people for posting political views on the Internet.

Other reporters have faced physical attacks by hired thugs associated with the local authorities or powerful business interests, and the police often fail to investigate the assaults, the group said.

Hu Urges Sudan To Act On Darfur Crisis (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

Hu Jintao, China's president, on Friday embarked on the most contentious leg of his African tour, visiting Sudan for the first time to buttress bilateral trade with a government accused of multiple human rights abuses in its western Darfur region.

Mr Hu's trip came amid western pressure on China to use its ties with Khartoum to influence the government to take greater steps to resolve the four-year conflict in Darfur.

The Chinese leader urged Khartoum, behind closed doors, to solve the crisis and pursue dialogue with rebel groups. But no public statement was made on the issue. Zhang Dong, China's ambassador in Khartoum, on Thursday told Xinhua news agency that China "never interferes in Sudan's internal affairs".

The focus of the trip was on economic issues, with China signing agreements to build two schools and a presidential palace, and provide loans of more than $70m, the Sudanese news agency said.

Billions of dollars of Chinese investment, particularly in the oil sector, have provided crucial support to President Omar al-Bashir's regime, enabling it to join the ranks of oil exporters and improve decaying infrastructure. Chinese companies are involved in building bridges, roads, government offices, a hydroelectric dam and an oil refinery, which the leaders visited on Friday.

But even in Sudan – where China is the biggest bilateral trading partner – some questioning the balance of the relationship. Sayed al-Khatib, director of the government's Centre for Strategic Studies said some feel Beijing has used the west's reluctance to invest in Sudan to over-charge on infrastructure projects and has failed to meet quotas on the employment of Sudanese in the oil sector.

DOJ_NMG_0127832

"Some people are not quite comfortable with the way China is holding to its end of the partnership but still people are grateful that at the time they came we didn't have anybody else," Mr Khatib said. "You could say it's not that bad but questions are being asked."

Sudan is China's third-largest trading partner in Africa, with bilateral trade exceeding $2.9bn (£1.5bn, €2.2bn) in 2006. Sudanese officials estimate Sudan's oil output is almost 500,000bpd, of which about two-thirds goes to China.

Beijing insists it has played a positive role in tackling the Darfur crisis but critics regard its relations with Sudan as an example of what they see as China's questionable role in Africa.

Trade between China and Africa reached a record $55bn last year but there are concerns that Beijing's unconditional support could help prop up rogue regimes. Others accuse China of looting Africa, while flooding the continent with cheap, low quality goods that will hamper the development of African manufacturers.

China's heavy investment in Sudan during the past decade contrasts with its treatment by the west as a pariah because of allegations it sponsored terrorism, its dire human rights record and a decades-long conflict in southern Sudan where its main oilfields are located.

Chinese President Pushes Sudan On Darfur (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

Chinese President Hu Jintao told Sudan's leader on Friday he must give the United Nations a bigger role in trying to resolve the conflict in Darfur and also said China wanted to do more business with its key African ally, Sudan state media reported.

In what appeared to be China's bluntest message to Sudan on the Darfur crisis, Hu urged President Omar al-Bashir in a face-to-face meeting to boost the U.N.'s "constructive role in realizing peace in Darfur" along with the African Union, the official Sudan news agency SUNA reported.

China buys two-thirds of Sudan's oil and is the largest investor in the country, giving it some leverage with al-Bashir's government. Sudan has defied a U.N. Security Council call for the underpowered African Union mission of 7,000 troops in the western region of Darfur to be taken over by a U.N. operation of 22,000 peacekeepers.

China usually refuses to mix human rights issues with diplomacy, but Hu has come under international pressure to use his clout with Sudan to push it to accept U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur. More than 200,000 people have been killed in four years of fighting in the region between rebels and the army, backed by the notorious janjaweed militia.

Human rights activists expressed concern ahead of Hu's eight-country tour of Africa that China is overlooking abuses to gain access to Africa's resources. Africa has become an important source of oil and other natural resources to feed China's rapid economic growth.

Sudanese officials briskly ushered journalists out of the room Friday when Hu began voicing his expectations on Darfur to al-Bashir. Later, a Sudanese official told The Associated Press that Hu had told al-Bashir his government "should work more earnestly to get the rebels who did not sign the Darfur peace agreement to join the peace process."

The government signed the peace agreement with one rebel group last May, but other rebels rejected the accord as inadequate and the conflict escalated.

This week, U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon urged Sudan to accept a compromise deal by which a U.N. force would deploy in Darfur in a "hybrid mission" with African peacekeepers. Ban has also asked China's U.N. ambassador for help in trying to persuade the Khartoum government.

U.S. Sen. Barbara Boxer urged Sudan Friday to accept a U.N.-led peacekeeping mission in Darfur.

"If the message the Chinese are bringing President Bashir is clear and is unequivocal that we need to move forward and they need to end this nightmare, it's going to be very positive," the California Democrat said of the meeting between the two leaders. Boxer was speaking at U.N. headquarters in New York.

Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol insisted that Hu's words on Darfur were not hostile.

DOJ_NMG_0127833

Akol told reporters after the meeting that Sudan was willing to see the mixed U.N. and African Union force deployed in Darfur "as soon as funding and troops were secured."

Diplomats in Khartoum said Hu's position on Darfur could be linked to Chinese concerns about Sudan's stability, as well as that of neighboring Chad. The Chinese have recently improved relations with Chad, which also has important oil reserves and is fighting rebels in eastern provinces. Chad has accused Sudan of backing its rebels — a charge that Khartoum denies.

Sudan wanted to draw attention to the trade and investment side of its relationship with China.

After meeting him at the airport, al-Bashir took Hu to the Chinese-built Friendship Hall, where they signed several accords. China undertook to build schools and a new presidential palace, reduced import tariffs on some Sudanese goods, granted a loan of $77.4 million for infrastructure, and gave a grant of $40 million.

SUNA reported that China also canceled about $80 million of Sudan's debt.

"China is more fair than the West in dealing with Sudan and its policy has helped boost both business and peace in the country," said al-Bashir, who pointedly praised Beijing for not interfering politically in African countries.

The two later visited what they referred to as the finest Sino-Sudanese achievement: the Khartoum refinery where 100,000 barrels of oil — a fifth of Sudan's production — are refined each day.

Jointly owned by Sudan and the Chinese National Petroleum Company, the refinery stands near the village of Aljaili about 43 miles north of Khartoum.

Hu's trip to Cameroon, Liberia, Sudan, Zambia, Namibia, South Africa, Mozambique and Seychelles began Jan. 30 and runs until Feb. 10.

——

Associated Press reporter Mohamed Osman in Khartoum contributed to this report.

China Offers Aid For 'Peaceful Resolution' Of Darfur Conflict (AFP)

By Mohammed Ali Saeed

AFP, February 3, 2007

Chinese President Hu Jintao has offered Sudan assistance for the peaceful resolution of the Darfur conflict but ignored Western pressure to make future aid conditional on the progress made.

"The African Union and the United Nations must play a constructive role in upholding peace in Darfur, advancing regional stability and improving the living conditions of the people," Hu told Sudanese counterpart Omar al-Beshir Friday, according to the website of state-run China Radio International.

"The Chinese side appreciates the efforts by the Sudanese government, the African Union, the United Nations and other concerned nations to resolve the Darfur problem," it quoted Hu as telling Beshir in their Khartoum talks.

"In resolving the Darfur question the following principles should be adhered to -- Sudan's sovereignty and territorial integrity should be respected and dialogue and consultations on the basis of equality should be upheld to peacefully resolve the issue."

Following talks between Hu and Beshir, China agreed to offer 40 million yuan (5.2 million dollars) in unspecified aid and materials for the peaceful resolution of the the Darfur question, the radio reported.

The two leaders held "frank, in-depth and fruitful" and reached "consensus... on major regional and international issues," China's official Xinhua news agency said.

The international community, led by Washington which accuses Khartoum of genocide in Darfur, had been hoping that Beijing would use its economic muscle to press Khartoum to accept the deployment of UN peacekeepers in Darfur, where African Union troops have failed to quell the bloodshed.

But Beshir has consistently rejected such a move, accusing Western powers of seeking to use the United Nations as a cover to invade his country and plunder its resources.

Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol said: "The two sides agreed to support the Addis Ababa agreement," referring to the accord calling for a hybrid UN-African Union force in the troubled western Sudanese region.

Hu said Beijing was pleased to see that Khartoum had scored "remarkable achievements in national reconciliation" and had "signed accords with several factions in the north, east and west, thus promoting social stability."

DOJ_NMG_0127834

Khartoum has yet to approve the final phase of the three-stage plan for UN forces to supplement the African contingent in Darfur.

More than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million fled their homes in Darfur as a result of a four-year-old war pitting ethnic minority rebels against government troops and their Arab militia allies.

But China's mild words on Darfur seem to underscore the Asian giant's no-strings-attached stance on doing business in Sudan.

China has agreed to give Sudan an interest-free loan of 100 million yuan (12.8 million dollars), Finance Minister Al-Zubair Ahmed Hassan told reporters.

Beijing also pledged increased cooperation in telecommunications, irrigation, energy and infrastructure, and promised to explore stepping up assistance in human resources, vocational training and health, Xinhua said.

"We are now officially economic partners," Beshir said before heading into his talks with Hu.

The agreements will further boost two-way trade that reached 2.9 billion dollars in the first 11 months of 2006.

China's energy-hungry economy -- the fourth largest in the world -- is badly in need of resources from Sudan and other African countries.

No other country has more clout on the Khartoum government than China, which takes 60 percent of Sudan's total oil output and has repeatedly used its UN Security Council veto power to block further sanctions on the regime.

The China National Petroleum Corporation has huge stakes in Sudan's oil industry, producing around 500,000 barrels per day. China is also building a dam on the Nile, which is currently Africa's largest hydro-electric project.

Hu received a warm welcome Thursday in Liberia, the second leg of his African tour after Cameroon.

Emphasising its commitment to Africa, China said this week it would write off debts owed by 33 African countries as part of a multi-billion-dollar pledge made last year.

Hu is due in Zambia on Saturday.

2 Americans Held, Kenya Official Says (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

MOGADISHU, SOMALIA — Two Americans were among at least 10 foreigners detained by Kenyan police at the Somalian border after allegedly fighting on the side of Somalia's ousted Islamist movement, an official said Friday.

One of the Americans is wanted in the U.S. on suspicion of links to radical movements, the Kenyan police official said.

Kenya said it seized the foreigners after they fled from Ethiopian troops who had helped oust the Islamists. It was preparing to deport them to their home countries.

One of the Americans was arrested with his 9-year-old child, the police official said. The U.S. Embassy had no comment.

Among the foreigners in custody were four Britons and people from France, Tunisia and Syria, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information. The date of their deportation had not been determined.

Violence has been escalating in Mogadishu, the Somalian capital. A bombing at an Islamic girls school killed a student Friday, and at least eight people were killed overnight in mortar attacks.

Censorship's New Clothes (NYT)

By Laila Lalami

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WHEN I went to visit my cousin in the capital, Rabat, in December, he was preparing for his pilgrimage to Mecca. He showed me the pamphlets he was reading to learn about the rituals and talked about how much he would miss his family while he was away.

As the afternoon wore on, the mood grew lighter, and he began to tell me jokes. "Did you hear the one about the Islamist whose wife has just delivered a daughter? He picks up his baby and says, 'Come here, my little bomb.' " My cousin chuckled as he said this — and so did I. It was an otherwise unremarkable afternoon, during which we shared funny stories satirizing our society.

DOJ_NMG_0127835

Yet two weeks ago, Driss Ksikes, the editor in chief of the weekly magazine Nichane, and Sanaa Al Aji, a journalist, were sentenced to three years' probation and a fine of more than $9,300 each, while Nichane was banned from publishing for two months — all for printing this joke, along with several others, in a cover article titled "Jokes: How Moroccans Make Fun of Religion, Sex and Politics."

The article, written by Ms. Al Aji, examined the role that jokes play in society and, quoting sociologists, stand-up comedians and intellectuals, concluded that "comedy is the most beautiful form of expression, inaccessible to censorship." Several insets included jokes about God, the Prophet Muhammad and the king, Mohammed VI. The magazine remained on newsstands for a week without incident.

Some religious conservatives started a small campaign online and on satellite news channels, calling for Nichane to be punished, while others passionately defended the magazine and signed petitions of support. A few days later, Nichane was shut down and its journalists taken to court for printing material that was deemed "offensive to the Islamic religion." As outrageous as the verdict was, it was light compared with what the state prosecutor was seeking: five years' prison time and a ban from practicing journalism for 10 years.

While the Nichane case was unfolding, another news magazine found itself in trouble. On three occasions, court bailiffs visited the offices of Le Journal Hebdomadaire to demand payment of a fine of more than $350,000.

A Casablanca court had called for the magazine to pay this sum to Claude Moniquet, the director of a small institute called the European Strategic Intelligence and Security Center. At issue was an article calling into question Mr. Moniquet's impartiality in a report he conducted about Western Sahara. The report was favorable to Morocco's position that this territory is part of its southern provinces.

In the United States, Morocco is often seen as a liberal country and a bulwark against Islamic extremism. Certainly, the reforms that have taken place over the last few years, particularly in terms of women's rights, are steps in the right direction.

But while the court cases against independent news magazines like Nichane, Le Journal Hebdomadaire and several others are within the bounds of Moroccan law, they appear to single out the independent press, to the exclusion of more partisan publications. These cases highlight a particularly troubling pattern, in which the regime represses the progressive voices it claims to champion.

Meanwhile, newspapers like Attajdid, the mouthpiece for an Islamic party, go unmolested, probably because they are careful to confine their criticism to social issues and generally avoid two of the three infamous "red lines" — the king and Western Sahara — that limit press freedom in Morocco. When it comes to the third taboo, Islam, such publications often set the tone for public debate, as they did during the Danish cartoons controversy.

The government then tries to prove that it, too, can defend Islamic values; hence the case against Nichane for printing jokes deemed offensive to the religion. It is a high-stakes game between the religious right and the government, and it is unclear which will come out the winner.

In a sign of the times, Nichane has retreated. The magazine has already announced that it will not appeal the court's decision, and it is likely that it will respect the "red lines" from now on. In contrast, Aboubakr Jamaï, Le Journal Hebdomadaire's besieged editor, resigned from his post in order to save his magazine. Since any salary he makes in Morocco can legally be seized to pay his colossal fine, he argued, he has to leave the country and work elsewhere. Morocco cannot afford to lose his voice.

The Bush administration has time and again referred to Morocco as a moderate Arab state that deserves to receive millions of dollars of taxpayers' money to encourage democratic reforms. American officials point to recent elections, changes in family law and a good growth rate as indicators of Morocco's success. But they turn a blind eye to problems of press freedom. A democracy cannot be established unless independent journalists, whatever their political beliefs, are allowed to work and publish freely.

Without freedom of expression, Morocco's reforms are merely a varnish. Underneath it lies the same old country.

Blair Vows To Stay Despite Scandal (WP)

By Mary Jordan

DOJ_NMG_0127836

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 2 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair said Friday he will not resign because of a growing scandal concerning his party's financing and added that "I am not going to beg for my character in front of anyone."

As calls for his resignation have intensified, Blair has said little publicly about a police investigation that has led to the arrests of close aides. But in a BBC radio interview Friday, he spoke in some detail, variously asking for patience and forcefully saying he wouldn't be hounded out of office. "The sensible thing" is to wait until the police finish their investigation, he said. In the meantime, "I am not going to get into a situation where I am pleading for my integrity."

Prime minister for nearly a decade, Blair said last year that he would resign before September. But many people here want him to leave now, as members of his own party publicly admit the damage this scandal is doing to his party.

"I think inevitably when you have this kind of thing going on for months and months, it does have a corrosive effect," Hazel Blears, the Labor Party leader, said in a televised interview.

Former Labor leader Neil Kinnock told reporters it will take years for the political system to recover from the damage the scandal has caused.

"He is no longer casting about for a legacy but trying to avoid leaving under a tremendous cloud," Anthony Howard, a political commentator, said in an interview.

Police have arrested four people from Blair's party on suspicion of involvement in the offering of seats in the House of Lords and other government honors in exchange for cash.

"I totally understand why this obviously is very distracting and somewhat obsessive for the media. It's bound to be. But it isn't for me," Blair said, noting he was still able to do his job.

There has been noticeable tension between police and the prime minister's office as the case has dragged on -- the first arrest came in July. Blair supporters, for instance, have publicly asked why officers who arrested Ruth Turner, the director of government relations in Downing Street, had to do it in the early morning.

In the interview, Blair urged people not to believe everything "ricocheting around the media" because, he said, it wasn't all true.

Blair said he was determined not to leave office early because of this police inquiry. "I don't think that's the right way to do it, and I think it would be particularly wrong to do it before the inquiry has even run its course and come to any conclusions. So you'll have to put up with me for a bit longer."

No one has been charged with a crime. All four of those arrested have denied wrongdoing.

Blair also said in the interview that he has "tried to do my best over the last 10 years" but that he has made "mistakes along the way." He added: "People can make up their mind about me according to what they think about me. But I know what type of person I am."

Serbia Rejects Plan That Could Lead To Kosovo Independence (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

PRISTINA, Kosovo, Feb. 2 — Serbia rejected a United Nations proposal on Friday that paves the way for an independent Kosovo, setting up a possible showdown between its supporter, Russia, and the West over the disputed territory's final status.

Serbia's response came almost immediately after a United Nations envoy, Martti Ahtisaari, presented the complex plan to politicians here and in Belgrade.

"I told Mr. Ahtisaari that Serbia and I, as its president, will never accept Kosovo's independence," President Boris Tadic said in a statement from Belgrade. He noted that while the plan does not mention statehood for Kosovo, it "opens the possibility for Kosovo's independence."

The proposal, which is still subject to weeks of negotiation between the two sides, will require Russian acquiescence in order to win Security Council approval. Russia, a permanent member of the Security Council with veto power over the plan, has until now backed Serbia's position that Kosovo must remain an integral, even if an autonomous, part of Serbia.

DOJ_NMG_0127837

A NATO bombing campaign stopped fighting between Serb and Kosovo Albanian forces in 1999 and put the disputed territory under United Nations administration. It has been in limbo since then. Mr. Ahtisaari's proposal is intended to finally fix the province's future, closing the last chapter of the 1990s Balkan wars.

While the plan does not mention independence, its provisions describe de facto statehood for Kosovo — providing for an army, constitution and flag — though it would still be protected by NATO and overseen by the international community for the indefinite future. The plan would also allow Kosovo to declare independence if the package is approved by the Security Council.

Mr. Ahtisaari avoided addressing the subject of independence on Friday at news conferences in Belgrade and Pristina, saying only that "there will be a clear definition of Kosovo's status when I submit my proposals to the Security Council."

He does not expect the provisions regarding Kosovo's status to change much before then, he said.

That shifts the onus to Russia and, to a lesser extent, China, both of which have supported Serbia's territorial claims — in part, over concerns about ethnically motivated secessionist movements in their own countries.

In Russia, officials have long said they would not back any solution that was not supported by Serbia, effectively ruling out a forced separation, even one that stopped short of outright independence.

By Friday evening, the Russian government had not responded officially, but Leonid E. Slutsky, deputy chairman of the international affairs committee of the lower house of Parliament, said that Mr. Ahtisaari's proposal was far from the last word. "It raises many questions," he said, according to Interfax, "and it appears to me that any haste in trying to implement this plan may bring negative consequences."

Mr. Ahtisaari did not give a timetable for taking the plan to the Security Council, but said he would set aside the rest of February for further negotiations with the two sides.

The proposal provides for the province's United Nations administration to be replaced by an International Civilian Representative who would have veto power over all government decisions for an indefinite period. It also foresees a multiethnic Kosovo security force of 2,500 troops and 800 reserves as well as a domestic intelligence agency to monitor threats to internal security.

The plan calls for the disbanding of the Kosovo Protection Force, which consists primarily of former fighters from the Kosovo Liberation Army, which fought Serbia and has been charged with human rights violations against Serbs.

Kosovo Serbs in six municipalities would be granted wide autonomy powers, including the right to receive financial donations and technical assistance from Serbia. The proposal would also establish more than 40 "protected zones" limiting building and commercial activity around Serbian churches and monasteries.

A constitution, to be written by a 21-member Constitutional Commission, will need a two-thirds majority for approval by Kosovo's Parliament. Kosovo Serbs and other minorities will be consulted on the document.

Serbs and other minorities would also be guaranteed seats in the Parliament and have the power to block legislation of "special interest" to them. But Mr. Ahtisaari said the provision could not be used to block more important measures like the constitution or a declaration of Kosovo's independence.

In Belgrade the mood was glum. Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica, who refused to meet with Mr. Ahtisaari, called the proposal "illegitimate," saying that it violated the United Nations Charter because it would divide Serbia and "redraw its internationally recognized borders."

The proposal was met with only muted optimism in Pristina. "Kosovo will be sovereign like all other countries," said Kosovo's president, Fatmir Sejdiu, after meeting with Mr. Ahtisaari. The territory's prime minister, Agim Ceku, said the document "is very clear for Kosovo's future."

Not everyone is so sure. Albin Kurti, a Kosovo Albanian whose Movement for Self-Determination has called for protests against the proposal on Feb. 10, said Mr. Ahtisaari's slow approach would give Serbia time to strengthen its hold on Kosovo's Serb areas and "lead to more conflicts."

U.N. Envoy Unveils Kosovo Proposal (AP)

By Garentina Kraja, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127838

Kosovo took its first tentative steps on the road to becoming what would look very much like a sovereign nation Friday after a U.N. envoy unveiled a blueprint for the future of the tense, ethnically divided Balkan province.

The plan's architect, former Finnish President Martti Ahtisaari, did not explicitly mention Kosovo's independence from Serbia in the proposal he presented to Serbian and ethnic Albanian leaders.

But his 58-page roadmap spelled out conditions for internationally supervised self-rule — complete with the trappings of nationhood, including a flag, anthem, army and constitution and the right to apply for membership in international organizations. It envisions a Kosovo "governing itself democratically and with full respect for the rule of law."

Both Serbia's pro-Western president, Boris Tadic, and its nationalist prime minister, Vojislav Kostunica, immediately rejected the plan and reasserted the country's claims to Kosovo as the heart of the ancient Serb homeland.

"I told Mr. Ahtisaari that Serbia and I, as its president, will never accept Kosovo's independence," Tadic declared in a statement hours after meeting with the envoy in Belgrade. Kostunica denounced the plan as "illegitimate."

In Pristina, Kosovo's provincial capital, President Fatmir Sejdiu said he and other leaders expected Kosovo to become an independent state soon, and pledged to guarantee the rights and security of its small 100,000-member Serb minority.

Kosovo's ethnic Albanian majority has long pressed for independence and fought a bloody war with Serbia in the late 1990s. Yet the mood was muted in the province Friday.

"It's good, but we're a bit reserved," said Lutfi Maloku, 40, an ethnic Albanian technician. "It wasn't called independence and it allows for the Serb minority, which accounts for 5 percent, to hold lots of power."

Kosovo's prime minister, Agim Ceku, was also disappointed by some aspects of the plan. "What Ahtisaari described is a sovereign state, an independent state," he said. "However, this document does not entail all our expectations, all our demands, what belongs to us. We will do everything so that his final document at the Security Council reflects in its entirety the will of Kosovo's people."

Describing his proposal as a draft subject to change, Ahtisaari said he would invite the rival sides to meet again on Feb. 13 for negotiations. He said he hoped to present a package to the U.N. Security Council — which will have the final say on Kosovo's future status — by the end of March.

Approval there would set the stage for the U.S. and other countries to formally recognize Kosovo's independence. But there are concerns the plan may, instead, trigger a showdown between the United States — long an advocate of an independent Kosovo — and Russia, a traditional ally of Serbia. Russia is one of five permanent Security Council members which hold veto power.

Kostunica has threatened to cut off diplomatic ties with any country that recognizes Kosovo as an independent state.

Ahtisaari, acknowledging that both sides remain far apart, conceded it could be difficult to come up with a settlement both sides could accept. "I think that might require so much time that I don't think I have years in my life to achieve (it)," he said.

His remark seemed to signal that the Security Council could wind up imposing some kind of settlement.

The European Union called on both the Serbs and ethnic Albanians to be ready to compromise on the issue of Kosovo's future. "Both sides must demonstrate responsibility, flexibility and a recognition of the need for realistic compromised-based solutions," the EU said in a statement.

The United States praised the plan as "fair and balanced," and also called on both sides to work toward a settlement.

Kosovo has been a U.N. protectorate since 1999, when NATO airstrikes stopped Serbia's crackdown on separatist ethnic Albanian rebels. Nearly 10,000 ethnic Albanians were killed in the Serbian onslaught, and nearly 1 million were forced to flee their homes.

Ahtisaari's plan would protect Serbian Orthodox Church sites and the Serbian language in the province. Ethnic Albanians, secular Muslims, account for 90 percent of Kosovo's 2 million population.

The plan would also grant the 200,000 Serbs who fled Kosovo after the war in the wake of revenge attacks by Albanians "the right to return and reclaim their property and personal possessions."

For Serbs, the plan outlines "a high degree of control" over their own affairs by granting them six new Serb-administered municipalities and a greater voice in the higher education and health systems. Serbs also would be granted "extensive municipal autonomy in financial matters, including the ability to accept transparent funding from Serbia."

DOJ_NMG_0127839

The plan recommends the establishment of an international representative — similar to the office set up in Bosnia after that country's bloody 1992-95 war — to oversee day-to-day affairs.

It also includes provisions for a 2,500-member Kosovo security force which would be overseen by NATO, which now maintains 16,500 peacekeepers in the province.

___

Associated Press writers Dusan Stojanovic, Jovana Gec and Misha Savic in Belgrade and William J. Kole in Vienna contributed to this story.

___

On the Net:

U.N. envoy for Kosovo, http://www.unosek.org

U.N. Kosovo Proposal Tries To Appease All Sides (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

Serbia, backed by Russia and China, says it won't accept independence.

UNITED NATIONS — A U.N. envoy unveiled a blueprint for Kosovo's future Friday that gives the province de facto independence without formal sovereignty, a compromise between the Serbian government's demand for control and the majority Albanians' wish for nationhood.

The road map for Kosovo's future does not mention independence from Serbia but provides the outlines of internationally supervised self-rule.

The ethnically divided province, where nine out of 10 people are ethnic Albanian, will have its own flag, anthem, army, constitution and membership in international organizations.

The 58-page plan provides for a NATO-led peacekeeping force to help ensure "a safe and secure environment … as long as necessary," plus an appointed international representative who would supervise the transition and have veto power over the Kosovo government.

It would allow Kosovo to declare independence with Security Council approval, but Russia — a veto-holding member — opposes statehood.

Though nominally a province of Serbia, Kosovo has been administered by the United Nations since U.S.-led NATO forces drove out the Serbian military in 1999 to protect Albanian residents from "ethnic cleansing" at the hands of the Belgrade government.

The architect of the U.N. plan, former Finnish President Martti Ahtisaari, presented the proposal Friday to Serbian and Kosovo Albanian leaders, after months of negotiations, saying it was as close as the two sides could get.

The positions of the opposing parties are "extremely fixed," Ahtisaari said. He invited both sides to meet again Feb. 13 in Vienna for final negotiations on a settlement that would be acceptable to all, but he hinted that the talks had reached their limit.

"I think that might require so much time that I don't think I have years in my life to achieve" it, he said.

Serbia's pro-Western president, Boris Tadic, and its nationalist prime minister, Vojislav Kostunica, rejected the plan Friday and vowed that Kosovo would never be independent.

"I told Mr. Ahtisaari that Serbia and I, as its president, will never accept Kosovo's independence," Tadic said in a statement after meeting with the U.N. envoy in Belgrade.

Kostunica refused to meet Ahtisaari, whom he accused of being biased against Serbia, and declared the plan "illegitimate."

The prime minister threatened to cut off diplomatic ties with any country that recognizes Kosovo as an independent state.

In Kosovo's capital, Pristina, President Fatmir Sejdiu said the plan set Kosovo on the path to independence and pledged to protect the rights of the minority Serbs if it did become a nation.

"Kosovo will be sovereign like all other countries," he said after meeting with Ahtisaari.

DOJ_NMG_0127840

The Security Council will have the final say on Kosovo's status, but Russia has said it will not support the plan if Serbia, a traditional ally, opposes it. China also has sided with Serbia, out of fear that Kosovo's secession could encourage its own minorities in Xinjiang and Tibet.

That foreshadows a stalemate on the council, with the U.S. and Europe supporting independence for the province.

U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack praised the plan as "fair and balanced," and called on both sides to work toward an agreement.

The European Union said that resolving the status of Kosovo would be crucial to securing the region's stability and urged Pristina and Belgrade to be serious about reaching a settlement. "Both sides must demonstrate responsibility, flexibility and a recognition of the need for realistic compromise-based solutions," said a statement from the EU presidency, held by Germany.

The Security Council will meet with Ahtisaari this month after the Vienna meeting but will not formally take up the issue until March, said Slovakian Ambassador Peter Burian, the council's president for February.

Debt Is Key To Kosovo's Status (FT)

By Neil MacDonald

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

The future status of Kosovo must open the way for international financing to repair its fragile economy, Martti Ahtisaari, the United Nations envoy for the province, said on Friday.

Although he avoided mentioning "independence", his settlement, to be put before the UN Security Council, would bestow most of the attributes of independent statehood on the territory, which is 90 per cent ethnic Albanian.

While UN membership might be hard to achieve, Kosovo would be able to join institutions such as the International Monetary Fund, opening the way for credit and possibly foreign investment.

The UN has governed Kosovo since Nato aerial bombing forced out Serb forces in 1999.

"Everyone in Kosovo agrees that the dire economic situation needs most urgent attention," Mr Ahtisaari told reporters after presenting his draft status plan in Belgrade. "The settlement outlines provisions designed to promote sustainable economic development, including Kosovo's ability to apply for membership in international financial institutions," he said.

As expected, the plan mostly outlines protections for ethnic minorities, particularly Kosovo Serbs, who account for about 5 per cent of the population. However, roughly a quarter of the document deals with unresolved economic questions – including what to do about debt inherited from the former Yugoslavia, amounting to nearly €1bn ($1.3bn, £660m).

The European Union wants to see the debt question cleared up before taking charge of a new supervisory mission to monitor the local authorities after the close-down of the UN Interim Mission in Kosovo.

The question of ex-Yugoslav debt could flare up if Kosovo's parliament follows up the UN status resolution by declaring independence. The seceding province's debt servicing to international financial institutions and Paris and London club creditors would cost it between €50m and €100m per year, UN officials say.

Serbia currently foots most of these bills and might continue doing so to shore up its sovereignty claims.

Until the end of the 1980s, Yugoslavia drew heavily on loans from multilateral institutions to pay for industrial expansion and comparatively high living standards for a socialist country. Kosovo's inherited share is about 7 per cent of Serbia's current total external debt, according to the Serbian central bank.

But negotiators for the losing side of the war still view the ex-Yugoslav debt as a bargaining chip to block independence. Nenad Popovic, chief economist on the Serbian negotiating team, has said servicing the Kosovo debt costs Serbia nearly $100,000 per day.

The lack of a debt agreement drains Serbia and also hinders restructuring for Kosovo's underdeveloped economy, say IMF officials.

Mr Ahitsaari's plan follows the formula established for debt settlement after the earlier secessions of ex-Yugoslav republics – Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia – in the early 1990s.

"Once Serbia agrees to the principle, it's easy," said Joachim Ruecker, head of the United Nations interim mission in Kosovo.

DOJ_NMG_0127841

Bay Of Pigs Vets Fight To Outlast An Ailing Castro (WSJ)

By Lucette Lagnado

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

MIAMI -- Last December, a group of veterans of the 1961 Bay of Pigs invasion gathered for a board meeting at their small museum in Little Havana memorializing the event, and heard a bombshell announcement.

The Brigadistas, as veterans of the failed attempt to topple Fidel Castro are known, had just observed a minute of silence in memory of comrades killed in the failed attack when their president delivered the news they had been waiting to hear for 48 years.

"Fidel Castro esta muerto," -- Fidel Castro is dead, said Felix Rodriguez. Mr. Rodriguez, a retired CIA officer, said his sources had informed him that the Cuban dictator had passed away on Dec. 3, at 4 a.m.

The men were jubilant.

The report, of course, was false, and the Brigadistas' elation reverted to the melancholy they have felt for so many years as they have waited for their old nemesis to be gone.

Since July, when Mr. Castro, who has ruled the island since 1959, fell ill and ceded power to his younger brother, these unrepentant Cold Warriors have been in suspense, waiting.

The Brigadistas have long lived with the hope of resuming their lives in a free Cuba. But today, many surviving members are just hoping to be buried there. The 80-year-old Mr. Castro's illness has given them a new lease on life.

Jorge Marquet, who is 76, has been saving a bottle of Dewar's 12-year-old Scotch for the occasion of Mr. Castro's death. When the time comes, Nilo Messer, a devout Catholic, is planning to go to church and pray.

William Muir-Celorio, 62, a Brigadista who hasn't smoked in 25 years, says he has put aside an expensive, "non-Cuban" cigar to light up at an appropriate moment.

"Jews say, 'Next year in Jerusalem.' " We say, 'Next year in Havana,' " says Mr. Muir-Celorio, a software developer.

Some say they are planning to be on the first plane to Cuba, to fight if they have to. Mr. Rodriguez says that, at about 250 pounds, he is out of shape and currently on a diet. "We can hold a rifle, but we can't run up a hill," Mr. Rodriguez says.

Rodolfo Llorente, 68, who has scars on his chest from heart surgery, is prepared to do what he can to bring about a regime change. "I would go to the Brigada and say, "Let us go and help the Cuban people," he says.

The museum, which opened in 1986, has become a social club, a brotherhood, a charity, and a senior center for the lonely veterans of Brigade 2506, as the force is known. These days, it is also a makeshift mausoleum for those too poor to afford a proper burial.

The original U.S.-trained force that entered Cuba in the spring of 1961 was about 1,500 strong, according to Esteban Bovo, the Brigade's historian, though many more, he says, were associated with the battle. Mr. Castro was ready for them and waged a fierce fight even as promised U.S. air cover failed to materialize. Stranded, members of the Brigade were taken prisoner and held for 20 months.

When they returned to the U.S., many were tormented -- and remained so. Some committed suicide; others fell into alcoholism or homelessness. Several joined the armed forces, or pursued the American Dream by becoming professionals. But others took whatever menial jobs they could find -- waiter, busboy, porter. In 1972, a few of the men became Watergate burglars.

The small ranch house that is home to the museum, donated by a wealthy Brigade member, is their hangout. They don't get many visitors, just a few stray tourists who wander in to look at the photos of the dead and an assortment of articles and artifacts chronicling the invasion. On display is the Brigade 2506 flag members gave to President John F. Kennedy when he visited them in Florida upon their release.

Now in their 60s, 70s and 80s, some Brigadistas are barely scraping by.

Because they were part of a covert army recruited and trained by the CIA, they were never entitled to the benefits veterans of the armed services enjoy -- from health care to burial.

"I never thought I was going to stay in this country for so long. I lived day by day," says Mr. Marquet. As treasurer of the Bay of Pigs Museum, he earns a salary of $16,800 a year. His only other income is his Social Security check.

DOJ_NMG_0127842

Over the years, the Brigadistas have longed for respectability in the form of U.S. veterans' status. Miami Congresswoman Ileana Ros-Lehtinen tried years ago to obtain limited federal benefits for Brigadistas, such as access to Veterans Administration hospitals, but to no avail. She says she is getting ready to try again.

Because of their age, many now qualify for Medicare. Carlos Garrido, a Brigade member and a doctor, set up a practice in Miami. He welcomed ailing Brigadistas, treating them at little or no cost to them.

"Most of the Brigade is poor," says Dr. Garrido, 67, "I tried to help as much as I can."

Some groups, such as Filipinos who fought alongside U.S. forces in the Philippines in World War II have received veteran's status. But major veterans groups are skeptical. "It boils down to are you or aren't you a member of the five armed services -- and they are not," says Joe Davis, a spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars service organization.

The CIA is more friendly. "As a general rule, retirement benefits are paid only to those individuals with an established status as employees of the Central Intelligence Agency. Members of Brigade 2506 don't qualify. That is a point of law and is no way a reflection of their courage," a CIA spokeswoman said.

Death is always on the Brigadistas' minds, not just Mr. Castro's but their own.

As caretaker of the Bay of Pigs Museum, 72-year-old Juan Torres-Mena answers the phones, cleans the toilets and dusts the rows of faded pictures that line the walls of this one-room shrine to one of the great fiascos in U.S. military history.

And when remains of Brigadistas arrive from the local cremation service, it is also Mr. Torres-Mena's job to pour the ashes into one of the new wooden "urns" stacked neatly on the floor in an office.

The containers are kept out of sight from visitors, on a desk in the president's office, even as the Brigadistas try to raise money to build a real mausoleum. "Maybe we take them to Cuba," Mr. Torres-Mena adds.

These days, Mr. Rodriguez is part fund-raiser, part museum administrator, part funeral director. The Brigade owns a parcel of land in a Miami cemetery, where members are buried two by two, one on top of the other. But traditional funerals are costly, so he has negotiated a price on cremations, he says, pointing to the prepaid cremation certificates he keeps in his desk.

"I bought another 20 in advance," he says.

He doesn't mind having the ashes around, he says. "They don't make any noise; they are friends of ours."

Waiting, And Waiting, For Fidel (LAT)

By Tim Cavanaugh

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

HERE'S A prediction you can take straight to the bank: One day, Fidel Castro will die. Until that time, the watch over the Cuban dictator's long-expiring body continues.

This week, it heated up, even without new evidence from el jefe's doctors. On Monday, Miami City Commissioner Tomas Regalado suggested that the Orange Bowl be made available, on Castro's death, as a venue for "helping a community celebrate." Meanwhile, a news conference about security at the Super Bowl in Miami got hung up on how the Magic City might react if Castro died during the big game.

Together, these stories produced the singular notion that the Super Bowl would be doubling as a venue for a celebration of the old revolutionary's death. By Tuesday, the proposed fiesta was talk-show fodder, and the city began downsizing, or at least re-characterizing, its Castro death contingency plan.

Inevitably, Castro got the last laugh. Late Tuesday, Cuban state television released footage of the president-for-life looking slightly stronger than he had during his last appearance.

Two things are notable in this hiccup of Castro eschatology: It was not motivated by any actual news, and this is not unusual. So flammable is the Duraflame of the Castro deathwatch that it can ignite spontaneously, at any time. A rumor circulating in late December, for example, held that the ailing leader was already dead and that the Cuban government was merely waiting to make the announcement on New Year's Day as a tie-in with the anniversary of the revolution (which we know from our readings in Cuban history — or from "The Godfather II" — occurred Jan. 1, 1959). Google "Castro is dead" and you'll get more than 62,000 results, going back many years. And whatever you do, don't open the "Castro is dead" spam; it contains a nasty virus.

DOJ_NMG_0127843

"Growing up in Miami, you would always hear these rumors that Fidel had died," said Juan Carlos Saizarbitoria, co-producer of "East of Havana," a documentary about the Rap Cubano festival. "I always thought it was going to end with a whimper, and it looks like that's what's happening."

Prominent members of the Cuban exile community are in fact opposing the Orange Bowl celebration plan and the deathwatch in general because they focus too much attention on Castro, who has already devolved his responsibilities onto his brother, Raul. "That he looked healthy in the latest footage has no bearing on the fact that he can't command the country anymore, and probably won't be able to come back to full power," said Ramon Saul Sanchez, leader of the Miami-based Movimiento Democracia. "The focus now should be on Raul and what he's going to do."

That's unlikely to stop wave after wave of rumors about a frozen corpse, "Weekend at Bernie's"-style trick photography and state secrets that have bypassed the mainstream media and gone straight to a friend of your friend in Union City, N.J. "Listening to Spanish-language radio in town, people call in with all kinds of theories," said Frank Calderon, a Miami-based blogger who runs castrodeathwatch.com.

Such speculating in a news vacuum has a long pedigree. A.J. Liebling's 1953 column, "Death on the One Hand," details the way U.S. media filled thousands of column inches with skylarking over a single datum — that Josef Stalin had suffered a stroke — and no further information. (Stalin subsequently died, or so the official record would have us believe.) Liebling's conclusion — "no-news is more voluminous than news" — applies in any situation in which information is both finite and unknown.

To this ancient game, Castro and his watchers bring generations of built-up agon and emotional commitment. The dictator's death will almost certainly occasion a mass public outpouring in Miami, where residents (and their elected officials) are in the position of people crouched and waiting at a surprise party: Every floor creak sounds like the arrival of the guest of honor.

And the guest will retain, probably until his last breath, a genius for working the media and humiliating his enemies. This week's uptick in the deathwatch leaves just one question: Did Fidel, maybe, plan it this way?

"He wouldn't mind causing a little chaos here in Miami, letting people think he died just to cause trouble," Calderon said. "I have my own theory about why he was out of sight for so long before this new footage. Perhaps there was some kind of loyalty test, to see who would make a move when they thought he was dead."

Tim Cavanaugh is assistant editor of the editorial pages.

Bomb Resonates With Diplomats, Not With The Bomber (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

THERE are not many places where a man convicted in the bombing of a commercial airliner that killed 73 people can be found roaming the streets. This city, home to Freddy Lugo, is one of them.

Mr. Lugo, like an uneasy memory from the cold war, is tucked away here, obscure to most of his countrymen but not completely forgotten. He was one of two men sentenced to 20 years in prison for placing explosives on a DC-8 jetliner flown by Cubana Airlines in 1976.

The plane blew up in the sky above Barbados, killing everyone on board, including two dozen members of Cuba's national fencing team and a 9-year-old Guyanese girl. That explosion, considered the first act of midair terrorism in the Americas, poisons relations between Havana and Washington to this day.

Mr. Lugo, 65, who was released in 1993 after 17 years in prison, has tried to put the past behind him. "I have a tranquil life now," he said in a rare 90-minute interview, his eyes darting around him, at a bakery cafe near his home. "I have a clean conscience."

But the past has a way of catching up with him. There is the occasional journalist to contend with, and glimmers of recognition from among the many Cubans who live here. As many Americans would recognize Mohamed Atta if he were alive and walking the streets of New York, to Venezuelans, Mr. Lugo's face is haunting.

DOJ_NMG_0127844

A new book on the Cubana bombing, called "Terrorist of the Bush Family," by two Venezuelan journalists, Alexis Rosas and Ernesto Villegas, has not helped either. The book has become a best seller since its release here last November. It has focused new attention on the bombing and the request by Venezuela for Washington to extradite the Cuban exile accused of masterminding the bombing, Luis Posada Carriles, to face terrorism charges here.

So far the Bush administration has refused, and Mr. Posada Carriles, 78, a naturalized Venezuelan citizen who sneaked into the United States in 2005, currently sits in a jail in southern New Mexico on immigration charges.

PRESIDENT HUGO CHÁVEZ'S government, a staunch Cuban ally these days, says the difficulty in extraditing Mr. Posada Carriles illustrates American hypocrisy in battling terrorists. Likewise, Cuba's government points to documents that show the C.I.A. had knowledge that such an attack was being plotted in Caracas.

Since the book's publication, academic researchers and reporters have tried more than ever to track down Mr. Lugo for interviews, but he has almost always turned them away, preferring the banality of an anonymous life.

Mr. Lugo, who drives a gypsy cab to make ends meet, has tried his best to remain in the shadows of the diplomatic uproar surrounding Mr. Posada Carriles, whom he described simply as "an adventurer, capable of anything."

Despite his conviction, Mr. Lugo said he considered himself a pawn in the machinations of Cuban exiles to topple Fidel Castro. Along with many of those Cubans, Mr. Lugo, a Venezuelan, found himself in Caracas in the 1970s.

Ann Louise Bardach, a journalist and authority on Cuban politics, called the Caracas of that era the Casablanca of the Caribbean, as the city attracted a sordid collection of spies, guerrillas and drug traffickers.

It was here that Mr. Lugo, then a news photographer, met the man who recruited him for the bomb plot, a fellow Venezuelan journalist named Hernán Ricardo Lozano, according to police records.

Mr. Ricardo, it turned out, had been working on the side for Mr. Posada Carriles, doing photography and surveillance. Mr. Posada Carriles had a long history as a C.I.A. operative in the 1960s before moving to Caracas, where he became chief of operations at Venezuela's secret intelligence police, Disip, in the 1970s.

"My life would have taken a completely different path if I had never met Hernán Ricardo," Mr. Lugo said.

The two men boarded Cubana Airlines Flight 455 on Oct. 6, 1976, in Port-of-Spain, the capital of Trinidad and Tobago. They got off in Barbados, where the plane stopped en route to Havana. Before leaving the plane, they left C-4 plastic explosive in a camera bag and a tube of Colgate toothpaste on board, according to statements obtained by the police in Trinidad after the two men were arrested there in the days after the attack.

"We have an explosion," the Cubana pilot said with fear in his voice in a recording of the plane's last frantic moments before it crashed into the Caribbean. The recording, broadcast repeatedly here and in Havana last October in remembrances of the 30th anniversary of the episode, continued: "We are descending immediately. We have fire on board."

Documents recently obtained by the National Security Archive in Washington describe some of the mundane organizational details involved in the bombing. In questioning by Trinidadian police officials, Mr. Lugo said Mr. Ricardo had "told him he was going to blow up a Cubana airplane." He said he saw Mr. Ricardo "kneading a handful of something looking like dough" before boarding the flight.

Mr. Ricardo, after slitting his left wrist in a suicide attempt while in police custody in Port-of-Spain, said that he had been paid $16,000 for the job and that Mr. Lugo had received $8,000.

AN intelligence report prepared by Clarence Kelly, the F.B.I. director at the time, suggested that Mr. Posada Carriles had attended meetings in Caracas where the bombing was planned.

The report, quoting an informant in Caracas, said Mr. Ricardo had called Orlando Bosch, another Cuban exile in Caracas charged with planning the bombing, saying, "A bus with 73 dogs went off a cliff and all got killed."

Mr. Bosch was eventually cleared by Venezuelan courts and lives quietly in Miami, having been spared from deportation in 1990 by the administration of President George H. W. Bush, who was the C.I.A. director at the time of the bombing.

Mr. Posada Carriles escaped from prison here in 1985 and made his way to Central America, and from there entered the United States in 2005 and was caught.

Mr. Ricardo served 17 years along with Mr. Lugo. Today his whereabouts are hard to ascertain, though Mr. Lugo said he believed he had left Venezuela.

DOJ_NMG_0127845

FOR his part, Mr. Lugo divides his time now between an apartment where he lives with his wife, in an elegant if decaying building on a quiet, tree-lined street, and his son's home in a poor district. He says he avoids any involvement in politics.

He says his taxi, an aging beige sedan, is his only source of income. His journalist friends still greet him and shake his hand, he said, even though they know of his history. He is missing a few teeth, but otherwise appears younger than his 65 years. A recently discovered heart ailment, he said, had made him a teetotaler.

Asked if he felt remorse over the deaths of 73 people, including many teenagers on the Cuban fencing team, Mr. Lugo said he did not. He explained somewhat cryptically that he considered himself manipulated in an act beyond his control. "I am a normal man," he said. "I am innocent."

Others disagree. "Freddy Lugo may not want to admit it, but he's a mass murderer," said José Pertierra, a lawyer in Washington representing Venezuela's government in its attempt to extradite Mr. Posada Carriles. "He can claim he wasn't the mastermind; maybe he can claim he was duped. But he participated in a terrorist act that killed 73 people."

DOJ_NMG_0127846

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Pentagon Official Who Criticized Detainee Lawyers Quits (WP) .. 3
Official Quits After Remark On Lawyers (NYT) 3
Guantanamo Remarks Cost Policy Chief His Job (CNN)..... 4
Guantanamo Remarks Lead To Resignation (LAT) 4
High-profile Guantanamo Detainees Face New Charges (AP)..... 4
"Torture Victim" Seeks US Justice (BBC)..... 5

Homeland Response:

Man Was Arming For 'war,' FBI Says (SLPD)..... 6
Cost Of House-Passed Terror Bill Touches Off A Partisan Clash (NYT) 7
House Security Bill Tagged At $21 Billion (WT) 8
9/11 Security Could Cost $21 Billion (CNN) 8
Court Clears Way For Suit On New Orleans Flooding (NYT) 9

War News:

Bleak Iraq Report Is Sent To Congress (WP)..... 9
Analysis Is Bleak On Iraq's Future (NYT) 11
The Analysis: On The "Polarization" Of Iraqis And Their "Ready Recourse To Violence" (NYT) 13
U.S. Spy Chiefs Issue Grim Report On Iraq (LAT)..... 14
Intelligence Estimate Warns On Quick Iraq Pullout (WT)..... 17
Iraq Conflict Has Elements Of "civil War" (FT) 18
Elements Of "Civil War" In Iraq (BBC) 18
Analysts: Iraq Report Lays Out Tough Road For Success (CNN)19
Iraq, And Analysis, Revisited (WP)..... 20
No Way Out (NYT)..... 21
Bush To Request Billions For Wars (WP)..... 22
Record $622 Billion Budget Requested For The Pentagon (NYT)23
Rifts Emerge On Iran Policy (WSJ) 24
U.S. Can't Prove Iran Link To Iraq Strife (LAT)..... 25
Defense Secretary Says Carrier Dispatch To Gulf Meant To Dramatize Commitment There (AP) 26
Defense Secretary: No Plans For War With Iran (CNN) 27
Gates All But Rules Out Strike On Iran (WT)..... 27
Kurds Train For Battle With Iran (AP) 28
Iran Installs Equipment For Large-Scale Uranium Enrichment (NYT) 29
Diplomats: Iran Working On Uranium Plant (AP) 30
Chirac's Iran Gaffe Reveals A Strategy: Containment (NYT)..... 31
Republicans Plan To Block Iraq Debate (NYT) 32
Warner To Help Block His Own Resolution On Iraq (WT)..... 33
U.S. Copter Crash In Iraq Kills 2 In Fourth Such Incident This Year (WP) 34
2 Killed As U.S. Helicopter Is Shot Down Near Baghdad (NYT) . 34
2 U.S. Troops Killed In Latest Helicopter Crash In Iraq (LAT)..... 35
Groundfire Downs Another U.S. Copter; Kills 2 Troops (WT/AP) 37
Another U.S. Helicopter Lost In Iraq (AP)..... 38
Iraqi Army Brigades Not At Full Strength (LAT)..... 39
Gates Says Not Enough Iraqi Troops Arriving In Baghdad (AP). 40
Troops Aim To Oust Taliban From Town (AP) 40
Afghan Town Is Overrun By Taliban (NYT)..... 41
Taliban Militants Overrun Town After British Exit (WT/AP) 42
Afghan District 'Under Taliban Control': Defence Ministry (AFP) 42
Pakistan Says Taliban Activity Is Hard To Stop (NYT)..... 43
Pakistan To Fence Border Of Afghanistan (AP)..... 43

DOJ:

Challenge To U.S. Attorney Appointment Should Be Dismissed, Filing Says (ADG) 44

Corporate Scandals:

Siemens Faces Scrutiny In U.S. (WSJ)..... 45
Sumner Redstone Settles Suit With Son Over Family's Fortune (WSJ) 46

Criminal Law:

Federal Prosecutors Widen Pursuit Of Death Penalty As States Ease Off (WSJ)..... 47
Stay Of Executions (LAT) 48
Federal Jury Finds Former Secretary Guilty In Theft Of Coca-Cola Secrets (FINDLAW/AP)..... 49
Coke Worker Guilty Of Stealing Secrets (FT)..... 50
Ex-Duracell Worker Stole Trade Secrets (AP)..... 50
Mover Shot By Prince George's Official Dies (WP)..... 50
Official Has History Of Altercations, Sources Say (WP)..... 51
Feds Tout Results In Crime Crackdown (NOTP) 53
Va. Men Plead Guilty In Fake Purse Scam (WP)..... 54
Barry Rejects Offer, Maintains Innocence (WP)..... 54
Crashing The Party (WP)..... 55
Fake Degrees Bought By 14 Confound Fire Officials (NYT) 56
Former Judge Cites Pressure To Pay Friends Of Party Boss (NYT) 57

Civil Rights:

Calif. Teens Get Probation For Halloween Hate-crime Beating (AP) ... 58
Judge Defers Decision On Port Chester Election (NYJN) ... 59
Court: No Discrimination (MOULTO) ... 59
Voting Rights: Noxubee Case A National Test (JCL) ... 60
Push To Resolve Fading Killings Of Rights Era (NYT) ... 60
Number Of People Stopped By New York Police Soars (NYT) ... 62
Court Bars Government Benefit For Same-Sex Domestic Partners (NYT) ... 64
Michigan Court Rules Against Gay Benefits (WT/AP) ... 64
The Right Reform (WP) ... 65

Antitrust:

Viacom Orders Removal Of Videos From YouTube (WSJ) ... 65
Viacom Tells YouTube To Remove Content (FT) ... 66
Viacom Decides YouTube Is A Foe (WP) ... 67
YouTube Removing Viacom TV Shows Media Firm Says 'Daily Show,' MTV Snippets Must Go (SFC) ... 68
Viacom Asks YouTube To Remove Over 100,000 Unauthorized Video Clips (USAT/AP) ... 69
Equity Endorses Blackstone Bid (WP/BLOOM) ... 69
Lawsuit Targets Dell, Intel (MERCN) ... 70
Dell Accused Of Hiding Intel Payments (AP) ... 70
Delta Creditors' Committee Approves Terms Of $2.5 Billion In Bankruptcy Exit Financing (AP) ... 71
MediaNews Acquires Santa Cruz Sentinel (AP) ... 72
Judge: Microsoft Can Question Expert Who Found Violation (DMR) ... 72
UPDATE: Analyst Sees Express Scripts Winning Caremark With Sweetened Bid (DOW) ... 72

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Scientists Dispel Global Warming Doubts (FT) ... 73
Climate Paper Prompts Call To Act (BBC) ... 74
U.N. Climate Panel Says Warming Is Man-Made (WP) ... 75
Science Panel Says Global Warming Is "Unequivocal" (NYT) ... 76
UN Report Predicts Global Warming Effects In U.S. (CHIT) ... 78
Deal With Warming, Don't Debate It, Scientists Warn (LAT) ... 80
Global-Warming Report Gets U.S. Emphasis (WSJ) ... 81
Global Warming To Continue For Centuries (AP) ... 82
Gore To Testify On Climate Change (POL) ... 83
Political Science (WSJ) ... 84
States' Map For Saving The Oceans (WP) ... 85
Schaghticoke Challenges Cason's Legal Authority (ICT) ... 86

Congress-Administration:

Bush Budget To Seek Cuts For Medicare, Medicaid (LAT) ... 88
Budget For Bush, Saving Tax Cuts Is A Tough Balancing Act (WSJ) ... 89
A Rare Bill In Congress (NYT) ... 89
Bush To Seek 3 Percent Raise For Civil Service And Military (WP) ... 90
Bush To Urge Democrats To Consider His Domestic Policy (WP) ... 90
Senators Move Donor Disclosures At A Snail's Pace (LAT) ... 91
Baca Defends Actions (POL) ... 92
Who's A "Whore"? (LAT) ... 93
FAA Looks For Money For New Air-Traffic Control System (WP) 93
Crashworthy Motor Vehicles (NYT) ... 94

Other News:

Jobs Data Signal Growth Is Easing But Still Solid (WSJ) ... 95
Economy Adds Fewer Jobs Than Expected (FT) ... 95
Employment Figures Fit "Soft Landing" Predictions (WP) ... 96
Slower Job Growth, At Least For Now (NYT) ... 97
Despite Recent Oil-Price Rally, Stock Investors Hold On (WSJ) 98
Jobs Report Brings A Tepid End To A Strong Week (NYT/AP) ... 98
The Current "Depression" (WSJ) ... 99
DNC Turns Focus To White House (WP) ... 100
Democratic Hopefuls Split Over The Best Path To Peace (NYT) 101
Edwards Continues Swipes At Senate White House Rivals (HILL) ... 103
Hillary Vows To End War (WT) ... 103
'08 Dems Split On Iraq (NSDY) ... 104
Iraq Plans Divide Democratic Hopefuls (LAT) ... 105
Clinton Promises To End War If Elected (AP) ... 106
Democratic 2008 Hopefuls Put On A Show (FT) ... 107
Democrats Control The Hill, But Not Themselves (WP) ... 108
DNC Backing Expected For D.C. Vote In House (WP) ... 109
Sen. Clinton To Visit New Hampshire Next Week (NHUL) ... 110
What Hillary's Humor Reveals (LAT) ... 111
Mobilized Online, Thousands Gather To Hear Obama (WP) ... 112
For Obama, No News Is Good News (POL) ... 112
Joe Biden Courts Al Sharpton (POL) ... 114
Romney Says Sen. Clinton "Timid" On Iran (AP) ... 114
Romney Attacks Hillary Over Iran (HILL) ... 114
Romney Explains Shifts (POL) ... 115
Hagel For President (WSJ) ... 116
Arkansas Underdog (WSJ) ... 116
Powerful Fla. Storms Kill 19, Raze Homes (AP) ... 118
Titillating Or Not, Washington Gossip Blossoms (NYT) ... 119
Will We Lose In The Stem Cell Race? (WP) ... 120
Happy Birthday, Mr. Reagan (WSJ) ... 121
Lone Starlets (NYT) ... 122
Russia Clashes With U.S. On Mideast Policy (WP) ... 123
"Quartet" Backs Revived Middle East Peace Efforts (LAT) ... 124
U.S., Russia Clash Over Syria In Mideast (AP) ... 125
U.S. Talks With Palestinians And Israelis Gain Support (NYT) ... 126
Major Powers Endorse US Initiative On Israeli-Palestinian Peace (AFP) ... 127
Russia Decries Hamas Boycott (WT) ... 128
18 Palestinians Killed In Gaza Fighting (WP) ... 129
16 Die In Gaza Factional Clashes (LAT) ... 130
In An Israeli Town Prone To Attacks, New York's Mayor Denounces Terror (NYT) ... 130
U.S. Takes China To WTO Over Subsidies (WP/AP) ... 131
US-China Tensions Rise Over Subsidies (FT) ... 132
U.S. Trade Effort On China Suffers 2 More Setbacks (NYT) ... 133
Currencies: G-7 May Cast A Wary Eye On Valuations Of The Yuan, Yen (WSJ) ... 134

DOJ_NMG_0127848

Trade Boom (WP) 134
Chinese Official Warns Against Independence Of Courts (NYT)135
Journalist Group Criticizes Press Freedoms Under Hu Jintao (NYT) 136
Hu Urges Sudan To Act On Darfur Crisis (FT) 136
Chinese President Pushes Sudan On Darfur (AP) 137
China Offers Aid For 'Peaceful Resolution' Of Darfur Conflict (AFP) 138
2 Americans Held, Kenya Official Says (LAT/AP) 139
Censorship's New Clothes (NYT) 139
Blair Vows To Stay Despite Scandal (WP) 140
Serbia Rejects Plan That Could Lead To Kosovo Independence (NYT) 141
U.N. Envoy Unveils Kosovo Proposal (AP) 142
U.N. Kosovo Proposal Tries To Appease All Sides (LAT) 143
Debt Is Key To Kosovo's Status (FT) 144
Bay Of Pigs Vets Fight To Outlast An Ailing Castro (WSJ) 145
Waiting, And Waiting, For Fidel (LAT) 146
Bomb Resonates With Diplomats, Not With The Bomber (NYT)147

TERRORISM NEWS:

Pentagon Official Who Criticized Detainee Lawyers Quits (WP)

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

A senior Pentagon official resigned yesterday, the Defense Department announced, three weeks after criticizing lawyers who represent terrorism suspects.

Charles "Cully" Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, called it "shocking" that major U.S. law firms represented Guantanamo Bay detainees free of charge and said they would likely suffer financially after their corporate clients learned of the work.

"I think, quite honestly, when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms," Stimson said in a Jan. 11 interview on Federal News Radio.

The legal community was outraged by his comments. Stimson also suggested that some lawyers were being untruthful about doing the work free of charge and instead were "receiving moneys from who-knows-where."

Stimson believed that the controversy "hampered his ability to be effective in this position," department spokesman Bryan Whitman said. He stressed that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates did not ask him to resign.

Stimson had been in his post since January 2006. He publicly apologized several days after the radio interview, saying his comments did not reflect his values and that he firmly believes in the principles of the U.S. legal system.

Official Quits After Remark On Lawyers (NYT)

By Sarah Abruzzese

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The senior Pentagon official who set off a controversy last month with remarks suggesting that corporations should consider severing business ties with law firms that represent Guantánamo Bay detainees has resigned.

The official, Charles D. Stimson, deputy assistant secretary for detainee affairs, said that it was his decision to resign and that he was not asked to leave by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, said Bryan Whitman, a spokesman for the Pentagon.

"He determined that it was going to hamper his ability to be effective in this position," Mr. Whitman said.

Mr. Stimson's comments in an interview on Jan. 11 on Federal News Radio angered many lawyers and caused the Defense Department to distance itself publicly from his remarks.

In the interview, Mr. Stimson named more than 12 firms that are defending detainees.

"I think, quite honestly, when corporate C.E.O.'s see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those C.E.O.'s are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms," Mr. Stimson said.

Mr. Stimson, a former Navy defense lawyer, wrote an apology published in The Washington Post, saying the remarks did not reflect his "core beliefs."

On Jan. 24, the Bar Association of San Francisco requested that the State Bar of California investigate Mr. Stimson for possible violations of California ethics rules, the San Francisco group's Web site says.

DOJ_NMG_0127849

The president of the American Bar Association, Karen J. Mathis, said that she could not comment on the resignation, but that by reacting to his comments "the American public reaffirmed its commitment to a core principle of our justice system: that every accused person deserves adequate legal representation."

Mr. Whitman said Mr. Stimson did a lot for the department "with respect to setting policy standards, increasing transparency and working with international organizations and allies, with respect to the nature of our detention operations."

Guantanamo Remarks Cost Policy Chief His Job (CNN)

CNN.com, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The Pentagon's man in charge of handling the department's policy on detainees from the war on terrorism has resigned, Defense Department officials said Friday.

Charles "Cully" Stimson resigned Thursday after making controversial remarks last month about law firms that represent terrorism suspects held by the U.S. military, Pentagon officials said.

Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, submitted his resignation to Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who accepted it, the officials said.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Stimson resigned because "the controversy surrounding him ... was hampering his ability to be effective in his current position."

Last month during a radio interview, Stimson said major U.S. corporations should not do business with top law firms that are defending terrorist suspects held in the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

During the interview, he also listed more than a dozen law firms that he thought should be boycotted.

"When corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms," Stimson said on a Washington radio station, Federal News Radio, on January 11.

The legal community denounced Stimson's comments.

Defense Department officials immediately distanced themselves from Stimson, saying his comments did not reflect those of the Bush administration.

In a letter to the editor published in the Washington Post a week later, he said, "I zealously represented unpopular clients. ... I believe that our justice system requires vigorous representation. ... I apologize for what I said, those comments do not reflect my core beliefs."

Stimson, a former prosecutor and defense attorney, took the job in January 2006 and had been responsible for strengthening the department's relationships with nongovernmental organizations, especially with the International Committee of the Red Cross, Whitman said.

Guantanamo Remarks Lead To Resignation (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

The Pentagon official who criticized law firms for defending detainees held at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has resigned, a Defense Department spokesman said.

Charles Stimson, deputy assistant secretary for detainee affairs, last month called it "shocking" that major U.S. law firms represented Guantanamo detainees for free and said they would probably suffer financially after their corporate clients learned of the work.

The Pentagon disavowed his remarks and Stimson apologized, saying that he supported pro bono work and that the legal system worked best when both sides had representation.

High-profile Guantanamo Detainees Face New Charges (AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico (AP) — The U.S. military prepared new charges Friday against three of the best-known detainees at Guantanamo Bay — a key step toward resuming the military tribunals for terrorism suspects that were halted by the U.S. Supreme Court last year.

Authorities drafted new charges — including murder, conspiracy and providing material support for terrorism — against Canadian Omar Khadr, Australian David Hicks and Salim Ahmed Hamdan of Yemen, said Air Force Col. Morris Davis, chief prosecutor in the Guantanamo war crimes trials.

Under military rules, the charges are not considered formally filed against the detainees until they are approved by a U.S. Department of Defense legal adviser and another official who oversees the tribunals.

DOJ_NMG_0127850

That process is expected to take two weeks, Davis said. Court hearings are not expected to begin at Guantanamo until at least the spring.

Also Friday, a military defense lawyer whose paralegal reported overhearing guards at the U.S. Navy base in southeastern Cuba brag about beating detainees said she was accused by a military investigator of filing a false statement.

Army Col. Richard Basset, who was ordered by the U.S. Southern Command to investigate the allegations into guards' actions, told the paralegal, Marine Sgt. Heather Cerveny, that the guards denied her account of their September conversations in a Guantanamo bar, according to Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey.

The investigator accused Cerveny of having made a false statement, Vokey told The Associated Press in a telephone interview. He said Basset met with the Cerveny late last year at Camp Pendleton, Calif., where she is based.

The probe began after Vokey filed a complaint with the Pentagon's Inspector General's office in October and attached a sworn statement from Cerveny. Jose Ruiz, a spokesman for Southern Command the where Basset is based, declined to comment on contents of the investigation.

In an earlier attempt to try detainees, the military had charged 10 of them and begun pretrial hearings at Guantanamo. The tribunals were halted by a Supreme Court ruling that their rules violated U.S. and international law.

Congress passed a new law authorizing the military commissions and President Bush signed it into law in October. The military then drafted a new set of rules for military commissions that have drawn criticism because they permit coerced or hearsay evidence.

The military has said it plans to charge 60 to 80 of the detainees at Guantanamo, where nearly 400 men are held on suspicion of links to al-Qaeda or the Taliban.

Davis said it made sense to start with Hicks, Khadr and Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden, because all were among those previously charged.

"Those three have been around for a while, and they were prepared and ready to go," he said.

Hicks, a former kangaroo skinner who converted to Islam in his native Australia, allegedly fought for the Taliban before he was captured in Afghanistan. Toronto-born Khadr, who is accused of killing an American soldier in Afghanistan, has allegedly acknowledged being trained by al-Qaeda. Hamdan has said he worked for bin Laden but denied any links to terrorism.

Australian Prime Minister John Howard on Saturday welcomed the U.S. announcement that fresh charges have been prepared against Hicks.

"I'm glad that the charges are being laid and that the deadline I set has been met," Howard told reporters, referring to his demand that Hicks be charged by mid-February. Howard has come under mounting political pressure to have Hicks tried or set free.

"Torture Victim" Seeks US Justice (BBC)

By Laurence Peter

BBC.com, February 2, 2007

A Lebanese-born German, who accuses the CIA of having kidnapped and tortured him, says he is determined to get an apology from the US authorities.

Khaled al-Masri alleges that he was seized in Macedonia, flown to a secret jail in Afghanistan and tortured there.

"I'll pursue the case until the Americans admit what they did to me, give an explanation and make an apology," he told the BBC News website.

Munich prosecutors have ordered the arrest of 13 suspected CIA agents.

Mr Masri says he was abducted at the end of 2003 and detained for five months before being released in Albania after the Americans realised they had got the wrong man.

'Traumatised'

Mr Masri says his case is an example of the US policy of "extraordinary rendition" - a practice whereby the US government flies foreign terror suspects to third countries without judicial process for interrogation or detention.

"I'm suffering from stress - this experience has left me traumatised," he said.

His German lawyer Manfred Gnjidic told the BBC News website that his client was feeling "isolated and depressed".

"His life isn't back to normal, he was tortured, nobody cared about him until now. The trauma is so deep in him, he needs a lot of help, not just in psychotherapy. Nobody was able to get him a simple job."

Mr Gnjidic says that he has evidence of how his client was maltreated: "We have some witnesses, we worked a lot to get one of them, from Algeria."

The arrest warrants for the 13 agents accused of involvement were issued last month. The information for them came from Mr Masri's lawyers and a journalist and officials in Spain, where the flight carrying Mr Masri is thought to have originated.

DOJ_NMG_0127851

Mr Gnjidic described the CIA agents as "contractors" from a base in North Carolina.

German arrest warrants are not valid in the US, but if the suspects were to travel to the European Union they could be arrested.

Milan case

Mr Masri says he was abducted on 31 December 2003 by US agents in Skopje, capital of the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

He is seeking to sue the US government over his detention, but in May a judge dismissed a lawsuit he filed against the CIA, citing national security considerations.

"The most important thing is that the European and German authorities are saying directly to the CIA agents that this is an illegal way to act," Mr Gnjidic said.

"Now the German government should insist on getting the rehabilitation of Mr Masri by the American side."

Meanwhile in the Italian city of Milan, court hearings to decide whether to indict 25 alleged CIA agents and several Italians accused of kidnapping a Muslim cleric in 2003 are under way.

Osama Mustafa Hassan, or Abu Omar, says he was abducted from the streets of Milan and then tortured in Egypt.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Was Arming For 'war,' FBI Says (SLPD)

By Robert Patrick

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 3, 2007

A St. Charles man obtained fully automatic weapons and tried to buy as many explosives as possible in preparation for what an associate called "war," the FBI says in court documents.

He bought three rifles and a Claymore anti-personnel mine and negotiated for a case of hand grenades, documents obtained by the Post-Dispatch show.

Mousa M. Abuelawi, 22, of Franjoe Court, was arrested Dec. 29 and charged on complaints accusing him of three counts of illegal possession or distribution of a machine gun and conspiracy to violate machine gun statutes.

Abuelawi, a Palestinian immigrant free on $50,000 bond, could not be reached. His brother declined to comment on his behalf. His lawyers, Scott Rosenblum and Gil Sison, did not return calls.

The context of the word "war" was not explained in court filings; the FBI declined to comment.

The man to whom the word was attributed, Thaer Abde Sumad, said in an interview Thursday that the purchases were not intended for terrorism but to make money supplying street gangs in a St. Louis turf war.

Sumad, 23, is not charged, although he is identified in an FBI affidavit as being present for one of the transactions.

He told a reporter he had no role in handling the firearms or explosives. He said he was at a meeting between Abuelawi and a federal informer outside a St. Louis gas station where Sumad works only because he knows both and wanted to say hello.

Sumad suggested that he and Abuelawi attracted special attention because of the sound of their names and their Arab ethnicity.

Abuelawi's lawyers have said he is a Palestinian immigrant.

Sumad is of Palestinian descent but was born in Indiana and raised in St. Louis, he said.

The FBI thinks it's a "terrorist thing," Sumad said, "especially after 9/11. They're trying to make it bigger than what it is."

Sumad said Abuelawi was "trying to make a few extra bucks."

An affidavit filed with the court by FBI Special Agent Stephen M. Smith, based in part on video and audio recordings, described these circumstances:

The informer used a cell phone to call Abuelawi on Nov. 8 and said he had a fully automatic rifle and a bomb or grenade for sale. Abuelawi and Sumad met with the informer at the gas station where they worked, in the 5700 block of West Florissant Road.

Abuelawi said he hoped the informer had brought the weapons and could sell them right away. He also said he would buy "whatever" the informer had to sell.

Sumad "stated he wants to buy as many explosives as possible because, 'we're going to war,'" the affidavit says. However, Sumad said in Thursday's interview that he does not remember making reference to "war," but added that if he did say it, he intended it as a flippant reference to a gang war.

The affidavit goes on to say:

DOJ_NMG_0127852

On Nov. 21, the informer delivered a fully automatic M-16 rifle and a Claymore mine, or so Abuelawi was told. They had been rigged not to work.

That night, Abuelawi took the M-16 inside another gas station where he also worked, in the 6000 block of West Florissant Road, then put it back in his car.

The next day Abuelawi met a man who "appears to be Middle Eastern" at the station in the 5700 block and showed him the M-16 and the Claymore.

On Nov. 23, three St. Louis police officers entered the station and said they had a report of someone seen there with a gun. Sumad denied knowing anything about a firearm. Officers found the M-16, seized it and left.

On Nov. 29, the informer offered Abuelawi a chance to buy 30 hand grenades for $15,000, or $500 per grenade. Abuelawi haggled the price down to $400 per grenade and asked the informer to get him more M-16s and some AK-47 assault rifles.

Abuelawi wanted four grenades immediately but the informer had only pictures.

Abuelawi told the informer, "this is not my first time dealing with this (expletive)," according to the affidavit.

The informer and Abuelawi met again Dec. 5. Abuelawi was nervous and said "he and his people" didn't want the hand grenades at the time because he thought the police were in the cemetery across the street.

In fact, they were.

The affidavit quotes Abuelawi as saying "if me and my people get caught with that (expletive) it is all over." It says, "He expressed that, if caught, he and others could be deported."

But Abuelawi still said he wanted any guns the informer could get, "big or small."

On Dec. 27, the informer sold Abuelawi an M-16 and a Heckler & Koch MP-5 fully automatic submachine gun, for $600.

Abuelawi and an unidentified man took the guns to a house in the 9700 block of Medford Drive in St. Louis County and asked the occupants to store them.

Investigators searched the house the next day and seized both guns.

No one answered when a reporter and photographer went to the house Thursday.

In contrast to the affidavit, Sumad said that when police asked him whether there was a gun at the gas station, he had said, "I don't think so."

Sumad said he had been off when Abuelawi dropped the gun off at the station. Another employee told Sumad about the gun, brought it out from a storage room, pulled it out of its case and waved it around, Sumad said.

Sumad said that after the police seized the gun, FBI agents came to interview him.

During 3½ hours in the store's back room, they asked him for personal information and asked what he knew about the M-16, he said. Sumad said he lied and told agents he didn't know anything about the gun. He said he didn't want them to associate him with Abuelawi or the weapon.

Sumad said the FBI asked him about overseas money transfers, whether he was a member of the factions Hamas or Fatah, and what he thought of President George W. Bush and the war in Iraq. Sumad said he dismissed the factions with an expletive, and said that because Bush got what he wanted by ridding Iraq of dictator Saddam Hussein, the troops should leave.

Abuelawi is single and has no children and no assets, court documents state. He was fired by the gas station, co-workers said.

Jeff Fulton, assistant special agent in charge of the St. Louis office of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said devices such as grenades and mines are "not a common product" for gangs. "But it's not unheard of," he said.

Abuelawi was arrested Dec. 29. He has appeared in federal court in St. Louis multiple times, including a status conference on Monday. At that hearing, U.S. Magistrate Judge Audrey Fleissig told Assistant U.S. Attorney Matt Drake that prosecutors had 30 days to obtain a grand jury indictment against Abuelawi or she would dismiss the charges.

Drake did not return a message seeking comment. Roland Corvington, special agent in charge of FBI's St. Louis office, said he could not comment because it is an ongoing investigation.

Cost Of House-Passed Terror Bill Touches Off A Partisan Clash (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The antiterrorism bill that the House passed last month as part of the new Democratic majority's first-100-hours push would cost the federal government $21 billion over the next five years, according to a new Congressional estimate.

The five-year estimate, issued Friday by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, is equal to roughly half the Homeland Security Department's entire budget for the current fiscal year, and Republicans called it proof that adopting the bill so quickly had been irresponsible.

"This bill was rushed to the floor without the Democratic leadership giving us any indication of its massive cost," said Representative Peter T. King of New York, the senior Republican on the House Homeland Security Committee. "And now we know why."

The committee chairman, Representative Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, who was the chief sponsor of the legislation, defended the price tag. "Perhaps there would not be such sticker shock if the Congress and the Bush administration had addressed these security gaps identified by the bipartisan 9/11 commission over three years ago," Mr. Thompson said in a statement.

The Senate has not yet taken up its own version of the measure, but some Democrats there have already expressed reservations about tight and costly cargo inspections required by the House bill.

Most of the new spending — $13.1 billion, by the budget office's reckoning — would be for aviation security measures, including the inspection of all cargo loaded onto passenger jets.

A similar mandate requiring the overseas inspection of all ship containers headed to the United States would cost the federal government only $32 million a year, assuming, as the bill envisions, that foreign ports picked up the cost of the screening devices, at a cost of $1.5 billion over three years.

House Security Bill Tagged At $21 Billion (WT)

By Jerry Seper, Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

Enacting the homeland security improvements recommended by the 9/11 commission will cost at least $21 billion over the next five years, according to a report yesterday by the Congressional Budget Office.

The CBO said a bill to carry out the recommendations, which passed the House last month, would also raise airline passenger fees by nearly $1.3 billion between 2008 and 2011, with the money going to the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) to improve security at the nation's airports.

House Democrats proposed the bill as part of their "100 hours" agenda. It would:

· Require the federal government to screen the contents of all cargo transported aboard passenger aircraft.

· Prohibit cargo shipping containers from entering the United States unless they have been sealed and scanned with imaging and radiation-detection equipment.

· Authorize grants to improve communications systems among first responders.

· Authorize appropriations for international broadcasting activities and assistance to Arab and predominantly Muslim countries, including Afghanistan and Pakistan.

· Aim to stem the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction by creating a White House office to coordinate a strategy for preventing WMD proliferation and an advisory commission to survey current nonproliferation efforts and recommend improvements.

The report was delivered to Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat and chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, who introduced the legislation. He said the 9/11 commissioners made "41 valuable recommendations on how to prevent" future terrorist attacks, but not all of them were completed.

"As a result, the American people remain at risk and our nation remains unprepared for a major emergency," he said.

But Rep. Peter T. King of New York, the committee's ranking Republican, said the bill was "rushed to the floor without the Democratic leadership giving us any indication of its massive cost -- and now we know why."

"I think this $21 billion estimate makes it clear that the bill actually contradicts 9/11 commission recommendations, which called for a risk-based allocation of homeland security resources," Mr. King said. "Had we known this before the bill was brought to the floor, it would have been a different story."

Under the bill, the Department of Homeland Security would set the standards for scanning equipment and for container seals that could detect breaches. The bill's new requirements would become effective within three years for containers from countries with large ports and within five years for those with smaller operations.

President Bush opposes the House bill, arguing it undermines many of the administration's own post-September 11 steps and it is impossible to scan 100 percent of all incoming cargo.

The SAFE Ports Act, enacted in October 2006, requires Homeland Security to ensure that all containers are scanned before they arrive in the United States, although it sets no deadline for the department to put the program into operation. Department officials have described the 100 percent requirement as "unrealistic."

9/11 Security Could Cost $21 Billion (CNN)

CNN.com, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127854

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- A bill to enact the 9/11 Commission recommendations -- the first bill passed by the new Democratic-led House of Representatives -- will cost $21 billion over five years if enacted into law, congressional budget officials said Friday.

The House passed the bill January 9 during its heralded "first 100 hours" of the new Congress. The Senate has not yet voted on the measure.

The non-partisan Congressional Budget Office said the bill would also allow the Transportation Security Administration to collect nearly $1.3 billion in fees from airline passengers. The money would be spent for airport security improvements.

Rep. Peter King, R-New York., the ranking member of the Homeland Security Committee, said the report validated his opposition to the bill.

"This bill was rushed to the floor without the Democratic leadership giving us any indication of its massive cost -- and now we know why," King said in a written statement. "Had we known [the cost] before the bill was brought to the floor, it would have been a different story."

Democrats said the bill was needed to fulfill the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

The bill requires the federal government to screen cargo on passenger aircraft, authorize grants to improve police and fire communications, require shipping cargo containers to be scanned before entering the United States and take numerous other steps to improve security.

Court Clears Way For Suit On New Orleans Flooding (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

Residents of several neighborhoods in the New Orleans area that were hardest hit by flooding after Hurricane Katrina can sue the Army Corps of Engineers over their claims that a government-built navigation channel was largely to blame, a federal judge ruled yesterday.

Successful lawsuits against the corps could result in billions of dollars in damage payments.

Since the flood, those who lived in the devastated neighborhoods near the east side of New Orleans — including the Lower Ninth Ward, New Orleans East and St. Bernard Parish — have contended that the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet caused much of their damage by intensifying the surge from the storm. The damage, they say, was foreseeable.

After residents filed lawsuits, the government tried to get them dismissed. The corps argued that it was protected from lawsuits by the Flood Control Act of 1928, which grants it immunity from liability for flood damage caused by flood-control projects, like levees.

But yesterday, Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. of the Federal District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, cited previous cases saying that the channel was not a flood-control project. Instead, Judge Duval said, the cases say the channel — known locally as Mr. Go — was built as an aid to navigation, so the protection from liability might not apply. And so, he said, the questions deserved to be decided at trial.

Pierce O'Donnell, a lawyer for those suing the government, called the ruling "a landmark victory for the Katrina victims." But Joseph Bruno, another lawyer for the residents, acknowledged that the judge's ruling was only the first step.

The 76-mile canal was completed in 1965 as a shortcut for ships heading from the Mississippi River to the Gulf of Mexico. Environmentalists and local officials have long argued that it has done great damage to the coastal environment by piping salt water inland and killing off the cypress swamps and grassy marshes that serve as natural barriers to storms.

During Hurricane Katrina, several scientists have said, the canal was a crucial part of a funnel that amplified the storm's surge and brought its waters into the heart of the city.

A spokesman for the corps in New Orleans, René Poché, declined to discuss pending litigation. The corps has previously argued that the channel did not contribute greatly to the disaster, but announced a plan last year to close the outlet to navigation. That plan does not go far enough for the channel's critics, who demand that it be filled in and the wetland buffer restored.

Also yesterday, President Bush nominated a new leader for the corps, Lt. Gen. Robert L. Van Antwerp Jr. of the Army. If approved by the Senate, General Van Antwerp will succeed Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, who announced last August that he intended to resign. General Van Antwerp has been serving as commanding general for the Army accessions command, which manages recruiting and initial training.

WAR NEWS:

Bleak Iraq Report Is Sent To Congress (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0127855

By Karen DeYoung, Walter Pincus
The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

The U.S. intelligence community yesterday released a starkly pessimistic assessment of the situation in Iraq, warning that even if security improves, deepening sectarian divisions threaten to destroy the government and ultimately could lead to anarchy, partition or the emergence of a new dictatorship.

Citing "the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene," declassified judgments of a new National Intelligence Estimate predicted that Iraqi leaders will be "hard pressed" to reconcile over the next 18 months.

Despite the stepped-up training and U.S. support for Iraqi security forces -- major parts of the new Iraq strategy President Bush announced last month -- the estimate concluded that the Iraqi military will find it very difficult to carry out any new responsibilities or to operate independently against sectarian militias.

The administration struggled yesterday to put the best face on the NIE's assessment of a bleak situation that it says will sharply worsen unless "measurable" military and political progress is made.

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said the estimate "explains why the president concluded that a new approach and new strategy was required." He said Bush received extensive intelligence input before he announced his new plan, which includes the deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. combat troops to Iraq.

The NIE did not directly address the effect of sending more troops. But one section supported the administration's public insistence that U.S. forces are "an essential stabilizing element in Iraq." Their rapid withdrawal, the NIE said, "almost certainly would lead" to increased sectarian violence and make reconciliation more difficult.

The release of the estimate -- written over the past five months by the intelligence community's top Iraq analysts and approved by the heads of the CIA, the intelligence units at the Pentagon and those at the State and Justice departments -- comes on the eve of next week's Senate debate on the increase in U.S. forces in Iraq.

Key Democrats in Congress embraced the estimate to bolster their rejection of Bush's plan. "I do not see anything, so far, in the report that suggests the president's new plan is a winning strategy that protects America's national interest," said Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.).

The entire 90-page, classified NIE, titled "Prospects for Iraq's Stability: A Challenging Road Ahead," was delivered to Congress yesterday morning after most members had left for the weekend.

Three and a half pages of "Key Judgments," unanimously agreed upon by the intelligence community, were released to the public. Although three dissents are included in the body of the classified document, they were described as tangential to the main conclusions. They deal with the extent to which the Syrian government controls the movement of foreign fighters across its border with Iraq and the extent and activities of al-Qaeda in Iran.

The tough and unequivocal wording reflects the determination within the intelligence community to prove its independence from political pressure. The community came under harsh criticism for its 2002 assessment of then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's weapons programs, much of which proved to be inaccurate.

Though the administration has repeatedly asserted that al-Qaeda and Iranian operatives are responsible for provoking much of the violence in Iraq, the NIE played down their roles. Analysts studied what would happen if Iran were not a factor inside Iraq and concluded that, even though Iranian agents target U.S. troops, the absence of Tehran's agents would not appreciably alter the sectarian conflict.

The administration postponed plans to present its evidence of Iranian involvement, originally scheduled for last Wednesday. Hadley said yesterday that "the truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated" Iran's role. "We sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts."

But in a muted criticism of the NIE, Hadley said it failed to consider Iran's negative impact on the entire Middle East.

The NIE called Iran, along with al-Qaeda and other extremist groups, "accelerants" whose activities intensify the conflict. But Iran and Iraq's other neighbors, it said, are "not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics."

The sectarian nature of the fighting, along with the "ethno-sectarian mobilization and population displacements," the estimate said, is consistent with the definition of "civil war." But it said the term "does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq, which includes extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, al-Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on Coalition forces, and widely criminally motivated violence."

During a White House briefing, Hadley was pressed to reconcile that assessment with the president's refusal to describe the Iraq situation as a civil war. "I think I can't do better than the description of the facts on the ground that is in the NIE, with which we agree, and that says this is a complex, difficult situation," Hadley said. "And that's what it is."

At a Pentagon news conference, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, noting that he had not read the report, said he agreed with Hadley that "the words 'civil war' oversimplify a very complex situation." Gates said he was encouraged that Iraqi military units assigned to partner with U.S. forces in stepped-up operations in Baghdad are already arriving in the capital. But he acknowledged that the units have not reported with full strength, adding that "55 percent is probably not good enough."

DOJ_NMG_0127856

The NIE analyzed the sharp differences among sectarian groups in Iraq, which it said are "driving the current trajectory of the country's security and political evolution."

Despite their majority status, the Shiites who now dominate the government remain "deeply insecure" after decades under the brutal control of Hussein and his Sunni regime, the NIE said. Their insecurity "leads the Shia to mistrust U.S. efforts to reconcile Iraqi sects and reinforces their unwillingness to engage with the Sunnis on a variety of issues," the estimate said.

Many Sunnis "remain unwilling to accept their minority status," the NIE continued, "believe the central government is illegitimate and incompetent, and are convinced that Shia dominance will increase Iranian influence over Iraq."

The Kurds, the country's third major group, "are moving systematically to increase their control" over the oil-rich city of Kirkuk and are looking to a constitutionally required referendum to take place no later than the end of this year, the NIE said. The voting will deal with the incorporation of the city within the Kurds' regional border. Such a move, the estimate said, "could prompt Turkey to launch a military incursion."

Without mentioning Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, by name, the estimate noted that "the absence of unifying leaders among the Arab Sunni or Shia with the capacity to speak for or exert control over their confessional groups limits prospects for reconciliation."

It noted that some developments -- including broader Sunni acceptance of the current government, Shiite and Kurdish concessions and enhanced resources for local tribal and religious groups -- " could" help reverse the negative trends.

On the other hand, the NIE concluded, "a number of identifiable internal security and political triggering events . . . have the potential to convulse severely Iraq's security environment" and could "spark an abrupt increase in communal and insurgent violence and shift Iraq's trajectory from gradual decline to rapid deterioration."

Those events include sustained mass sectarian killing, the assassination of major political and religious leaders, and a complete Sunni defection from the government. Any one of the three, the estimate said, could result in "chaos leading to partition . . . emergence of a Shia strongman . . . [or] anarchic fragmentation of power."

Analysis Is Bleak On Iraq's Future (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The release on Friday of portions of a bleak new National Intelligence Estimate about Iraq's future left the White House and its opponents vying over whether its findings buttressed their vastly different views about how to arrest the worsening sectarian chaos there.

The assessment, by American intelligence agencies, expressed deep doubts about the abilities of Iraqi politicians to hold together an increasingly balkanized country, and about whether Iraqi troops might be able to confront powerful militias over the next 18 months and assume more responsibility for security.

The analysis, the first such estimate on Iraq in more than two years, described in sober language a rapidly unraveling country in which security has worsened despite four years of efforts by the administration. [Text, Page A6.]

President Bush acknowledged last month that his strategy had failed so far.

The estimate suggested that the United States now faced an unpalatable decision in which a rapid withdrawal of American troops would only accelerate momentum toward Iraq's collapse, and in which Iraq faced long odds of quelling the violence and overcoming hardening sectarian divisions, regardless of how many American troops police Iraq's streets.

The report was released a week after Vice President Dick Cheney dismissed suggestions that Iraq is in a parlous state, saying, "The reality on the ground is, we've made major progress."

The administration has also intensified its criticism of Iran, accusing it of fueling the sectarian violence in Iraq and providing Shiite militias with material for bombs that the administration says have been used in attacks on American forces. The White House has thus far made little evidence public to support its case.

The intelligence report did conclude that Iran is providing "lethal support" for Shiite groups that is intensifying the violence. But it portrayed the violence as essentially "self-sustaining," and suggested that the involvement of outsiders, including Iran, was "not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability."

National Intelligence Estimates provide a consensus of the 16 agencies that make up the intelligence community.

In choosing to take the rare step of making public three and a half pages of "key judgments" from the classified report, administration officials seized on one conclusion — that American forces remain "an essential stabilizing element in Iraq" — to reinforce their view that more troops are needed to secure Baghdad and give Iraqi leaders breathing room to develop a political settlement, particularly between the warring Sunnis and Shiites.

DOJ_NMG_0127857

But top Democratic lawmakers said the estimate's conclusions supported their view that the best way to combat violence in Baghdad would be through new political and diplomatic programs.

The declassified portions included an assessment that an Iraqi military hampered by sectarian divisions would be "hard pressed" over the next 12 to 18 months to "execute significantly increased security responsibilities, and particularly to operate independently against Shia militias with any success."

The report also concluded that security in Iraq would continue to deteriorate at current rates unless "measurable progress" can be made in efforts to reverse the conditions that fuel violence.

The full classified report was said by officials to be about 90 pages in length, and was provided to the White House and members of Congress. Top Democrats said the release of the intelligence estimate would strengthen their hand as the Senate prepares for a possible vote next week on a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's new Iraq strategy.

"The estimate reaffirms my belief that the best hope for progress toward stabilizing Iraq lies only with the Iraqi people and their political leaders," Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, the West Virginia Democrat and chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said in a statement. "The steps identified by the intelligence community as having the best chance of reversing the chaos and bloodshed in Iraq are all political developments, not military."

But Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said at the White House that the estimate "gives us some evidence" of why Mr. Bush had concluded that "an American withdrawal or stepping back now would be a prescription for fast failure and a chaos that would envelop not only Iraq, but the region."

Mr. Hadley said the estimate also bolstered the White House strategy of sending more than 20,000 new troops into Iraq.

The previous National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, in the summer of 2004, detailed three possible outlooks for Iraq over the following 18 months, with the most pessimistic possibility that Iraq would descend into civil war.

By contrast the new report, struggling to describe the nature of the ongoing violence, said that calling it a "civil war" was hardly sufficient.

"The intelligence community judges that the term 'civil war' does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq, which includes extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, Al Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces, and widespread criminally motivated violence," the assessment read.

John E. McLaughlin, who oversaw the previous intelligence estimate when he was acting director of central intelligence, said that he believed that intelligence officials in 2004 had presciently assessed what was to come in Iraq, but that the escalation of sectarian violence over the past year had made the situation even more complex.

"Civil war is checkers," he said. "This is chess."

The report also warned that a further sectarian splintering of Iraq could incite other countries in the Middle East to arm and finance various sects in the country: Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt supporting the Sunnis, and Iran coming to the aid of Shiite forces.

A National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq that was produced in 2002 in the prelude to the American invasion has become infamous as an example of an intelligence failure, because most of its central assertions about Iraq's weapons capabilities and ties to terrorism have since been proven to have been mistaken.

Since then, American intelligence officials have made efforts to overhaul the process to produce the reports, in part by giving new emphasis to dissenting views that were once buried in obscure footnotes.

The latest analysis is understood to contain multiple dissents, one of which concerns the role of Syria in supporting Sunni insurgents in Iraq.

Intelligence analysts have been divided over whether it is the policy of the government in Damascus to aid the flow of foreign fighters who enter Iraq from Syria, or whether that assistance is the work of lower-level Syrian officials acting on their own.

American intelligence analysts have also disagreed about the extent to which Iranian government officials are aware of the flow of Qaeda operatives between Iran and Iraq.

Beyond the current grim picture, the report described several "triggering events" that could cause the situation to worsen significantly. Among them, it listed the assassination of major religious or political leaders, a complete Sunni defection from the government, and sustained mass sectarian killings that could "shift Iraq's trajectory from gradual decline to rapid deterioration with grave humanitarian, political and security consequences."

Were the already fragile government to collapse, the report outlined three possible outcomes: the emergence of a Shiite strongman to assert authority over minority sects, an "anarchic" fragmentation that puts power in the hands of hundreds of local potentates, or a period of sustained, bloody fighting leading to partition of Iraq along ethnic lines.

"Collapse of this magnitude would generate fierce violence for at least several years," the report concluded, "ranging well beyond the time frame of this estimate, before settling into a partially stable end-state."

DOJ_NMG_0127858

The Analysis: On The "Polarization" Of Iraqis And Their "Ready Recourse To Violence" (NYT)

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

Following is the text of the "key judgments" of the new National Intelligence Estimate about Iraq's future that was released yesterday. The report, most of which remains classified, is titled "Prospects for Iraq's Stability: A Challenging Road Ahead" and is dated January 2007. Italic emphasis and parenthetical abbreviations are from the report.

Iraqi society's growing polarization, the persistent weakness of the security forces and the state in general, and all sides' ready recourse to violence are collectively driving an increase in communal and insurgent violence and political extremism. Unless efforts to reverse these conditions show measurable progress during the term of this estimate, the coming 12 to 18 months, we assess that the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate at rates comparable to the latter part of 2006.

If strengthened Iraqi Security Forces (I.S.F.), more loyal to the government and supported by coalition forces, are able to reduce levels of violence and establish more effective security for Iraq's population, Iraqi leaders could have an opportunity to begin the process of political compromise necessary for longer term stability, political progress, and economic recovery.

Nevertheless, even if violence is diminished, given the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene, Iraqi leaders will be hard pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation in the time frame of this estimate.

The challenges confronting Iraqis are daunting, and multiple factors are driving the current trajectory of the country's security and political evolution.

Decades of subordination to Sunni political, social, and economic domination have made the Shia deeply insecure about their hold on power. This insecurity leads the Shia to mistrust U.S. efforts to reconcile Iraqi sects and reinforces their unwillingness to engage with the Sunnis on a variety of issues, including adjusting the structure of Iraq's federal system, reining in Shia militias, and easing de-Baathification.

Many Sunni Arabs remain unwilling to accept their minority status, believe the central government is illegitimate and incompetent, and are convinced that Shia dominance will increase Iranian influence over Iraq, in ways that erode the state's Arab character and increase Sunni repression.

The absence of unifying leaders among the Arab Sunni or Shia with the capacity to speak for or exert control over their confessional groups limits prospects for reconciliation. The Kurds remain willing to participate in Iraqi state-building but reluctant to surrender any of the gains in autonomy they have achieved.

The Kurds are moving systematically to increase their control of Kirkuk to guarantee annexation of all or most of the city and province into the Kurdistan Regional Government (K.R.G.) after the constitutionally mandated referendum scheduled to occur no later than 31 December 2007. Arab groups in Kirkuk continue to resist violently what they see as Kurdish encroachment.

Despite real improvements, the Iraqi Security Forces (I.S.F.) — particularly the Iraqi police — will be hard pressed in the next 12-18 months to execute significantly increased security responsibilities, and particularly to operate independently against Shia militias with success. Sectarian divisions erode the dependability of many units, many are hampered by personnel and equipment shortfalls, and a number of Iraqi units have refused to serve outside of the areas where they were recruited.

Extremists — most notably the Sunni jihadist group Al Qaeda in Iraq (A.Q.I.) and Shia oppositionist Jaysh al-Mahdi (J.A.M.) — continue to act as very effective accelerators for what has become a self-sustaining inter-sectarian struggle between Shia and Sunnis.

Significant population displacement, both within Iraq and the movement of Iraqis into neighboring countries, indicates the hardening of ethno-sectarian divisions, diminishes Iraq's professional and entrepreneurial classes, and strains the capacities of the countries to which they have relocated. The U.N. estimates over a million Iraqis are now in Syria and Jordan.

The Intelligence Community judges that the term "civil war" does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq, which includes extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, Al Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces, and widespread criminally motivated violence. Nonetheless, the term "civil war" accurately describes key elements of the Iraqi conflict, including the hardening of ethno-sectarian identities, a sea change in the character of the violence, ethno-sectarian mobilization, and population displacements.

Coalition capabilities, including force levels, resources, and operations, remain an essential stabilizing element in Iraq.

If coalition forces were withdrawn rapidly during the term of this estimate, we judge that this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq, intensify Sunni resistance to the Iraqi government, and have adverse consequences for national reconciliation.

If such a rapid withdrawal were to take place, we judge that the I.S.F. would be unlikely to survive as a nonsectarian national institution; neighboring countries — invited by Iraqi factions or unilaterally — might intervene openly in the conflict; massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement would be probable; A.Q.I. would attempt to use parts of the country — particularly Al Anbar Province — to plan increased attacks in and outside of Iraq; and spiraling violence and political disarray in Iraq, along with Kurdish moves to control Kirkuk and strengthen autonomy, could prompt Turkey to launch a military incursion.

DOJ_NMG_0127859

A number of identifiable developments could help to reverse the negative trends driving Iraq's current trajectory. They include:

¶Broader Sunni acceptance of the current political structure and federalism to begin to reduce one of the major sources of Iraq's instability.

¶Significant concessions by Shia and Kurds to create space for Sunni acceptance of federalism.

¶A bottom-up approach — deputizing, resourcing, and working more directly with neighborhood watch groups and establishing grievance committees — to help mend frayed relationships between tribal and religious groups, which have been mobilized into communal warfare over the past three years.

A key enabler for all of these steps would be stronger Iraqi leadership, which could enhance the positive impact of all the above developments.

Iraq's neighbors influence, and are influenced by, events within Iraq, but the involvement of these outside actors is not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics.

Nonetheless, Iranian lethal support for select groups of Iraqi Shia militants clearly intensifies the conflict in Iraq. Syria continues to provide safe haven for expatriate Iraqi Baathists and to take less than adequate measures to stop the flow of foreign jihadists into Iraq.

For key Sunni regimes, intense communal warfare, Shia gains in Iraq, and Iran's assertive role have heightened fears of regional instability and unrest and contributed to a growing polarization between Iran and Syria on the one hand and other Middle East governments on the other.

But traditional regional rivalries, deepening ethnic and sectarian violence in Iraq over the past year, persistent anti-Americanism in the region, anti-Shia prejudice among Arab states, and fears of being perceived by their publics as abandoning their Sunni co-religionists in Iraq have constrained Arab states' willingness to engage politically and economically with the Shia-dominated government in Baghdad and led them to consider unilateral support to Sunni groups.

Turkey does not want Iraq to disintegrate and is determined to eliminate the safe haven in northern Iraq of the Kurdistan People's Congress (K.G.K., formerly P.K.K.) — a Turkish Kurdish terrorist group.

A number of identifiable internal security and political triggering events, including sustained mass sectarian killings, assassination of major religious and political leaders, and a complete Sunni defection from the government have the potential to convulse severely Iraq's security environment. Should these events take place, they could spark an abrupt increase in communal and insurgent violence and shift Iraq's trajectory from gradual decline to rapid deterioration with grave humanitarian, political, and security consequences. Three prospective security paths might then emerge:

¶Chaos leading to partition. With a rapid deterioration in the capacity of Iraq's central government to function, security services and other aspects of sovereignty would collapse. Resulting widespread fighting could produce de facto partition, dividing Iraq into three mutually antagonistic parts. Collapse of this magnitude would generate fierce violence for at least several years, ranging well beyond the time frame of this estimate, before settling into a partially stable end-state.

¶Emergence of a Shia strongman. Instead of a disintegrating central government producing partition, a security implosion could lead Iraq's potentially most powerful group, the Shia, to assert its latent strength.

¶Anarchic fragmentation of power. The emergence of a checkered pattern of local control would present the greatest potential for instability, mixing extreme ethno-sectarian violence with debilitating intra-group clashes.

U.S. Spy Chiefs Issue Grim Report On Iraq (LAT)

By Greg Miller,

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

Stability isn't possible within a year, they say, even if the fighting can be slowed.

WASHINGTON — Iraq is unraveling at an accelerating rate, and even if U.S. and Iraqi forces can slow the spreading violence, the country's fragile government is unlikely to deliver stability to its people during the next year, according to a much-anticipated assessment by U.S. intelligence agencies.

The report, titled "Prospects for Iraq's Stability: A Challenging Road Ahead," catalogs an array of forces pulling the country apart and concludes that to call the situation a civil war "does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict" because the causes of violence are so varied.

DOJ_NMG_0127860

The assessment, delivered to Congress on Friday, says there are scenarios that could lead to political progress and a slow recovery, but it also identifies "triggering events" that could push Iraq into complete chaos, with neighboring nations choosing sides in what could become a regional conflagration.

"Given the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene, Iraqi leaders will be hard-pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation in the [18-month] time frame of this estimate," the report says in a blunt, bottom-line summary.

The document, known as a National Intelligence Estimate, represents the consensus of all 16 U.S. spy agencies. The director of national intelligence took the unusual step of releasing the document's key judgments publicly even as the full, 90-page classified version was being delivered to members of Congress and senior government officials.

The assessment does not specifically address the prospects for success of President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. But it notes that "even if violence is diminished" over the next 12 to 18 months, prospects for "sustained political reconciliation" among Iraq's warring factions are dim.

That means that even under optimistic scenarios, the nation's top intelligence analysts do not envision meaningful stability within the period during which Bush has said additional U.S. troops would be deployed — raising the prospect that the so-called surge might drag on much longer than the administration has indicated.

Beyond that, the report provides fodder for proponents and critics of Bush's plan.

It warns that the presence of U.S. troops remains "an essential stabilizing element in Iraq" and that if there were a rapid withdrawal, Iraqi security forces "would be unlikely to survive as a nonsectarian national institution."

In such a scenario, neighboring countries — including Iran and Saudi Arabia — "might intervene openly in the conflict; massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement would be probable."

White House officials said that prospect helped make the case for the president's plan, which is under increasing fire on Capitol Hill.

The intelligence estimate is "not at war with this … new strategy the president has developed," national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley told reporters. The assessment, he said, "explains why the president concluded that a new approach, a new strategy was required" and "generally supports" that idea.

But Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a contender for his party's 2008 presidential nomination, called the report "a devastating repudiation of the president's new tactics in Iraq."

"It plainly shows the current strategy isn't working and that there is a dire need for a political settlement to give [breathing] room to the Sunnis, Shia and Kurds," Biden said in a statement. "Without it, Iraq will slide into further chaos and violence."

The report comes as the Senate is arguing over whether to approve a nonbinding resolution sponsored by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) that criticizes the president's plan to increase troop levels.

Most Democrats and some Republican senators have lined up behind Warner's measure, expected to be debated next week. But Republican Senate leaders emerged from meetings Friday leaving no doubt they would seek to keep the measure from coming to a vote unless they were allowed to present alternative resolutions less critical of the president's policies. Democrats were working to line up the 60 votes needed in the 100-member Senate to thwart an effort to block the Warner resolution.

The assessment by the intelligence agencies was requested in July by senators alarmed by the deteriorating security situation in Iraq. The violence has worsened since then, and the NIE concludes that without significant political and military progress soon, "the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate at rates comparable to the latter part of 2006."

In outlining the factors that have pushed Iraq toward chaos, the report cites the "insecurity" of Shiites, who were repressed for decades under dictator Saddam Hussein, a Sunni Arab; the refusal of Sunnis to accept their declining political fortunes after Hussein's regime was toppled in early 2003; and the disappearance of a large portion of the Iraqi "professional and entrepreneurial classes" as people fled to other countries.

The report offers a bleak assessment of the Iraqi security forces who are supposed to play the leading role under Bush's plan to stem violence.

These forces will be "hard-pressed" to carry out their responsibilities and operate against Shiite militias, the report concludes.

That assessment seems at odds with recent assertions by U.S. military officials, including Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who testified before Congress on Thursday that "Iraqis are poised to assume responsibility for their own security by the end of 2007, still with some level of support from us."

Echoing concerns Bush has raised, the NIE warns that if the United States withdrew, Al Qaeda "would attempt to use parts of the country — particularly Al Anbar province — to plan increased attacks in and outside of Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0127861

But the document does not indicate that intelligence officials believe Iraq is poised to become an Al Qaeda sanctuary, a scenario cited by Bush in his rejection of calls to set up timetables for a withdrawal of U.S. forces.

The NIE is measured in its assessment of the roles Iran and Syria play in fostering violence in Iraq.

It says that Iran has fueled the fighting by providing "lethal support" to groups of Iraqi Shiite militants and that Syria continues to shelter displaced members of Hussein's Baath Party.

Even so, the report finds that meddling by Iran and Syria "is not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics."

The role played by Iraq's neighbors was the subject of some dissension among intelligence officials involved in assembling the report.

The classified portion of the NIE is said to include "alternate" judgments that reflect disagreements over whether Syria is directly involved in allowing Islamic militants to cross its border into Iraq and the extent to which Iran is aware of and tolerating Al Qaeda activity in its territory.

In giving the alternate assessments prominent placement alongside the document's key judgments, U.S. intelligence officials said, they were responding to criticism of previous NIEs in which dissenting views were often relegated to footnote status and overlooked by policymakers.

Downplaying of dissenting views was one of many major flaws in an NIE produced before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003, which concluded erroneously that Iraq had stockpiles of chemical and biological weapons and was pursuing the development of nuclear weapons.

The new NIE concludes with a discussion of scenarios that could push Iraq into deeper chaos. The triggering events could include mass sectarian killings, assassinations of major religious or political figures and a Sunni defection from the government, it says. Those events could lead to "rapid deterioration with grave humanitarian, political and security consequences."

greg.miller@latimes.com

Times staff writers Maura Reynolds and Noam N. Levey contributed to this report.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Major findings of the report

From Times Staff and Wire Reports

Here are the main findings of the declassified portion of the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, with excerpts from the report in quotes. The full text of the summary, produced by 16 U.S. intelligence agencies, can be found at http://www.dni.gov .

· Growing polarization of Iraqi society, weak security forces and a weak government are driving violence and political extremism.

· If new plans for Iraq don't work over the coming year to 18 months, security in Iraq will continue to deteriorate as in the second half of 2006.

· Even if the violence lessens, Iraqi leaders will be hard-pressed to stabilize the country by mid-2008 "given the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene."

· Iraq faces daunting challenges driven by Shiite Muslim insecurity after years of Sunni Arab domination, Sunni unwillingness to accept minority status, divided leaders who can't control the groups they represent, a movement by ethnic Kurds toward autonomy, an ineffective Iraqi army, extremist groups inside and outside Iraq and problems with refugees.

"Despite real improvements, the Iraqi security forces (ISF) — particularly the Iraqi police — will be hard-pressed in the next 12 to 18 months to execute significantly increased security responsibilities, and particularly to operate independently against Shia militias with success. Sectarian divisions erode the dependability of many units, many are hampered by personnel and equipment shortfalls, and a number of Iraqi units have refused to serve outside of the areas where they were recruited."

· The term "civil war" "accurately describes key aspects of the conflict in Iraq, including the hardening of ethno-sectarian identities, a sea change in the character of the violence, ethno-sectarian mobilization and population displacements." Nevertheless, the term doesn't encompass all of the conflict's complexities.

· American and other foreign forces play a key role in the country, and the Iraqi army probably wouldn't survive a rapid U.S. withdrawal. "If coalition forces were withdrawn rapidly during the [12- to 18-month] term of this estimate, we judge that this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq, intensify Sunni resistance to the Iraqi government and have adverse consequences for national reconciliation. If such a rapid withdrawal were to take place, we judge that the ISF would be unlikely to survive as a nonsectarian national institution."

· Political developments, particularly Sunni acceptance of the current government, concessions from the Shiites and the Kurds and efforts to reduce violence in neighborhoods could help calm the conflict. "A key enabler for all of these steps would be stronger Iraqi leadership."

DOJ_NMG_0127862

· Iraq's neighbors have some influence in the country and in some cases have intensified the conflict, but they don't play a major role because the sectarian divisions are firmly entrenched and driven by internal political forces.

· Other Sunni Arab regimes in the region are reluctant to support the Shiite-dominated Baghdad government and are considering supporting Sunni groups in Iraq. Turkey wants a stable Iraq to keep a Turkish Kurdish separatist group from finding safe haven in northern Iraq.

· "A number of identifiable internal security and political triggering events, including sustained mass sectarian killings, assassination of major religious and political leaders and a complete Sunni defection from the government have the potential to convulse severely Iraq's security environment. Should these events take place, they could spark an abrupt increase in communal and insurgent violence and shift Iraq's trajectory from gradual decline to rapid deterioration with grave humanitarian, political and security consequences."

· If the security situation worsens, one of three scenarios might emerge: The central government could disintegrate and lead to a de facto partition of Iraq along sectarian lines, resulting in protracted violence; a Shiite strongman could emerge; or an anarchic pattern of local control could arise, leading to chaos and extreme violence.

Intelligence Estimate Warns On Quick Iraq Pullout (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

A new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq warns that pulling U.S. troops out of the country too soon would lead to a collapse of the Iraqi military, outside intervention and the creation of safe havens for al Qaeda terrorists.

An unclassified summary of the 90-page estimate, "Prospects for Iraq's Stability: A Challenging Road Ahead," stated that U.S. and allied troops "remain an essential stabilizing element in Iraq."

"If coalition forces were withdrawn rapidly, ... we judge that this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq, intensify Sunni resistance to the Iraqi government and have adverse consequences for national reconciliation," the report stated.

The conclusion is a blow to Iraq war critics in Congress and elsewhere who are advocating a pullout of U.S. troops.

"If such a rapid withdrawal were to take place, we judge that the [Iraqi Security Force] would be unlikely to survive as a non-sectarian national institution; neighboring countries ... might intervene openly in the conflict; massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement would be probable," the report stated.

Also, the al Qaeda terrorist group in Iraq would try to "use parts of the country -- particularly al-Anbar province -- to plan increased attacks in and outside of Iraq."

Additionally, Turkey could launch a military incursion if there were no U.S. or allied troops to block Kurdish attempts to control northern Iraq, according to the report.

White House National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said President Bush agreed with the report's conclusion about the danger of removing troops too rapidly.

"That's why the president concluded that while the current strategy was not working and it was a prescription for slow failure, an American withdrawal or stepping back now would be a prescription for fast failure and a chaos that would envelop not only Iraq but also the region and could potentially, by giving al Qaeda a safe haven in Iraq, result in risk and threats to the United States," Mr. Hadley said.

The estimate, a consensus of 16 U.S. intelligence agencies that was ordered by members of Congress, presents a pessimistic view of the prospects for stabilizing Iraq and halting the growing violence over the next 12 to 18 months.

Unless the trends are reversed in that time, "we assess that the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate at rates comparable to the latter part of 2006," the report stated.

However, it stated, the Iraqi military and police will be "hard-pressed" over the next 18 months to take on greater security roles or operate alone against Shi'ite militias.

A strengthened Iraqi military backed by U.S. and allied forces would give Iraqi leaders a chance to foster "political compromise" needed for long-term stability, political progress and economic renewal, the report stated.

The current violence is more than a religious and ethnic civil war, the report stated, citing extensive Shi'ite-on-Shi'ite violence, al Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces and criminal attacks.

Developments that could reverse the negative trends include broader Sunni acceptance of the political structure, concessions by Shi'ites and Kurds toward Sunnis, and a local community-outreach effort to mend differences between groups and tribes, according to the report.

"A key enabler for all of these steps would be stronger Iraqi leadership, which could enhance the positive impact of all the above developments," the report stated.

DOJ_NMG_0127863

On outside influence, the report stated that Iranian support for insurgents intensifies the conflict, and that Syria is providing safe haven for insurgents and has failed to stop the flow of terrorists into Iraq.

Rep. Ike Skelton, Missouri Democrat and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said the report "demonstrates that the situation in Iraq is indeed dire and deteriorating," the Associated Press reported.

"It saddens me that the pessimistic impressions I gained during my recent trip to Iraq are reinforced by the conclusions of the latest NIE," Mr. Skelton said.

Iraq Conflict Has Elements Of "civil War" (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo, Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

The Iraqi government will be "hard-pressed" to achieve political reconciliation over the next 18 months as it tackles a "civil war" and the insurgency, according to a key US intelligence report.

The National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, a comprehensive report approved by the entire intelligence community, also warned that Iraqi security forces would have great difficulty clamping down on Shia militias without US support.

"Even if violence is diminished, given the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene, Iraqi leaders will be hard-pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation in the [next 12-18 months]," said the long-awaited report.

It was the first official US document released to the public that concluded that elements of the conflict in Iraq constituted a "civil war".

"The term 'civil war' does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq, which includes extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, al-Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces and widespread criminally motivated violence," said the report.

"Nonetheless, the term 'civil war' accurately describes key elements of the Iraqi conflict, including the hardening of ethno-sectarian identities, a sea change in the character of the violence, ethno-sectarian mobilisation and population displacements."

The Bush administration has resisted using the term "civil war" to describe the deteriorating conditions in Iraq. Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, shifted attention on Friday from the NIE's use of the phrase by citing a long passage from an Iraqi official, denying that Iraq was in a civil war.

When asked if Mr Bush now accepted that "civil war" did accurately describe part of the violence in Iraq, he said the president accepted the conclusions about "hardening of ethno-sectarian identities, a sea change in the character of the violence, ethno-sectarian mobilisation and population displacements".

The declassified version of NIE did not include reference to two elements of the full 90-page report, which included dissenting views in the intelligence community over the role of Iran and Syria in Iraq.

On Syria, analysts disagree over the complicity of Damascus in allowing extremists to flow across the border into Iraq. On Iran, they differed over whether the government was harbouring al-Qaeda members inside Iran.

The Bush administration has stepped up both military and rhetorical pressure on Iran in recent weeks. Senior officials have argued that Iran is responsible for killing American and British soldiers inside Iraq.

But Robert Gates, the defence secretary, said on Friday that the Pentagon did not know whether the Iranian government was sponsoring the efforts.

Democrats immediately leapt on the report as evidence that Mr Bush's military surge in Iraq would fail. Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader, said the report was the "latest in a long line of bleak assessments . . . indicating the president's plan is flawed and failing".

But the report concluded that a sudden withdrawal of US troops would propel Iraq into great chaos. It said the Iraqi security forces "would be unlikely to survive as a non-sectarian national institution" and neighbouring countries might "intervene openly in the conflict".

Elements Of "Civil War" In Iraq (BBC)

BBC.com, February 2, 2007

A US intelligence assessment on Iraq says "civil war" accurately describes certain aspects of the conflict, including intense sectarian violence.

However the report, compiled by US security agencies, adds that the controversial term does not adequately sum up the complexity of the situation.

The National Intelligence Estimate gives a bleak assessment of Iraq's future unless the violence is stemmed.

The White House described the report as "tough but fair".

DOJ_NMG_0127864

The document uses "civil war" to describe elements of the conflict, including "the hardening of ethno-sectarian identities, a sea change in the character of the violence and population displacements".

It says violence between Sunnis and Shias is being driven by increasing polarisation within Iraqi society, compounded by a weak government and security force.

The UN says the war has produced the biggest movement of refugees in the Middle East since the creation of Israel in 1948.

However, the report points out that the conflict also includes Shia-on-Shia violence, al-Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces, and widespread violence by criminals.

US Defence Secretary Robert Gates said the term "civil war" over-simplified the situation.

"I believe that there are essentially four wars going on in Iraq: one is Shia-on-Shia, principally in the south; the second is sectarian conflict, principally in Baghdad; third is the insurgency; and fourth is al-Qaeda," he told reporters before the intelligence estimate was issued.

'Ominous consequences'

The report also warned of ominous consequences if the level of violence went unchecked.

"Unless efforts to reverse these conditions show measurable progress during the term of this estimate in the coming 12 to 18 months, we assess that the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate."

Bombings and mortar attacks are a daily threat to Iraqi civilians It adds: "Coalition capabilities including force levels, resources and operations remain an essential stabilising element in Iraq."

US national security adviser Steve Hadley said the report was "a tough look at Iraq", but did not contradict the president's plans to send 21,500 additional troops.

Instead, it "explains why the president concluded that a new approach, a new strategy was required", he said.

The BBC's Ian Watson in Washington says the Bush administration is likely to use the report to justify the president's new strategy, as it concludes the Iraqi security forces will be hard-pressed to operate on their own against Shia militias.

The document argued against a quick withdrawal of US troops, saying it would fracture the Iraqi army, strengthen al-Qaeda elements in the country and significantly increase violence.

However, the Democratic leader of the House of Representatives, Nancy Pelosi, said "no number of US troops is going to change" the deadly circle in Iraq.

"Our emphasis should be on working with Iraq's leaders and Iraq's neighbours to produce the kind of political and diplomatic breakthroughs that offer the best chance to stop the violence," she said.

The report - the first National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq in more than two years - also says Iran and to a lesser extent Syria are contributing to a worsening of the situation.

Analysts: Iraq Report Lays Out Tough Road For Success (CNN)

CNN.com, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The national intelligence estimate on Iraq released Friday does not address whether the president's plan to "surge" up to 21,500 troops into Iraq will work, but it lays out an extremely chaotic and complex situation that will make it difficult for those troops to succeed, intelligence and military analysts told CNN.

It will be up to the policy makers -- including President Bush and Congress -- to decide if the additional troops have a legitimate chance of success in the situation that the report says is "deteriorating," said John McLaughlin, a former deputy director of the CIA and CNN intelligence analyst. (Watch how the report reached its blistering conclusions)

"This is a pretty clear-eyed assessment by the intelligence community," McLaughlin said. "They didn't hold anything back." (Read the report -- PDF)

The estimate was formulated at the time the president crafted his new Iraq policy, and Bush had access to the same information the intelligence community used to form the estimate's judgments.

McLaughlin said the intelligence community didn't make an assessment of whether the troop increase would work, in part, because it didn't have enough data to make a recommendation and, in part, because it did not want to weigh in on a debate that is essentially political. (Watch McLaughlin break down the NIE)

But the report did say that combating the increasing sectarian violence is a "daunting" task because Shiites are insecure about their hold on power after decades of Sunni hegemony in the social, political and economic realms, and Sunnis are deeply skeptical of a Shiite-controlled government they view as "illegitimate and incompetent."

"No matter how much we surge, no matter how many resources we pour into Iraq, unless you get unity of effort with the Iraqi government, that the Iraqi people themselves are the main purpose and not the tribes, the sects, the different pieces, we'll have a tough go at making any change," said retired Gen. David Grange, a CNN military analyst.

DOJ_NMG_0127865

Yet, having viewed the intelligence that went into the estimate while drafting his new Iraq strategy, the president believes the U.S. still has a chance to stabilize the situation by adding up to five brigades.

Stephen Hadley, the U.S. national security adviser, said Friday that Bush concluded that in Iraq, the "status quo is not stable" and that change was needed.

"It's going to be hard and the president made it clear it's going to be hard. There's no assurance for success," he said.

The president's plan is a strategy that many lawmakers -- both Democrats and Republicans -- in the Congress remain highly skeptical of, and little in the report, they said, gave the skeptical lawmakers reason to change their minds.

"I do not see anything so far in the report that suggests the president's new plan is a winning strategy that protects America's national interest," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nevada, said in a statement. "Rather this NIE appears to be the latest in a long line of bleak assessments by foreign policy and military experts indicating the president's plan is flawed and failing."

"Nothing in this document tells us that sending 21,500 additional troops to Iraq will make the situation better," the Democratic chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, Rep. Silvestre Reyes of Texas, said in a statement.

The estimate also makes it clear, however, that simply walking away from Iraq may even be worse. If the U.S. makes a "rapid withdrawal" from Iraq, a move many Democratic lawmakers have called for, the estimate said it could lead to the collapse of the Iraqi Security Forces, potentially plunging the country into a chaotic situation marked by "extreme ethno-sectarian violence with debilitating intra-group clashes."

And it is such a situation, the White House argues, the U.S. simply cannot accept.

"An American withdrawal or stepping back now would be a prescription for fast failure and a chaos that would envelop not only Iraq, but also the region," Hadley said.

Iraq, And Analysis, Revisited (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

The intelligence community's bleak set of judgments about Iraq, made public yesterday, differs significantly from the flawed assessments of that country's alleged weapons programs that the White House released more than four years ago.

Twenty-seven pages of confident assertions about a nuclear weapons program, mustard gas, nerve agents and elusive government ties to al-Qaeda have been replaced, more than four years later, with heavily qualified glimmers of hope across a mere 3 1/2 pages laying out the prospects for reversing Iraq's dive into chaos.

The intelligence community's glossy October 2002 estimate, which claimed that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, was touted by the White House as a main reason for war with Iraq. After no such weapons were found, the intelligence community -- particularly the CIA -- significantly altered the way in which it would conduct future analyses, highlight uncertainty and acknowledge dissent.

Current and former intelligence officers said a better system for producing the National Intelligence Estimate was put in place immediately. The result, they said, is that the new estimate -- which describes an Iraq engulfed by numerous bloody wars -- is strikingly similar to a still-classified assessment written in late 2004 and widely distributed among President Bush's top advisers.

That assessment predicted that over a period of 12 to 18 months, there would be "at best, tenuous stability, at worst a slide into civil war" in Iraq, said Paul R. Pillar, a Middle East scholar and veteran intelligence officer who was one of the report's principal authors.

"If you could compare the 2004 and 2007 estimates, it would be clear they are two installments of the same story, done the same way. The only difference is that the policy debate has become more intense in the intervening two years because the situation has become worse and worse," said Pillar, who left the intelligence community in 2005 and now teaches at Georgetown University.

Pillar could not discuss details of the 2004 assessment, but a senior intelligence official agreed to discuss some of its findings on the condition of anonymity. The official said that like yesterday's estimate, the 2004 review offered three difficult scenarios for Iraq, all of which have been borne out to some degree.

"We imagined some slow and uneven progress, which has happened in parts of the country," the official said. The estimate also considered a breakup of Iraq along sectarian lines. "The preconditions for that have sort of happened, but only really up in the north with the Kurds; and the third one was chaos and instability and we've certainly seen some of that."

Based on the accuracy of the previous political estimates, Pillar said, it is very possible that the worst-case scenarios set out in yesterday's assessment could occur in the next year and a half.

DOJ_NMG_0127866

In crafting key judgments of the 2007 estimate, analysts from across the intelligence community laid out three possible scenarios, each of which could have enormously negative consequences for Iraq: Chaos leading to partition, the emergence of a Shiite strongman who would seize power and rule by dictatorship, or a complete collapse of central control resulting in violent fiefdoms across the country.

The official said the new estimate "highlighted a trend of deterioration that is not irreversible. But if it's not reversed soon, then we're heading toward a worsening security situation over the next 12 to 18 months. It's more of a main judgment than we were able to give in 2004, if significantly caveated."

Robert Hutchings, who until 2004 was the chairman of the National Intelligence Council, which produced the earlier assessments, said, "The basic tack on the political, security and economic situation in Iraq has been pretty consistent, before, during and after the war."

Hutchings, who is now a diplomat-in-residence at Princeton University, said a January 2003 estimate, which was done two months before the U.S. invasion of Iraq and which also remains classified, was the first to include the word "insurgency." The 2004 estimate "was the first to use the term 'civil war,' " he said.

Pillar said, "What we saw and see today is a very unfavorable state of affairs and unfavorable trend lines."

The senior intelligence official who agreed to discuss some aspects of both reports said that while the 2004 estimate now seems prescient, analysts failed to predict "the rapid degree of intensification of sectarian mobilization and consciousness, and the speed in which that happened. I don't think we were that insightful."

No Way Out (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON

"Everything you've heard and read is true. And I am deeply sorry about that." Who said it?

(a) George Bush, about the chilling new intelligence report on Iraq.

(b) Joe Biden, about his self-imploding prolixity.

(c) Condi Rice, on her ability to understand Peyton Manning's vulnerabilities better than Nuri Kamal al-Malaki's.

(d) Silvio Berlusconi, on his wife's Junoesque lightning bolt after his public flirting.

(e) Jacques Chirac, after giving a Gallic shrug at the prospect of Iran getting un or deux nuclear weapons.

(f) Hillary Clinton, on enabling the president to invade Iraq.

(g) Barack Obama, for the ultimate sin of not being black enough or white enough.

(h) Mary Cheney, on her decision to work on her terrifying dad's homophobic campaign because the thought of John Kerry was "terrifying."

(i) Gavin Newsom, the mayor of San Francisco, about his affair with his campaign manager's wife.

The answer is Gavin Newsom.

It's rare to get a simple apology when a complex obfuscation will do.

Even after releasing parts of an intelligence report so pessimistic that it may as well have been titled "Iraq: We're Cooked," Bush officials clung to their alternate reality, using nonsensical logic and cherry-picking whatever phrases they could find in the report that they could use to sell the Surge.

In the 2004 National Intelligence Estimate, civil war was a worst-case scenario. In the 2007 one, Iraq has zoomed past civil war to hell: "The Intelligence Community judges that the term 'civil war' does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq, which includes extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, Al Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces, and widespread criminally motivated violence."

As John McLaughlin, the former acting director of central intelligence, told The Times's Mark Mazzetti: "Civil war is checkers. This is chess."

Far from Dick Cheney's claim of "enormous successes" and Gen. William Casey's claim of "slow progress," the report shows that any path the U.S. takes in Iraq could lead to a river of blood. It says that in the absence of any strong Sunni and Shiite leaders who can control their groups, prospects are dim for a cohesive government, much less a democracy.

If the violence gets worse, the report concludes, three sulfurous possibilities loom: chaos leading to partition, the emergence of a Shiite strongman or anarchy "mixing extreme ethnosectarian violence with debilitating intragroup clashes."

So after four years of war, we get to choose between chaos, another Saddam or anarchy. Good work, W. And at such bargain prices; the administration is breaking the record for the military budget, asking for $100 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan this year and $145 billion more for 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0127867

The White House thinks it can somehow spin the Iraq apocalypse so it sounds as if multiple wars are better than one civil war.

At a Pentagon briefing yesterday, Bob Gates rebuffed the idea of a civil war, saying: "I think that the words 'civil war' oversimplify a very complex situation in Iraq. I believe that there are essentially four wars going on in Iraq. One is Shia on Shia, principally in the south. The second is sectarian conflict, principally in Baghdad but not solely. Third is the insurgency, and fourth is Al Qaeda."

That's a relief, all right — we're in four wars in Iraq and threatening another with Iran.

Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, agreed that the term civil war is unacceptable: "We need to get across the complexities of the situation we face in Iraq ... and simple labels don't do that."

When General Casey testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee on Thursday, he sounded as if he was talking about a completely different Iraq than the one limned in the intelligence report. "Today," he said, "Iraqis are poised to assume responsibility for their own security by the end of 2007, still with some level of support from us."

Compare that with the bleak tone of the report, which states that "the Iraqi Security Forces — particularly the Iraqi police — will be hard-pressed in the next 12 to 18 months to execute significantly increased security responsibilities, and particularly to operate independently against Shia militias with success."

It's official. We're in a cycle of violence so complex and awful that withdrawing American troops will make it worse and keeping American troops there may also make it worse.

We can try or we can leave, but either way, it seems, we're cooked.

Bush To Request Billions For Wars (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

President Bush will ask Congress for close to three-quarters of a trillion dollars in defense spending on Monday, including $245 billion to cover the cost of fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan and other elements of the "global war on terror," senior administration officials said yesterday.

Democrats said the gigantic spending request will precipitate "sticker shock" on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers were already planning to scrutinize White House war-spending requests more zealously.

As expected, Bush will ask Congress for an additional $100 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan for the current fiscal year, to go with the $70 billion already approved. He will also seek an additional $145 billion for the wars in fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1, and administration officials warned that even more money probably will be needed.

Those totals come on top of regular spending for the Pentagon, which officials say will be $481 billion in 2008, a 10 percent increase over this year's budget.

If approved by Congress, the new war spending would bring the overall cost of fighting to about $745 billion since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States -- adjusting for inflation, more than was spent on the Vietnam War.

The administration has obtained most of the funding for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan through emergency or supplemental spending bills, which are not subject to the same level of congressional scrutiny as the regular budget. That practice has drawn sharp criticism from lawmakers and members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

To answer those critics, White House budget officials say they will offer a much more detailed accounting of the costs of the war than they have previously provided, adding a special chapter to the thick budget books the president plans to send to Congress. But those details could be used by opponents of the war in arguing their case, according to lawmakers and other experts on Pentagon spending. Moreover, some war critics in Congress have served notice that they intend to use the spending bills containing the new money to try to bring the war in Iraq to a close.

"The defense budget request is the sleeper political issue of the year," said John J. Hamre, a former top Pentagon official who is chief executive of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "When you add the various supplemental requests to the baseline defense budget, you get an astounding number, a number easily exploited by political opponents."

Top House Democrats, gathered yesterday in Williamsburg for a retreat, sounded skeptical about the new defense numbers and said they will not give the president a blank check.

"This is a huge number," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who noted that it includes an "opportunity cost" that would cut into Democrats' ability to fund domestic priorities.

"You can't help but note the irony: The president calls for us to rein in spending but sends us a budget for more than $700 billion in new spending," said House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.). "For Republicans who profess to oppose big spending, this will be a budget they will find hard to swallow."

DOJ_NMG_0127868

Still, Spratt, Pelosi and other lawmakers did not rule out supporting the request. "We clearly want to make sure our troops have everything they need," said Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.), a member of the House Appropriations Committee.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said in a statement that Democrats pledge to provide U.S. troops with "everything they need to do their jobs" but warned: "It is past time for the President to accurately and appropriately budget for this war and give the American people a full accounting of its true cost."

Though defense spending would see huge increases, the president's budget would allow a 1 percent increase for spending other than on defense, the first time in two years Bush has not sought cuts in government operations outside the Pentagon and homeland security.

Bush's budget also calls for slowing the rapid growth of Medicare, the federal health program for the elderly, by one percentage point. The president proposes to slice $66 billion over five years from previous projections by reducing payments to health-care providers such as hospitals and nursing homes and by charging wealthier seniors higher premiums for prescription-drug coverage.

The president wants to extend tax cuts that were enacted in 2001 and 2003 instead of letting them expire in 2010, as they are scheduled to do, and his budget would prevent the alternative minimum tax from expanding to ensnare millions of additional families next year. But after that, the president's budget would depend on billions of dollars in new revenue because of the rapid growth of the AMT.

That additional revenue -- along with projections for a healthy economy -- would allow Bush to keep his promise that the budget would be balanced by 2012, according to administration estimates, and that there would be a surplus, the first since Bush took office in 2001, despite a significant increase in military spending.

Since the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, Congress has approved about $500 billion for military operations and terrorism-related activities, much of it appropriated as emergency spending. The Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton, concluded in December that the public has not been "well-served" by that process and that the funds have received minimal scrutiny from either the White House or the Republican-controlled Congress.

Since Democrats took charge on Capitol Hill last month, they have promised to scrutinize the administration's spending requests more aggressively.

"We're going to be very focused in looking to see whether the funds are being spent wisely or simply going to fatten the pockets of big contractors like Halliburton," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.).

Vin Weber, a Republican strategist and former congressman, said he has long thought the coming defense bills would be among the most controversial facing the new Congress, which is now considering a nonbinding resolution to condemn Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq.

Although some members have talked about tying the president's hands through the budget process, others are reluctant to try that for fear of being accused of not supporting the troops. If the situation in Iraq does not improve, however, many Democrats will be under pressure to restrict funding, Weber said.

Whatever happens on the battlefield, Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) predicted, the United States will be paying for the war for years to come.

"There's going to be real sticker shock when we get down to what the truth is about the cost of this war," he said. "It's going to be way beyond what anybody has fessed up to."

Record $622 Billion Budget Requested For The Pentagon (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The Bush administration is seeking a record military budget of $622 billion for the 2008 fiscal year, Pentagon officials have said. The sum includes more than $140 billion for war-related costs.

The administration is also seeking $93 billion in the current fiscal year, which ends on Sept. 30, to pay for military operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, the officials said.

The requests are part of the annual budget request to Congress for all federal spending programs. The budget is to be made public on Monday, and Congress will revise it in the coming months.

Together with money for combat operations this year already approved by Congress, the new request would push spending related to Iraq and Afghanistan to $163 billion.

“It is the highest level of spending since the height of the Korean War,” said Steven Kosiak, a military budget expert with the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a policy analysis organization here.

DOJ_NMG_0127869

Mr. Kosiak said that in 1952 the United States spent the equivalent of $645 billion in today's dollars, factoring in inflation, and that in the Korean War military spending exceeded 13 percent of the gross national product. The figure is now 4 percent.

With Democrats in control of Congress and opposition to the Iraq war running strong, the administration's request may face even greater scrutiny than it has in recent years. But few if any budget experts expect significant cuts in military spending while large numbers of troops are in combat in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In a statement, the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, said: "Democrats pledge that our troops will receive everything they need to do their jobs. We will also subject this supplemental to the tough and serious oversight that Congress has ignored for four years."

The regular Pentagon budget request for 2008, which excludes war-related costs but covers Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine costs as well as other spending, will be $481 billion, a Pentagon official said. That would be an increase of $49 billion over what Congress provided this year, Mr. Kosiak said.

"As long as we're engaged in major military operations, you are probably not going to see decreases in the baseline budget," he said.

The Pentagon is seeking $128.6 billion for the Army, $110.7 billion for the Air Force and $140 billion for the Navy, department officials said.Background briefings for members of Congress and their staffs have begun. As details leaked out, Pentagon officials agreed to provide an outline of the request. The officials said the budget included no cancellations of major weapons systems, despite delays and escalating costs in procurement accounts in all the services.

The $141 billion request for war-related costs in 2008 represents the first time the administration has tried at the beginning of the budget cycle to provide a total estimate for how much the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and other military operations will cost a year in advance.

Congress has been pressing the administration for several years to provide such estimates. Even as they comply, Pentagon officials emphasized that actual costs could be far different, depending on the course of the wars.

The budget request, which takes many months to prepare, is being released as the administration is sending an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

A spokesman for the Pentagon, Bryan Whitman, said Friday that that the Office of Management and Budget had estimated that the additional forces would cost $5.6 billion in the current fiscal year, which ends in September.

On Thursday, the Congressional Budget Office released its estimate, which said the costs could run much higher.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, at a Pentagon news conference, disputed the office's estimate, saying it greatly overstated the number of support troops that would be necessary to go along with the 21,500 increase in combat forces.

Mr. Gates also said he had recommended that President Bush nominate Adm. Timothy J. Keating of the Navy, now commander of Norad, as commander of the United States Pacific Command, making him the top commander in the Pacific, and Lt. Gen. Gene Reunart of the Air Force to head the Northern Command, which is responsible for defending the continental United States.

Rifts Emerge On Iran Policy (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen, Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration's war of words with Iran is sparking divisions within the government over how heavily Tehran actually is involved in fomenting instability in Iraq -- and how aggressive a stance the U.S. should adopt in response.

The White House has steadily ratcheted up its public statements about Iran, with senior officials in both Washington and Baghdad promising to take steps to curb what they portray as Iran's continuing transfers of weapons, money and military trainers to Shiite militants in Iraq. Some U.S. officials have suggested Iran may have played a direct role in a sophisticated attack in the Iraqi city of Karbala in late January that left five Americans dead.

But U.S. opinion about Iran is far from monolithic, and divisions over the country's intentions and activities in Iraq are emerging within the military and the intelligence community. The skeptics are challenging key aspects of the Bush administration's justifications for its hard-line approach toward Iran, making it more difficult for the White House to rally public support.

Those tensions broke into the open with the release Friday of declassified portions of the new National Intelligence Estimate about Iraq, which represents the collective findings of the intelligence community's 16 agencies. The report said Iran is playing only a minimal role in stoking sectarian violence in Iraq, an assessment that runs counter to a string of recent public statements by administration officials accusing Tehran of contributing significantly to Iraq's instability.

DOJ_NMG_0127870

While the report said "Iranian lethal support for select groups of Iraqi Shia militants clearly intensifies the conflict in Iraq," it concluded that Iraq's raging sectarian war would continue even if Iran completely ended its involvement.

"The involvement of these outside actors is not likely to be a major driver of violence ... because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics," the report said.

The release came as the administration delayed -- for the second time -- a planned release of military evidence that it says will buttress its claims that Iran is funneling weapons to Iraqi Shiites. National Security Adviser Steve Hadley acknowledged that the administration was concerned about the quality of the evidence that was to be presented.

"The truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts," he said.

The intelligence report issued yesterday, entitled "Prospects for Iraq's Stability: A Challenging Road Ahead," was requested by Congress and runs to 90 pages in its classified form. It presented a bleak assessment of conditions in Iraq, arguing that the "term 'civil war' accurately describes key elements of the Iraq conflict" even though the overall violence there was part of a conflict even more dangerous and complex than a traditional civil war. (See related article1.)

The report's skeptical assessment of Iran's overall role in Iraq echoes what many current and former U.S. officials have been saying for months. While most agree that largely Shiite Iran has been working to expand its influence inside Iraq and its support for fellow Shiites there, they discount the idea that Tehran is a central player in fueling the unrest.

"There are two main engines of violence: the Sunni jihadists and the Shiite militias that have been in operation since February 2006. Neither of these two cycles of violence was incited by the Iranians," says Wayne White, a member of the Iraq Study Group and a former State Department intelligence analyst. "Whatever the Iranians are doing has to be like 1% of the total problem."

While playing down Iran's influence on Iraq's overall security situation, U.S. intelligence agencies generally agree with the Bush administration's contention that Tehran is funding and supplying munitions to Shiite militias.

Military and intelligence officials say they are particularly concerned by Iran's alleged supplying of shaped charges -- a particularly lethal type of roadside bomb capable of penetrating tanks and armored vehicles. U.S. officials say members of Shiite militias have used those munitions to kill American and British servicemen.

Even here, the evidence remains murky. The Bush administration has long accused Iran of arming Iraq's Shiite fighters, but has never been able to provide clear evidence substantiating the allegations.

On Jan. 24, the U.S. ambassador to Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, said the government would publicly release evidence buttressing the claims "in the coming days." The briefing was delayed without explanation, however, then delayed a second time a few days ago. Mr. Hadley declined to say when it would ultimately take place.

U.S. Can't Prove Iran Link To Iraq Strife (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

Despite pledges to show evidence, officials have repeatedly put off presenting their case.

WASHINGTON — Bush administration officials acknowledged Friday that they had yet to compile evidence strong enough to back up publicly their claims that Iran is fomenting violence against U.S. troops in Iraq.

Administration officials have long complained that Iran was supplying Shiite Muslim militants with lethal explosives and other materiel used to kill U.S. military personnel. But despite several pledges to make the evidence public, the administration has twice postponed the release — most recently, a briefing by military officials scheduled for last Tuesday in Baghdad.

"The truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts," national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley said Friday.

The acknowledgment comes amid shifting administration messages on Iran. After several weeks of saber rattling that included a stiff warning by President Bush and the dispatch of two aircraft carrier strike groups to the Persian Gulf, near Iran, the administration has insisted in recent days that it does not want to escalate tensions or to invade Iran.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates seemed to concede Friday that U.S. officials can't say for sure whether the Iranian government is involved in assisting the attacks on U.S. personnel in Iraq.

"I don't know that we know the answer to that question," Gates said.

Earlier this week, U.S. officials acknowledged that they were uncertain about the strength of their evidence and were reluctant to issue potentially questionable data in the wake of the intelligence failures and erroneous assessments that preceded the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

In particular, officials worried about a repetition of former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell's February 2003 U.N. appearance to present the U.S. case against Iraq. In that speech, Powell cited evidence that was later discredited.

DOJ_NMG_0127871

In rejecting the case compiled against Iran, senior U.S. officials, including Hadley, Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, confirmed Friday that they were concerned about possible inaccuracies.

"I and Secretary Rice and the national security advisor want to make sure that the briefing that is provided is absolutely accurate and is dominated by facts — serial numbers, technology and so on," Gates told reporters at the Pentagon.

Another reason for the delay, as is often the case when releasing intelligence, was that officials were concerned about inadvertently helping adversaries identify the agents or sources that provided the intelligence, Hadley said.

Hadley also said that the administration sought to delay the release of evidence until after a key intelligence report on Iraq was unveiled, so that Americans could place the evidence in the context of the broader conflict.

That report, called a National Intelligence Estimate, was issued Friday, concluding that Iraq was deteriorating and faces a bleak future that U.S. efforts may do little to avert.

However, the report tends to downplay the role of Iran and Syria, another target of U.S. criticism, in fomenting sectarian violence, while acknowledging that Iranian involvement "intensifies" the conflict.

"The involvement of these outside actors is not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics," says the report, compiled by experts from the nation's 16 intelligence agencies.

Few doubt that Iran is working to increase its influence inside Iraq, but many of its beneficiaries have been political groups that also are allied with the United States.

So far, the U.S. government has provided scant evidence that the government of Iran is directly supporting militant Shiite groups.

U.S. military leaders in Iraq have said they have evidence that Iran is behind the supply network of explosives. Military officials have blamed Iran for the increasing casualties caused by the use of "shaped charge" explosive devices that can penetrate armored vehicles.

"What we are trying to do is … counter what the Iranians are doing to our soldiers, their involvement in activities, particularly these explosively formed projectiles that are killing our troops, and we are trying to get them to stop their nuclear enrichment," Gates said.

U.S. officials detained five Iranians in a raid in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil last month, accusing them of planning attacks on Americans.

Gates also acknowledged Friday that there was "a lot of speculation" about involvement by Iranians in the abduction and killings of five U.S. servicemen in Karbala last month. But he refused to say whether an investigation had turned up any evidence that Iranians took part.

"I would just tell you flatly that the investigation is still going on, and the information that I've seen is ambiguous," Gates said. "It's not clear yet."

In a major speech on Iraq last month, Bush accused Iran of "providing material support for attacks on American troops" and vowed to "seek out and destroy" weapon transport networks.

Since then, Air Force officials have said they are planning new missions that could include flights along the Iran-Iraq border aimed at disrupting weapons shipments.

Iranian officials challenged the Americans to produce evidence of their charges, and Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, pledged last week to do so.

The increasingly harsh words from the Bush administration stoked fears of a possible U.S. attack on Iran. In recent days, the White House and top U.S. officials have sought to counter the concern. Gates became the latest administration official to offer such reassurances.

"The president has made clear, the secretary of State has made clear, I've made clear … we are not planning for a war with Iran," Gates said Friday.

maura.reynolds@latimes.com

Times staff writer Julian E. Barnes in Washington contributed to this report.

Defense Secretary Says Carrier Dispatch To Gulf Meant To Dramatize Commitment There (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Friday that the decision to send a second U.S. carrier to the Persian Gulf region does not mean the United States is planning for a war with Iran.

Gates told Pentagon reporters the U.S. is trying to stem Iranian involvement in ongoing violence by Iraqi insurgents, and said there are continuing concerns about Iran's move toward nuclear power. But he quickly added that the movement of the carrier is to demonstrate that America is committed to the Gulf region.

DOJ_NMG_0127872

He also said that he has not seen any credible proof yet that any Iranians were involved in the ambush last week in Karbala that left five soldiers dead.

'Nobody is planning, we are not planning for a war with Iran,' Gates told reporters at a Defense Department briefing.

The Bush administration has increased pressure on Iran in recent months in response to allegations that Iran has been helping train and provide explosives to extremists fighting U.S. troops in Iraq, and the long-running dispute over Iran's nuclear program.

Besides sending a second carrier task force to the Gulf, U.S. raids inside Iraq have netted Iranian officials and Bush has said that the U.S. will send anti-missile batteries to the region. He has also spoken about breaking up networks the Iranians use to help groups battling U.S. troops.

Defense Secretary: No Plans For War With Iran (CNN)

CNN, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Friday that the United States is "not planning for a war with Iran."

Gates said he was reiterating what President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have said earlier. The defense chief spoke at a press conference with Gen Peter Pace, chairman of Joint Chiefs of Staff.

But Gates said U.S. forces are "trying to counter" what Iranians are doing to U.S. forces in Iraq.

He said that "explosively formed projectiles" with roots in Iran were killing troops.

Calling the explosives by the acronym EFP, Gates said either the weaponry or the technology for it emanates from Iran. The weapon is more powerful than the roadside bombs that insurgents have used with deadly effectiveness to ambush American convoys in Iraq.

The EFP's increased sophistication allows it to penetrate armored vehicles, posing a greater threat to U.S. troops.

Gates said the U.S. military strategy is involved in "uprooting" the networks providing the EFP material as well as other explosives used to create the roadside bombs.

Referring to the latter explosives, Gates said, "these darn things account for about 70 percent of our casualties."

Pace said the military is "working day and night to disassemble" the networks bringing in explosives and the material to make them and is doing that "without regard to nationality" but to "who our enemies are."

"It is instructive that at least twice in the last month that in going after the networks we have picked up Iranians," Pace said.

When asked whether the government or rogue elements are shipping the material, Gates said, "I don't know that we know the answer to that question."

Military investigators reportedly have been looking into the possibility Iranians or Iranian-trained operatives carried out a January 20 attack on a Karbal military compound in southern Iraq that resulted in the deaths of five U.S. soldiers.

Gates said the investigation is ongoing and information about who was involved is "ambiguous."

Gates All But Rules Out Strike On Iran (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates yesterday all but ruled out military strikes on Iran, declaring "we are not planning for a war with Iran."

Mr. Gates, who has called military action against Iran an absolute last resort, made the denial during a flurry of press and Internet blogger speculation that President Bush is preparing to order strikes against Iran's nuclear facilities.

In announcing a new strategy for Iraq on Jan. 10, the president said U.S. troops would target Iranian agents inside the country who are aiding the deadly insurgency. The administration said Iran is supplying Shi'ite insurgents with powerful improvised explosive devices whose explosions penetrate armor and result in multiple casualties.

Mr. Bush also ordered an increase in the U.S. military presence in the Persian Gulf by deploying Patriot anti-missile batteries and a second aircraft carrier in the region.

Those twin moves stirred speculation that a war was in the offing. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has threaten to destroy Israel and refuses to stop enriching uranium, as the United Nations has demanded.

Administration officials say the buildup was done to mollify Persian Gulf Arab states who fear attacks from Iran, and to put pressure on Mr. Ahmadinejad.

Mr. Gates explained it this way: "What we are trying to do is, in Iraq, counter what the Iranians are doing to our soldiers, their involvement in activities, particularly these explosively formed projectiles that are killing our troops and we are trying to get them to stop their nuclear enrichment. We are doing the latter strictly through the diplomatic process. ... The diplomatic process is working and I think that that's where we are relying."

DOJ_NMG_0127873

At the White House, where officials released a new intelligence estimate on the Iraq war's path, National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said he has delayed release of a "white paper" detailing Iran's transgressions in Iraq.

Mr. Hadley told reporters the draft paper was "overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts."

Mr. Gates said the briefing is being compiled by the U.S. command in Baghdad. He said Cabinet officials "want to make sure that the briefing that is provided is absolutely accurate and is dominated by facts -- serial numbers, technology and so on."

Kurds Train For Battle With Iran (AP)

By Kathy Gannon, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

Deep in the mountains of eastern Iraq, a cluster of mud huts and the chatter of machine gun fire reveal another piece of the jigsaw puzzle called Kurdistan.

Here, recruits are training to fight Iran, one of the four countries that rule the fractured Kurdish people. And although they belong to an organization officially outlawed as terrorist by Washington, they appear to be operating unhindered either by Iraqi-Kurdish units or the limited U.S. force in Kurdish areas.

A boulder-studded road spirals up through sun-soaked mountains to a pale yellow building that flies the flag of the Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK), condemned as a terrorist organization by the U.S. and its NATO ally, Turkey.

A giant face of Abdullah Ocalan, the PKK founder who is serving a life sentence in Turkey, is painted on the mountainside. Ten miles farther on lies the Qandil range, which runs like a snow-dusted spine along Iraq's northern border with both Turkey and Iran.

In the camp, lugging heavy machine guns and AK-47 assault rifles, are men and women of the Party for a Free Life in Kurdistan, or PEJAK, an offshoot set up by the PKK in 2004 to fight for Kurdish autonomy in Iran.

The PKK and its affiliates are spread through a region of some 35 million Kurds that straddles Turkey, Iraq, Iran and Syria. PEJAK, the newest group, claims to number thousands of recruits, and targets only Iran — a mission which has made PEJAK the subject of intense speculation that it is being used to undermine the radical Islamic regime of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

In the Nov. 27 issue of The New Yorker, investigative reporter Seymour Hersh wrote that PEJAK was receiving support from the U.S. as well as from Israel, which fears Iran's nuclear ambitions and Ahmadinejad's call to wipe the Jewish state off the map.

The State Department Friday declined to comment on the claim of U.S. support for PEJAK.

PEJAK says it regularly launches raids into Iran, and Iran has fired back with artillery. In October the English-language Iran Daily, published by Iran's official news agency, said Iran accused PEJAK of killing dozens of its armed forces in insurgent attacks.

Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), a presidential candidate who claims the White House is overplaying the Iranian threat, last year wrote to President Bush expressing concern that the U.S. was using PEJAK to weaken Ahmadinejad.

James Brandon, an analyst for the U.S.-based Jamestown Foundation, told The Associated Press that PEJAK has refused to discuss its funding sources. But he said its greatest threat to Iran is not military. It has veins running deep into the Iranian Kurdish population and is offering to join forces with other restless minorities in Iran, he said.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said "Israel is not involved in any way in what's going on there."

Meir Javedanfar, an Israel-based Iran expert, noted however that Israel has a long-standing relationship with Iraqi Kurdish leader Mustafa Barzani and "It would not surprise me to discover that Israel is using the Kurdish areas of Iraq to undermine Iran's influence in Iraq and monitor what's going on along the Iranian border, as well as to undermine the Iranian government itself."

The AP recently spent two winter days at a PEJAK training camp tucked in the shadow of the Qandil Mountains in northern Iraq, listening to its followers describe their goals and operations in Iran.

According to a camp commander, Hussein Afsheen, "PKK gives ideological and logistical support" while funding comes from Iranian Kurds. He said he didn't know of U.S. funding, but would gladly accept it.

The camp is designed to toughen up the new recruits, who numbered 38 during the AP's visit. Beds are single wool blankets spread over a rough concrete floor, or over a narrow steel bench that hugs an icy mud wall. The only heat comes from a wood-fired potbelly stove.

It's still pitch dark and freezing at 5 a.m., when the fighters line up and pledge allegiance to the Kurdish cause.

Soztar Afreen, a 22-year-old Syrian with a quick smile, says she joined five years ago and the first months were tough.

DOJ_NMG_0127874

"I had trouble keeping up. You have to toughen yourself. The physical work is difficult but once you get used to it life here gets easier," she said.

She recalled that her parents, PKK sympathizers, sent her off with this plea: "Don't let down the struggle; make us proud."

Gunfire and explosions echo off mountainsides as recruits learn to fire artillery and rocket launchers and automatic rifles. They are taught to lay ambushes and to endure long hours isolated and in hiding.

Food is spartan — potatoes, tomato broth, onions and a lot of bread baked flat in a deep stone oven.

Much time is spent in ideological training and studying Ocalan's vision of a united Kurdistan, which the guerrillas say has gradually shifted from demanding full-blown independence to settling for autonomy as a distinct culture within the various countries where they live.

PEJAK ideology is rigorously leftist and includes equality of the sexes — unusual in this region. The camp has two leaders, a man and a woman.

The male one, Afsheen, is a Turkish Kurd who joined the PKK in 1990, at age 19. He said he enlisted after Turkish soldiers herded him, his family and his neighbors into the town square and burned down their homes.

Four shepherds were coming home and "The soldiers just opened fire on them. I had inside of me a lot of anger. I promised I would get my revenge," said Afsheen.

In training, "Recruits were put in a cave and left there for a month, allowed out only for half an hour each day. We walked for hours in frigid water," he said.

Afsheen said he has made several forays into Iran, including one monthlong trek to the Iranian town of Shahha three months ago, not to attack Iranians but to organize Kurds. "We were discovered. There was a firefight and it went on until dark. We were pinned down, trapped," he said.

"At nightfall we found an opening and we tried to slip out but we were discovered. The firing went on again and they called in their helicopters. One of our friends was wounded and three Iranian security men were killed."

Afsheen's co-leader is Beridon Dersim, who grew up in Austria and found her identity with the PKK.

"What I wanted I couldn't find from Turkey. I couldn't find from Europe. The PKK offered me answers about myself, about my ethnicity."

Dersim, 32, said she wanted to pick up a gun the day she joined the PKK at 17 but it was just before her 20th birthday that she was allowed into the guerrilla ranks.

Unlike Afreen of Syria, she did not have her family's blessing, she says, and her father, a Turkish civil servant, was tortured and left in a wheelchair. She said she has since fought in gunbattles.

The guerrillas vow not to marry or visit their families lest they put them in danger or be distracted from their struggle. Afsheen said he hasn't seen his parents since their village was destroyed 16 years ago. "I was the youngest of nine children, but maybe there are more now. I don't know."

Dersim says her presence encourages Kurdish women but also frightens the men.

"We go to a village and when we speak they are surprised and they ask us: 'Where do you get such power to do this? How can you speak like this and in front of men?'"

Iran Installs Equipment For Large-Scale Uranium Enrichment (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — International nuclear investigators have confirmed that Iran is beginning to install equipment in the large underground chamber in Natanz, the center where Iranian officials have said they will move to industrial-scale enrichment of uranium, according to foreign diplomats and American officials.

Iran said last year that it planned to install 3,000 centrifuges by this spring at Natanz, as a first step toward putting more than 50,000 of the devices in operation to produce nuclear fuel. But the program has been behind schedule, and based on reports from investigators from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the centrifuges are just now beginning to be assembled.

Nonetheless, the move signals a continued defiance of the Untied Nations Security Council, which demanded last summer that Iran suspend all uranium enrichment. At the White House on Friday, the spokesman for the National Security Council said, “This clearly demonstrates that Iran is not moving to meet the U.N.’s mandate.”

This weekend, ambassadors from several countries are invited by the Iranians to visit the plant at Isfahan, where Iran produces the uranium gas that is fed into centrifuges for enrichment. American officials dismissed the invitation as a diplomatic stunt, meant to create a false sense of openness about the program.

DOJ_NMG_0127875

"Instead of inviting I.A.E.A. ambassadors, Iran should invite I.A.E.A. inspectors," said Gregory L. Schulte, the American ambassador to the atomic agency. "Iran should give them access to all the documents, nuclear facilities and individuals that it has refused to provide access to in the last three years."

He added that a United Nations resolution requires Iran to suspend its nuclear activities. "Suspending them would build confidence," he said. "Showcasing them does not."

In Tehran, Iranian officials said on Friday that President Jacques Chirac of France was speculating when he first said this week that Iran would not pose a big danger if it had one or two nuclear weapons. Mr. Chirac, who later retracted his remarks, also said that if Iran were to launch a nuclear weapon against a country like Israel, it would lead to the immediate destruction of Tehran.

"This is more like a fantasy by Mr. Chirac because the International Atomic Energy Organization and its director have repeatedly said that Iran is not moving in that direction," said a Foreign Ministry spokesman, Mohammad Ali Hosseini, referring to the agency's declarations that it has developed no evidence that Iran is enriching uranium for bomb production. But the agency has also said that Iran never answered a series of questions about suspicious activities that could indicate work on a weapons project. "We have also said that the Islamic Republic of Iran has no plans to have nuclear weapons and that nuclear weapons are religiously banned," he added. "We really hope they talk realistically."

Mr. Hosseini said that Iran was surprised that European leaders had ignored comments by Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, recently that seemed to confirm that Israel possessed nuclear weapons. In a television interview, Mr. Olmert suggested that Iran was "aspiring to have nuclear weapons, as America, France, Israel, Russia."

The Israelis, clearly embarrassed by Mr. Olmert's statement, immediately said his remark was not intended as a confirmation or denial of whether his country possesses the weapons. But Iran has seized on it as evidence of a double standard, saying that European nations should be pressing the Israelis, not the Iranians.

If Iran is preparing to take its enrichment program to the next level, it may be rushing. It currently has a pilot program under way to determine if it can master the process. But so far that project is small and has run into numerous technical problems, according to foreign diplomats who have reviewed reports on its progress.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, had promised an announcement about Iran's latest advances during celebrations that began Thursday for the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution.

Diplomats in Vienna told The Associated Press that hundreds of technicians and laborers were "working feverishly" at the Natanz facility, near Tehran, over the past week. The news agency said that by Thursday, pipes, wiring, control panels and air-conditioning had been installed — setting the stage for hooking up the centrifuges that spin uranium into enriched levels.

The process can lead to making nuclear fuel for power plants, or for nuclear weapons if the uranium is enriched to higher levels. The United States and some European countries have accused Iran of having a clandestine weapons program, though Iran contends that its program is peaceful.

The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 banning the trade of goods and technology related to Iran's nuclear program. Mr. Ahmadinejad has repeatedly scoffed at the measure, but in recent weeks he has faced internal public criticism for fanning a confrontation with the West.

Diplomats: Iran Working On Uranium Plant (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

Technical crews have hauled centrifuges into Iran's vast underground Natanz complex and were on the threshold of launching a program that could be used to create nuclear arms, diplomats said Friday.

Hundreds of technicians have been "working feverishly" in recent weeks in the bunker-like hall beneath the desert near the central Iranian city of Natanz, said a diplomat accredited to the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear monitor.

By Thursday, they had installed and tested the pipes, wiring, control panels and air conditioning, setting the stage for hooking up the centrifuges that spin uranium into enriched levels.

Iran says it wants to develop enrichment to generate power, with Natanz as the centerpiece of a program first to link 3,000 centrifuges, and then ultimately to expand to 54,000. The United States and other countries fear Tehran will enrich to a higher level than needed for energy and use the material for the fissile core of nuclear warheads.

The recent activity in Natanz increases the tension between Tehran and the world's major powers over the Islamic republic's nuclear program, and will likely spur U.S. efforts to sharpen existing U.N. sanctions on Iran for its defiance of a Security Council demand that it freeze enrichment efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0127876

"This work is not necessary for a peaceful nuclear energy program, but is needed to give Iran's leaders the know-how to make highly enriched uranium for nuclear weapons," said Matt Boland, spokesman for the U.S. delegation to the IAEA.

A diplomat — one of four who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the information was confidential — said that with all the support equipment now installed, "everything is done except putting the machines in and hooking them up."

The centrifuges would be placed in "cascades" or series, allowing them to spin and re-spin uranium gas to a required level of enrichment — low for energy, high for the fissile core of nuclear warheads.

Another diplomat said that less critical preparatory work has been going on for weeks inside the Natanz facility — set underground below a barren desert mountain that is spiked with anti-aircraft batteries and radar to protect it from attack.

Even if Tehran successfully installs 3,000 centrifuges, experts estimate it would still take several years for all of them to be running smoothly.

The International Institute for Strategic Studies, a London-based think tank, on Wednesday estimated that Iran was two to three years away from having the capacity to build a nuclear weapon. The head of U.S. national intelligence, John Negroponte, has spoken of a four-year period.

Once enrichment begins, IAEA inspectors want to check to what level the uranium is being processed, and to ensure that none of the material produced is siphoned off. One of the diplomats familiar with the Iran nuclear dossier said the IAEA was negotiating with Iranian officials on details of what it would be allowed to see and control at the underground bunker.

In a further setback to IAEA monitoring attempts, a U.N. official familiar with Tehran's nuclear dossier said Thursday that Iranian officials had turned down a request from agency inspectors to install cameras in key areas of the underground facility.

In Tehran on Friday, a top Iranian nuclear official — who demanded anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media — disputed that assertion, saying U.N. inspectors had set up cameras in the underground facility. But another U.N. official said Iran had met only some — not all — of the IAEA requests.

Other nations — among them Brazil — also do not allow cameras in their enrichment halls. But unlike Iran, none is under direct scrutiny for possible attempts to make nuclear weapons.

Associated Press writer Ali Akbar Dareini contributed to this report from Tehran.

Chirac's Iran Gaffe Reveals A Strategy: Containment (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 2 — When President Jacques Chirac said this week that he would not be overly worried if Iran obtained a nuclear weapon, he inadvertently said aloud what some policy makers and arms control experts have been whispering: that the world may have to learn to live with a nuclear Iran.

Mr. Chirac quickly retracted his words, and Élysée Palace reaffirmed France's commitment to preventing Iran from becoming a nuclear-weapons state. But in veering from the prepared script and letting the veil of caution fall, he became the first Western leader to imply that containment of a nuclear Iran is preferable to other options, especially war.

"Jacques Chirac said things that many experts are saying around the world, even in the United States," Hubert Védrine, foreign minister from 1997 to 2002, said on LCI television on Friday. "That is to say, that a country that possesses the bomb does not use it and automatically enters the system of deterrence and doesn't take absurd risks."

The logic of the argument goes this way: Iran is making enriched uranium, which can be used either for making electricity or, with additional enrichment, nuclear weapons. If Iran masters that process for military purposes, it may be able to build a bomb or two in the next few years.

Under that thinking, the only realistic goal is to slow down the process as long as possible. But even if Iran has the bomb, it will be subject to the same classic doctrine of nuclear deterrence that restrained the nuclear powers during the cold war.

"There is a growing realization that the international community is failing to stop Iran from acquiring a uranium enrichment capability," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a senior fellow at the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. "The U.S. government wouldn't accept it, but it's becoming a fait accompli. Can the next step — a nuclear weapon — be prevented? Chirac skipped over that question and cut to the chase in saying, 'We can live with a nuclear-armed Iran.' "

The Bush administration has made stopping an Iranian bomb the object of an increasingly aggressive policy. But administration officials are concerned that the Iranians have learned from North Korea — which ignored Washington's warnings and detonated a nuclear device last year. Iran, they fear, is on the same path.

So the administration is pressing reluctant European governments to curtail support for exports to Iran and to block transactions and freeze the assets of some Iranian companies. In Iraq, the administration has pursued Iranian agents it believes to be involved in attacks against American and allied forces.

DOJ_NMG_0127877

Among the Europeans, there is an overwhelming consensus that the American-led war in Iraq has been a disaster and that Washington's Iran strategy could end in an even more destabilizing military confrontation.

It was Mr. Chirac who led Europe's opposition to the war in Iraq, and in an I-told-you-so speech last month he said that his predictions that the war would spread more chaos, regional instability and terrorism had come true.

In his remarks this week, he could have been speaking for most of Europe when he said that what he called "the Iraq affair" had "shifted red lines" and made the region dangerous.

Even inside the Bush administration, some officials have acknowledged over the past year that Iran eventually may get a nuclear weapon — or at least the technology and components to assemble one quickly. In the United States, the view that the world might have to coexist with a nuclear Iran was laid out in an ambitious study by two government-financed scholars at the National Defense University in 2005.

"Can the United States live with a nuclear-armed Iran?" the report asked. "Despite its rhetoric, it may have no choice." The report added that the costs of rolling back Iran's nuclear program "may be higher than the costs of deterring and containing a nuclear Iran."

In a sense, Mr. Chirac was trying to make just that point when he said in an interview with three publications, including The New York Times, that a bomb would do Iran little good because it would never be able to use it without facing swift retaliation.

Mr. Chirac also stressed his belief that Iran should not be completely humiliated and isolated, but encouraged to become a positive regional player. "How can we impose sufficiently strong constraints on Iran?" he asked in the Monday interview. Calling the Islamic Republic "a bit fragile," he said, "One has to know what Iran can withstand or not."

The following day, in retracting his statements about a nuclear Iran, he stressed the importance of having a "dialogue" with Iran, which he said had an important role to play in helping to stabilize the region.

In the past several years, Mr. Chirac has tried to navigate a middle course between the United States and Iran.

It was France, in the months after the invasion of Iraq in 2003, that conceived a diplomatic initiative joined by Britain and Germany in which Tehran would freeze its uranium enrichment activities in exchange for political, economic and technological incentives.

The European trio suspected that the United States was moving toward an open confrontation with Iran, much the way it did with Iraq.

But the initiative failed, even after the United States, Russia and China joined in. Sanctions, even in the unlikely eventuality that they can be tightened substantially, are not likely to be tough enough to change Iran's behavior.

Tehran insists that its nuclear program is for peaceful energy purposes. It views United Nations sanctions to punish it for enriching uranium as unjust and a violation of its rights as a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. It justifies its presence in Shiite-controlled Iraq as necessary to preserve its own national security interests and to protect itself should Iraq dissolve into chaos.

On Thursday, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, said that his nation was becoming a "superpower" and that the United Nations sanctions would not deter it from pursuing its nuclear program.

Indeed, the Iranians are well aware that possession of the bomb would immediately transform the country into the dominant power in the Middle East, give it even greater influence over Iraq and allow it to threaten and blackmail its enemies.

Republicans Plan To Block Iraq Debate (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, said Friday that his party would unite to block Senate debate next week on a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq unless the Democrats allowed votes on at least two Republican alternatives.

Mr. McConnell said even Senator John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is the chief author of the bipartisan proposal, and other Republicans backing his plan had agreed to prevent the resolution from reaching the floor Monday if Democrats did not agree to that demand.

"We're in a position to insist on a procedure for considering these matters that we think is fair to us," said Mr. McConnell, who has been negotiating the framework of the debate with Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader. "We can't dictate the outcome necessarily, but we're insistent upon a process that we are comfortable with."

Mr. Reid responded that the Republican leadership was essentially filibustering a debate of Iraq policy to avoid a judgment on Mr. Bush.

"This obstruction is an abdication of their responsibility to the American people on the most important issue facing our nation today," Mr. Reid said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0127878

Such back and forth is not unusual in the buildup to major debates in the Senate, where the minority party has significant power to influence the process.

Lawmakers and senior Senate officials said they believed that an agreement would ultimately be worked out, since Republicans do not want to risk being accused of shutting off criticism of Mr. Bush on such a major issue, while Democrats are eager to get Republicans on the record on the troop increase.

Mr. McConnell's threat also reflects the Republican leadership's strategy to force a Senate review of a series of competing resolutions, muddying the outcome with multiple votes, rather than allow the focus to be on a central proposal objecting to the troop buildup.

Mr. Warner on Wednesday night revised his plan — which already had some Republican backing — and gained some new support, leading Democrats to make his version the main one to be considered.

Senate Republicans have also been squeamish about Mr. Reid's decision to debate the Iraq policy in the form of legislation, which would be sent to the president if passed as such. They see such a move as overly confrontational, even though Mr. Reid has said the Senate will ultimately convert the proposal to a resolution to avoid having to send it to the White House.

Republicans say they want votes on at least two alternatives. One is a resolution made public Thursday by Senators John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Joseph I. Lieberman, the independent from Connecticut, among other lawmakers. Mr. McCain and Mr. Lieberman support the president's plan to increase troops.

Their resolution lays out 11 goals the Iraqi government should meet, including disarming militias and distributing Iraqi resources without regard to religious sect. It declares that Congress should ensure that American forces "have the resources they consider necessary to carry out their mission." The resolution does not say what the United States should do if the Iraqi government does not meet the goals.

A second likely alternative would be a Republican-backed resolution opposing any cutoff of money for added troops, a potentially tougher vote for some Democrats who want to retain that as a future option.

Warner To Help Block His Own Resolution On Iraq (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

Sen. John W. Warner will join his fellow Republicans in voting Monday to block the resolution he wrote rebuking President Bush's Iraq war policy.

"Senator Warner supports the Senate Republican leadership's effort to establish a free and open debate on Iraq on the Senate floor, including possible amendments," a spokesman for the Virginia Republican said yesterday afternoon.

Earlier in the day, Mr. Warner told colleagues during a closed-door strategy meeting at the Library of Congress that he opposes the manner in which Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, is conducting debate on his resolution, which condemns Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

Senate Republicans are opposed to a vote on the Warner resolution unless they also get votes on two other resolutions. One of those alternatives supports Mr. Bush's plan, and the other would prohibit cutting funds for the war. Republicans also want each resolution to require 60 votes to pass.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, told reporters yesterday that he expects to have all 49 Republicans in the chamber -- nine votes more than are needed for a filibuster -- to vote Monday to block the nonbinding resolution.

Mr. Reid said he has been acting in good faith to get a vote on the Warner resolution.

"The American people deserve better than a filibuster on the president's flawed plan," he said. "Senate Democrats will continue to negotiate with the Republican leadership to bring the plan to a vote."

Meanwhile, a National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) released yesterday raised new uncertainty about the prospect for withdrawing American troops from Iraq.

Iraqi leaders will be hard-pressed to craft a lasting political settlement or improve their security capabilities in the next 12 to 18 months, according to the collaborative assessment by 16 spy agencies.

The assessment states that growing and entrenched polarization between Shi'ite and Sunni Muslims, inadequate Iraqi security forces, weak leaders and the success of extremists' efforts to use violence to exacerbate the sectarian war all create a situation that will be difficult to improve.

"We think it is accurate," said Stephen J. Hadley, Mr. Bush's national security adviser. "We would emphasize the 'hard-pressed,' because we will be pressing them hard and the Iraqi people will be pressing the government hard."

The news comes as the next major political showdown looms on Capitol Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0127879

The Bush administration will ask for another $100 billion for military and diplomatic operations in Iraq and Afghanistan this year and seek $145 billion for 2008, a senior administration official said yesterday.

The requests Monday, which will accompany Mr. Bush's budget for the 2008 fiscal year that begins Oct. 1, would bring the total appropriations for 2007 to about $170 billion, with a decline the following year.

The additional request for the current year includes $93.4 billion for the Pentagon -- on top of $70 billion approved by Congress in September -- and is about $6 billion less than the Pentagon's request to the White House budget office.

U.S. Copter Crash In Iraq Kills 2 In Fourth Such Incident This Year (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 2 -- A U.S. military helicopter crashed Friday morning north of Baghdad, killing two soldiers on board, officials said. It was the fourth fatal helicopter crash in Iraq this year.

The helicopter went down at 7:20 a.m. near Taji, about 15 minutes north of the capital. The military said in a brief statement that the soldiers' remains "have been recovered and the site secured."

Military officials did not say what type of helicopter it was or how it crashed. But Iraqi police and an insurgent group that asserted responsibility for the crash identified the craft as an Apache and said it had been shot down by a shoulder-fired antiaircraft missile.

"We are saying to the enemies of God that the airspace of the Islamic state of Iraq is prohibited for you, just like its land," the Islamic State of Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group, said in a statement posted on its Web site. "God opened for the soldiers of the Islamic State of Iraq new ways to confront your aircrafts."

Before Friday's incident, 19 people had died in U.S. helicopter crashes in the past two weeks. A Black Hawk crashed north of Baghdad on Jan. 20, killing 12 soldiers on board. The following week, a civilian helicopter was downed in central Baghdad while assisting a U.S. Embassy convoy that had come under attack. Five security contractors employed by Blackwater USA were killed in that incident.

On Sunday, a military helicopter crashed while participating in an Iraqi-led raid on an insurgent camp in the southern province of Najaf, killing two soldiers. An Iraqi official involved in the raid said that helicopter had also been shot down.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, discussed the string of crashes Friday during a briefing at the Pentagon.

"Clearly, groundfire . . . has been more effective against our helicopters in the last couple of weeks," he said, according to a transcript of the briefing posted on the Department of Defense's Web site. "I've taken a hard look at that. Don't know whether or not this is just statistically what's going to happen over time when you're flying at that level and people are shooting at you, or if there are some kind of new tactics and techniques that we need to adjust to. And the folks on the ground are looking at that right now."

Also Friday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of six other service members.

A Marine and a sailor died Wednesday in Anbar province in western Iraq of wounds "sustained due to enemy action," the military said in a statement. Another Marine died Wednesday after apparently going into cardiac arrest, the military said.

A Task Force Lightning soldier was killed Thursday in a vehicle rollover accident, the military said in a statement. Two other American soldiers were killed Thursday in a car accident at Camp Liberty in Baghdad, it said in a separate statement.

The names of the soldiers will be released after their relatives have been notified, the military said.

Elsewhere, 13 people were killed Friday by mortar rounds that struck a village 20 miles south of Baghdad, according to a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry.

Mortar fire also killed five people and wounded 18 at the Musa al-Kadhim shrine in the Kadhimiyah district of northern Baghdad, the spokesman said.

In Suwayrah, in southern Iraq, Iraqi army officials killed 35 people and captured 23 suspected of belonging to a terrorist organization, the spokesman said.

2 Killed As U.S. Helicopter Is Shot Down Near Baghdad (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 2 — An American Apache attack helicopter was shot down on Friday just north of Baghdad and its two-member crew was killed, an American military official said.

It was the fourth American helicopter to be shot down or crash under fire in the last two weeks, a trend that American military commanders acknowledged was disturbing.

DOJ_NMG_0127880

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said that attacks by militants have "been more effective against our helicopters in the last couple of weeks."

Saying he has looked closely at the issue, General Pace said he did not know if the recent strikes were the result of a new strategy, improved skills or simply a natural result of the military's heavy dependence on helicopters in the fight here.

Traveling by road here has become increasingly fraught with danger as Shiite militia groups and Sunni insurgents continue to attack American vehicles with roadside bombs, more often using sophisticated devices that can penetrate even the best American armor.

The military would only say it was investigating the Friday crash, but witnesses indicated that the militants were clearly waiting to ambush passing helicopters.

A man who identified himself only as Abu Ahmed, who lives near the crash site, said gunmen were hiding near a manufacturing plant in Sheik Amir village, near the town of Taji, waiting for the helicopters. Taji is a central hub for helicopter traffic around Baghdad. Americans are currently training Iraqi pilots there and the Americans have expressed concern about enemies becoming more sophisticated in shooting at the helicopters.

On Friday, just after sunrise, two American Apache helicopters flew in low, and waiting militants successfully shot down one and hit the second, Mr. Ahmed said.

Before the military had confirmed the crash, a militant group was already taking responsibility and promising to post a video of the attack on the Internet.

The crash site was quickly secured and the two bodies recovered, said a military official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because an official report had not yet been released.

Just two weeks ago, an American Black Hawk helicopter was shot down north of Baghdad and all 12 service members on board were killed. Another American helicopter was shot down on Sunday during the battle in Najaf, south of Baghdad, killing two soldiers.

And five members of a private security detail protecting an American convoy in Baghdad were killed Jan. 23 when their helicopters came under attack and one crashed.

Separately, American forces engaged in a fierce battle overnight with militants in the restive western city of Ramadi.

American forces came under attack Thursday night as Sunni insurgents directed mortars at their main headquarters in the city, according to witnesses and the American military. When the Americans sent forces into two neighborhoods in response, they were ambushed, according to witnesses.

The city remains a hotbed of insurgent activity and militants and has been the scene of some of the fiercest street fighting in Iraq over the past four years.

The fiercest fighting in this clash occurred near the main cemetery, residents said. As the Americans approached the area, roadside bombs struck their vehicles and militants opened fired with machine guns.

The American military reported no casualties, but residents said civilians were caught in the middle of the battle.

Hajj Ebrahim al-Jumaili said that he was sitting in his home when the fight broke out and his wife, daughter and two sons all were lightly wounded. The fighting, he said, lasted until 7:30 a.m. Friday.

Dr. Abdullah Saleh, at the main Ramadi hospital, said 4 people were killed and another 12 wounded.

Also in Anbar Province, Ali Hussein, the Sunni chairman of the City Council and an outspoken critic of Al Qaeda, was gunned down in Falluja. He is the third Falluja City Council leader to be killed this year.

Meanwhile, tensions remained high in the Shiite holy city of Najaf.

On Sunday, Iraqi government forces, backed by American air support and ground troops, killed at least 250 militants who they said were part of a renegade militia called the Soldiers of Heaven, bent on overthrowing the clerical hierarchy in that city.

Authorities imposed a 24-hour curfew there on Friday, fearful that the militia could still be active in the area.

During Friday Prayers there, a religious leader, Sadr Adeen al-Qubanchi, said that that there were many different forces conspiring to challenge the authority of the clerical hierarchy in Najaf, the renegade militia only being the latest threat.

"This attempt was big and very dangerous," he said in the speech. "It was about to drown Najaf in blood."

While praising the Iraqi military's efforts in the battle, he said there were at least two other groups in Najaf that have the same ideology as the militia and possibly the same intentions.

"I call on the security forces to watch them clearly and to question them according to the law," he said.

Late Friday, Iraqi officials said they took into custody six people they suspected of having ties with the Soldiers of Heaven and seized a sizable cache of weapons.

2 U.S. Troops Killed In Latest Helicopter Crash In Iraq (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0127881

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

The craft is the fourth to go down recently. Iraqis say it was attacked.

BAGHDAD — A U.S. military helicopter crashed amid heavy gunfire Friday north of Baghdad, police and witnesses said — the fourth American chopper to go down in two weeks. The U.S. military said two crew members were killed.

The spate of attacks raised questions about whether insurgents were increasingly targeting aircraft, a crucial component of U.S. operations in Iraq. Not only do U.S. forces rely on helicopters in combat, but they are being used more often to ferry personnel and equipment across the country to avoid roadside bombs, the major killer of U.S. troops.

The recent attacks on helicopters have inflicted a heavy toll on Americans in Iraq — 16 military personnel and five civilians killed — at a time when roadside bombings are becoming less effective against U.S. vehicles, which are protected by improved armor plating, signal-jamming devices and other measures.

Six other U.S. military personnel in Iraq died in the previous two days, two in combat in Al Anbar province, one of an apparent heart attack and three in vehicle accidents, the U.S. command said. At least 3,093 U.S. personnel have been killed in the Iraq theater since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, according to the website icasualties.org.The U.S. military has lost 54 helicopters in Iraq since May 2003, about half of them to enemy fire, according to figures compiled by the Washington-based Brookings Institution.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged that insurgent ground fire in Iraq had been "more effective against our helicopters in the last couple of weeks."

But he said it was unclear whether "this is just statistically what's going to happen over time when you're flying at that level and people are shooting at you, or if there are some kind of new tactics and techniques that we need to adjust to."

"The folks on the ground are looking at that right now," Pace told journalists at a Pentagon briefing.

The U.S. command, in a brief statement, did not identify the latest helicopter felled or detail the circumstances of the crash.

Iraqi police and witnesses said the aircraft was shot down over farmland near Taji, a major U.S. air base about 10 miles north of Baghdad.

Hashim Assafi, a 37-year-old farmer, said he was irrigating his field when he saw a pair of helicopters fly by and heard a burst of gunfire, sending him ducking behind a well for cover. One helicopter was hit but continued flying, he said.

Peeping out from behind the well, he said, he watched the other helicopter circle back to where the gunfire had come from. There was another burst of fire, which he said hit the second craft in the tail.

"I saw smoke coming out of the tail," he said. "The chopper was swinging around before it hit the ground one kilometer away from me, and I heard a big explosion."

Other witnesses, who said the helicopters were escorting a convoy of military vehicles, described seeing a ball of fire as the stricken aircraft hit the ground.

U.S. troops sealed off the area and additional helicopters circled overhead, police and witnesses said.

A group linked to Al Qaeda claimed responsibility for the attack in a statement posted on a militant website.

"We say to the enemies of God that the sky of the Islamic state of Iraq is forbidden just like its land," the statement said, adding that the group had "new ways" to attack helicopters. It was not possible to verify the authenticity of the statement.

Military analysts said the recent cluster of attacks was worrying, but cautioned that it was too early to confirm a trend.

"The insurgents constantly improve and adapt their methods," said Anthony Cordesman, a former Defense Department official who is a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"There may well be a change in tactics to focus on helicopters because they are the principal method of transportation as well as an important attack element…. The problem is that we don't have enough of a pattern yet to be sure," he said.

Two other military helicopters and a civilian helicopter have been lost since Jan. 20. All were believed to have been shot down in combat or in areas where Sunni Muslim-led insurgents were active, though the causes of the crashes are still officially under investigation.

One of the military helicopters went down Sunday near Najaf during an offensive by American and Iraqi forces against a violent messianic cult said to be plotting attacks against Shiite Muslim clerics and religious sites. Two crew members were killed.

The other military chopper was a Black Hawk that crashed two weeks ago near Baqubah, killing all 12 U.S. personnel aboard, including three officers and two command sergeants. And five Western security contractors employed by North Carolina-based Blackwater USA were killed when two helicopters came under attack Jan. 23 in Baghdad and one of them crashed.

Sunni-led insurgents and Shiite militias are known to have shoulder-fired SA-7 antiaircraft missiles, rocket-propelled grenades and heavy machine guns in their arsenals.

The U.S. military has developed tactics to minimize the risk. Routes are varied. Helicopters fly low and fast to make it difficult for gunmen to get them in their sights, and they drop flares to divert heat-seeking surface-to-air missiles.

DOJ_NMG_0127882

Such countermeasures are reevaluated after every copter crash, said Col. Bryan Owens, commander of the 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 82nd Airborne Division, who was questioned about Friday's crash during a separate Pentagon briefing.

"It didn't happen in my area, but I fully expect that the lessons learned from the tragedy of helicopter crashes will be passed on to me so that we can take action in our area just to make sure that we are … not putting our soldiers at undue risk," said Owens, who spoke to journalists via teleconference from Tikrit, northwest of Baghdad.

In other violence, police recovered at least 15 bodies in Baghdad, apparent victims of sectarian death squads.

U.S. forces said they killed at least 18 suspected insurgents in two missile strikes during fierce clashes late Thursday and early Friday in Ramadi, a Sunni Arab insurgent stronghold in volatile Al Anbar, west of Baghdad. There were no immediate reports of U.S. military or Iraqi civilian casualties in the Ramadi clashes.

Also in Al Anbar, the municipal council chairman in Fallouja was killed in a drive-by shooting as he left his home to attend Friday afternoon prayers, authorities said.

South of Baghdad, three days of mourning were announced for the 73 people killed and 152 injured in twin bombings Thursday at a busy Shiite market in the heart of Hillah.

In Najaf, authorities imposed a daytime vehicle ban amid fears that surviving members of the Heaven's Army cult, the target of Sunday's U.S.-Iraqi offensive outside the city, were again planning attacks.

The city has been on edge since the weekend clash, when more than 200 cult members were killed and hundreds detained.

zavis@latimes.com

Times staff writers Julian E. Barnes and Saif Rasheed in Baghdad and special correspondents in Baqubah, Hillah, Najaf and Taji contributed to this report.

Groundfire Downs Another U.S. Copter; Kills 2 Troops (WT/AP)

By Kim Gamel

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A U.S. helicopter went down yesterday in Iraq in the fourth such incident in two weeks, killing two troops on board, and America's top general acknowledged that U.S. aircraft were increasingly in danger from groundfire.

Witnesses and local police said two helicopters were flying together when gunmen opened fire, sending one of the aircraft crashing to the ground, smoke trailing behind it, near Taji, an air base just north of Baghdad.

The military, acknowledging the loss of the Army helicopter in a statement, did not identity the type of aircraft nor say what caused it to go down.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said yesterday that clearly, "groundfire ... has been more effective against our helicopters in the last couple weeks." The comments marked the first time a military official has publicly acknowledged the recent crashes were caused by groundfire.

"I've taken a hard look at that, don't know whether or not this is statistically what's going to happen over time, when you're flying at that level and people are shooting at you, or if this is some kind of new tactics or techniques that we need to adjust to."

Three other helicopters -- two military and one civilian -- have been lost in Iraq since Jan. 20. All three were thought to have been shot down.

The U.S. military relies heavily on air transportation in Iraq to avoid roadside bombs and insurgent ambushes and the recent spate of losses has raised questions about whether Sunni insurgents and Shi'ite militias may have stepped up attacks on helicopters or may have received new supplies of shoulder-fired anti-aircraft weapons. Sunni insurgents are already known to have anti-aircraft weapons and heavy machine guns.

Since May 2003, the U.S. military has lost 54 helicopters in Iraq, about half of them to hostile fire, according to figures compiled by the Brookings Institution.

U.S. forces, meanwhile, said 18 insurgents were killed in fighting Thursday night and yesterday after insurgents opened fire on American troops from several positions in Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad, the military said. No civilian or U.S. casualties were reported, the military said.

Ramadi, the capital of the western province of Anbar, where Sunni insurgents remain well-entrenched, has seen some of the bloodiest street battles of the war.

Elsewhere in Anbar, gunmen assassinated the Sunni chairman of the Fallujah City Council, Abbas Ali Hussein, an outspoken critic of al Qaeda, the third council leader to be killed in a year.

The U.S. military said six troops were killed Thursday, two in fighting in Anbar province, one of an apparent heart attack and three in vehicle accidents.

DOJ_NMG_0127883

The deaths raise to at least 3,092 members of the U.S. military who have died in Iraq since the war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count. At least 2,480 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

Iraqi officials in Hillah, a Shi'ite city about 60 miles south of Baghdad, announced a three-day mourning period after Thursday's devastating suicide attack. Police spokesman Capt. Muthanna Khaled said at least 73 persons were killed and 163 wounded.

Another U.S. Helicopter Lost In Iraq (AP)

By Bassem Mroue, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

A U.S. Army helicopter crashed Friday in a hail of gunfire north of Baghdad, police and witnesses said — the fourth lost in Iraq in the last two weeks. The U.S. command said two crew members were killed, and the top U.S. general conceded that insurgent ground fire has become more effective.

An al-Qaida-affiliated group claimed responsibility and said its fighters had "new ways" to attack American planes.

A brief U.S. military statement gave no reason for the crash and did not identify the type of aircraft. A Pentagon official said it was an Apache attack helicopter, which carries two crew members.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information. Another Apache crashed Sunday during heavy fighting with a Shiite cult near Najaf, also killing two soldiers.

Iraqi police and witnesses said the latest crash occurred about 7:30 a.m. as two Apaches were flying along a well-established air route near Taji, a major U.S. base about 12 miles north of Baghdad.

One helicopter was struck by heavy machine gunfire but continued flying, the witnesses said. The other helicopter banked sharply and flew back toward the source of fire, apparently to attack the target.

But that helicopter was also struck by ground fire, exploded in a ball of fire and crashed, the witnesses said. The other helicopter flew away, they said. The witnesses spoke on condition of anonymity, fearing for their own safety.

The United States has lost more than 50 helicopters in Iraq since May 2003, about half of them to hostile fire.

However, the loss of four helicopters since Jan. 20 has raised new questions about whether Iraqi insurgents are using more sophisticated weapons or whether U.S. tactics need changing.

Three of the latest crashes involved Army helicopters — two Apaches and one Black Hawk. The fourth was an OH-6A observation helicopter operated by the Blackwater USA security firm. All were believed shot down, and 20 Americans, including four civilian, died in the crashes.

In Washington, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged that insurgent ground fire in Iraq "has been more effective against our helicopters in the last couple of weeks."

But Pace said it was unclear whether "this is some kind of new tactics or techniques that we need to adjust to."

The Islamic State of Iraq, an al-Qaida-linked group, claimed on Friday that it shot down the Apache near Taji in a statement posted on an extremist Web site.

"We tell the enemies of God that the airspace of the Islamic State in Iraq is prohibited to your aircraft just like its lands are," the statement said. "God has granted new ways for the soldiers of the State of Iraq to confront your aircraft."

Iraqi insurgents have used heavy machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades and shouldered-fired SA-7 anti-aircraft missiles throughout the Iraq conflict. U.S. officials believe Iran is supplying Shiite militias with new weapons including more powerful roadside bombs, Katysuha rockets and a newer class of rocket-propelled grenades.

Some of those weapons could have found their way into the hands of Sunni insurgents, who operate around Taji.

The U.S. military relies heavily on helicopters to avoid roadside bombs and insurgent ambushes. Any new threat to helicopters would be a serious challenge to the military as it gears up for a major crackdown against Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias in Baghdad.

Helicopters are always vulnerable to ground fire, said Stephen Trimble, Americas bureau chief for Jane's Defence Weekly. "A well-placed bullet can pretty much take down any helicopter," he said.

Protecting helicopters from attack is significantly more complicated than defending against roadside bombs, Trimble said.

"What you would do with a Humvee is up armor it," he said. But helicopters can't support a significant increase in weight. The U.S. military is looking into technology that tracks and fires at rocket-propelled grenades, he said, but its use on helicopters is a long way off.

Apaches carry multiple high-tech defenses, including long-range sensors, radar jammers and an infrared jammer for countering incoming missiles.

However, the Apaches, which were designed to fight the Soviet Union on the plains of central Europe, have proven vulnerable to intense ground fire.

DOJ_NMG_0127884

During the 2003 invasion of Iraq, more than 30 Apaches had to break off an attack after suffering heavy damage in fighting with the Iraqi Republican Guard. One helicopter crashed but the two crew members survived.

Elsewhere, the U.S. command said 18 insurgents were killed in fighting Thursday night and Friday after insurgents opened fire on the Americans from several positions in Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad. No civilian or U.S. casualties were reported, the military said.

Ramadi, the capital of the western province of Anbar where Sunni insurgents remain well-entrenched, has seen some of the bloodiest street battles of the war.

The U.S. forces returned fire with machine guns, tanks and finally a missile, which struck the intended target, killing at least 15 insurgents.

Insurgents renewed their attacks on Friday, prompting U.S. forces to fire another missile that killed at least three attackers.

Also in Anbar, gunmen assassinated the Sunni chairman of the Fallujah City Council, Abbas Ali Hussein, an outspoken critic of al-Qaida. He was the third council chairman assassinated in Fallujah this year as insurgents target Sunnis willing to cooperate with the U.S. and its Iraqi partners.

The U.S. military said six more troops died Thursday, two in fighting in Anbar province, one of an apparent heart attack and three in vehicle accidents.

The deaths raise to at least 3,092 the number of members of the U.S. military who have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count. At least 2,480 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

In Baghdad, police said they found the bullet-riddled bodies of 23 people throughout the capital — apparent victims of Shiite or Sunni death squads. Three more bodies were found in Kut, southeast of Baghdad, and two in Mosul.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki met Friday with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and the outgoing U.S. commander in Baghdad, Gen. George Casey, to discuss a planned major military operation against armed groups in Baghdad, state television said. It gave no further details.

Iraqi officials in Hillah, a Shiite city about 60 miles south of Baghdad, announced a three-day mourning period after a devastating suicide attack Thursday. Police spokesman Capt. Muthanna Khaled said at least 73 people were killed and 163 wounded.

Police and witnesses said two bombers strolled into the central Maktabat market about 6 p.m. when the area was packed with shoppers buying food for the evening meal.

Police said an officer, Ahmed Abed Majood, became suspicious and grabbed one of the bombers but he managed to detonate his explosives. His partner then blew himself up, too.

No group claimed responsibility, but many residents blamed Sunni insurgents. The Shiite city, located in a religiously mixed province, was the scene of one of Iraq's deadliest attacks — a February 2005 suicide car bombing that killed 125 people.

Iraqi Army Brigades Not At Full Strength (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — The army brigades promised by the Iraqi government to help secure Baghdad have begun to arrive in the city, but with only a little more than half of their manpower, representing at least a partial failure in a crucial first test of the Bush administration's new war plan.

Administration officials had identified the participation of Iraqi military units as an important measure of support from Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's government for the new U.S. strategy in Iraq. Previous efforts to secure Baghdad failed in part because the Iraqi government was never able to deliver the forces it promised.

In disclosing the shortfall, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the first of the three Iraqi brigades ordered to Baghdad had arrived, and the second was en route. Iraqi brigades are supposed to consist of 2,000 to 2,500 soldiers, smaller than American brigades.

"There's good news and bad news," Pace said. "The good news is that, contrary to what has happened in the past, the units that were designated to arrive in Baghdad have begun to arrive, on the schedule they were supposed to be there."

But Pace said the units had only about 55% to 60% of the soldiers assigned to them.

Under the rules of the Iraq Defense Ministry, soldiers are on duty 21 days and then get a week off to take their pay home. These rules mean that as much as a quarter of each unit can be absent with permission at any time.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said it was unclear whether the manpower estimates of the units arriving in Baghdad included soldiers who are on authorized leave.

DOJ_NMG_0127885

But asked whether the Iraqis were fulfilling their obligations, Pace said the units need to improve. "It needs to be stronger than that," he said.

Although "55% probably isn't good enough," Gates said, the strength of the Iraqi units could improve before they are sent into combat.

Last month, the day after Bush outlined his plan to increase the number of U.S. forces in Iraq, a senior military official said the Pentagon would be keeping a close watch on the movement of Iraqi forces to Baghdad.

"One of the very early things that we're going to monitor is the progress of the Iraqi government providing these additional security forces," the official said.

Pentagon officials said they also were interested in more than just numbers.

"We're watching them down to finite detail: which unit, why that unit, what's the training and readiness assessment of that unit, why was that unit picked, where's it coming from, how many guys got on the bus," the official said at the time. "We're going to watch this very carefully."

At a congressional hearing last month about the new plan, Gates emphasized the importance of the Iraqi troops. He told senators that the ability of the Iraqi government to move its army units to Baghdad would be a vital measure of its commitment.

Under questioning by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Gates had suggested that if Iraq failed to deliver its forces or to meet other benchmarks, the Defense Department would review the new plan.

"I think if at that time we conclude that, at a government level and on a broad level, they have not fulfilled their commitments, then I think we have to reevaluate our strategy," Gates said.

In subsequent public comments, Gates has made it clear that the U.S. has no intention of a wholesale change in approach until all 21,500 additional U.S. troops have arrived and the new commander, Army Gen. David H. Petraeus, has been given a chance to improve security. All the new U.S. troops are scheduled to arrive by May.

Although U.S. officials have made participation of Iraqi units an important benchmark, the Iraqi troops are not likely to be crucial to the early stages of the security plan.

Administration officials have sought to portray the new Baghdad security push as an Iraqi plan. But it was developed by Americans and was only reluctantly accepted by the Maliki government, according to officials who have described its formation. Iraqi forces are likely to have a more important role in the later phases than during the initial push into Baghdad neighborhoods to clear them of militias, insurgents and death squads.

In later phases, Americans plan to join with Iraqi military and police units to hold neighborhoods and prevent the return of violence.

Because the Iraqis will be most needed in the later phases, U.S. commanders believe they still have time to build up the Iraqi troop levels to full strength.

At a congressional hearing Thursday, Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the outgoing U.S. commander in Iraq, said that two of the Iraqi brigade headquarters units had arrived in Baghdad, as had four battalions, a subset of a brigade.

"We're working with them to increase the strength of the forces that they've got in Baghdad," Casey said. "But they are delivering so far on what they said they'd do."

Gates Says Not Enough Iraqi Troops Arriving In Baghdad (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

The Pentagon says the extra brigades Iraq promised to send into Baghdad are starting to show up -- without enough troops.The outgoing chief U-S commander in Iraq told lawmakers yesterday the new units have only 55 to 65 percent of their intended troop levels.Defense Secretary Robert Gates says that "probably isn't good enough," while pointing out the units may be at full strength by the time they're needed for a ramped-up Baghdad security crackdown.The U-S has said it expects Iraq to live up to its troop commitments but hasn't specified what consequences if there aren't enough troops. Gates says it partly depends on "how quickly they get back up to strength."

Troops Aim To Oust Taliban From Town (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi,

AP, February 3, 2007

Afghanistan's security forces supported by NATO-led troops will "very soon" launch an operation to clear the southern Afghan town overrun and controlled by Taliban militants, an Afghan official said Saturday.

Gen. Mohammad Zahir Azimi, the spokesman for the defense ministry, said that the Taliban were now in control of the town of Musa Qala in Helmand province, which the British troops left after a contentious peace agreement in October.

DOJ_NMG_0127886

Hundreds of Taliban militants overran Musa Qala on Thursday evening, destroying the government center and temporarily holding elders hostage, officials and residents said Friday.

The militants' assault, days after a Taliban commander was killed outside the town, raises doubts about the future of the peace deal, which has been criticized by some Western officials as a NATO retreat in hostile Taliban territory.

"We have a plan and we are going to launch that plan very soon," Azimi said. "All our operations are conducted jointly with the police and NATO," he said without elaborating further.

Squadron Leader Dave Marsh, a spokesman for the NATO-led troops in southern Afghanistan, said that the alliance troops stand ready to respond to any decision made by Afghan government.

Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said an "unknown number" of militants had entered Musa Qala. He said late Friday that no NATO-led forces were in the town.

British forces are based in Helmand province but left Musa Qala in October after a peace agreement was signed between elders and the Helmand governor. According to the deal, security was turned over to local leaders, while NATO forces were prevented from entering the town.

Some Western officials complained that the deal put the area, which had been a center for clashes between British troops and resurgent Taliban militants, outside of government and NATO control.

Asadullah Wafa, the governor of Helmand province, said the militants destroyed part of the compound housing the district's governor and police. "People have closed down the shops this morning and those living near the area have moved out of fear," he said Friday.

Mohammad Wali, a resident of Musa Qala who estimated that between 200 and 300 fighters were in town, said residents feared fighting between NATO and militants would resume. Raz Mohammad, another resident, said the Taliban had taken about 12 town elders hostage. Collins said there were indications the elders were now safe.

Late last month, NATO said an airstrike outside of Musa Qala destroyed a Taliban command post, killing a senior militant leader and a number of his deputies. NATO said the Jan. 25 airstrike "was outside the area of the agreement" and did not violate it.

However, Wafa said the Taliban told a gathering of elders last week that they considered the airstrike a violation, and it appeared the assault was in retaliation.

Violence in Afghanistan has risen sharply in the last year. Some 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence in 2006, according to a count by The Associated Press based on numbers from Afghan, NATO and U.S. officials.

American Gen. Dan McNeil on Sunday will replace British Gen. David Richards as the commander of more than 40,000 NATO-led troops in Afghanistan. Military officials have said privately that the change of command will mark a new approach in dealing with resurgent Taliban militants.

Afghan Town Is Overrun By Taliban (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall, Taimoor Shah

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 2 — Taliban militants overran the town of Musa Qala in southern Afghanistan just three months after NATO troops had withdrawn and handed over control to a tribal council, officials said Friday. The insurgents detained police officers and tribal elders, seized weapons and government equipment and bulldozed part of the district offices, according to residents.

Residents fled in fear that the Taliban's arrival would precipitate further fighting with NATO forces, according to one family. A spokesman for the Interior Ministry in Kabul, Zemarai Bashary, confirmed the attack, which took place on Thursday night, and said the Taliban had disarmed the police stationed there.

A provincial governor, Asadullah Wafa, told Agence France-Presse on Friday that the Taliban had left the town again and that the district offices were now empty. In a statement, NATO said that although the situation remained unclear, the town elders were safe in their homes. A NATO security force was monitoring the situation and ready to support the government and the elders of Musa Qala, it said.

The attack ended a British-brokered experiment aimed at bringing some control over remote regions and keeping Taliban insurgents at bay. Under the plan, British troops agreed to withdraw from the town, leaving a tribal council in charge with a locally recruited police force, and Taliban forces agreed to withdraw to nearby villages.

American officials in Afghanistan had opposed the agreement because it left the broader district of Musa Qala, a poppy-growing region of Helmand Province, open to the Taliban. But the British commander in Helmand at the time defended it as a way to release his men from a pointless and occasionally bloody siege of the town. Residents had welcomed the deal, brokered in October, because it brought a temporary peace to the badly damaged town. But some had warned at the time that it was handing a victory to the Taliban.

DOJ_NMG_0127887

A Taliban commander, Mullah Abdul Ghafoor, led the assault on the town Thursday in a rage, because his brother had been killed a few days before in a NATO airstrike, residents said. Leading a large group of armed men, he used a bulldozer to smash through the wall of the district office, said Abdul Razziq, a shopkeeper who said his family fled Musa Qala on Friday. Mullah Ghafoor ordered the elders to leave the compound, burned the government flag and hoisted the banner of the Taliban, Mr. Razziq said.

Taliban Militants Overrun Town After British Exit (WT/AP)

By Jason Straziuso

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Hundreds of Taliban militants overran a southern Afghan town that British troops left after a contentious peace agreement in October, destroying the government center and temporarily holding elders hostage, officials and residents said yesterday.

The assault, days after a Taliban commander was killed outside the town of Musa Qala, raises doubts about the future of the peace deal, which has been criticized by some Western officials as a NATO retreat in hostile Taliban territory.

Two residents of Musa Qala estimated that between 200 and 300 Taliban fighters had overtaken the town. They said the fighters took weapons from the police on Wednesday and destroyed the town's government center late Thursday.

Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said an "unknown number" of militants had entered Musa Qala. He said late yesterday that no NATO-led forces were in the town.

British forces are based in Helmand province but left Musa Qala in October after a peace agreement was signed between elders and the Helmand governor. According to the deal, security was turned over to local leaders, while NATO forces were prevented from entering the town.

Some Western officials complained that the deal put the area, which had been a center for clashes between British troops and resurgent Taliban militants, outside of government and NATO control.

Asadullah Wafa, the governor of Helmand province, said the militants destroyed part of the compound housing the district's governor and police. "People have closed down the shops this morning and those living near the area have moved out of fear," he said.

Mohammad Wali, a resident of Musa Qala who estimated that between 200 and 300 fighters were in town, said residents feared fighting between NATO and militants would resume. Raz Mohammad, another resident, said the Taliban had taken about 12 town elders hostage. Col. Collins said there were indications the elders were now safe.

Late last month, NATO said an air strike outside of Musa Qala destroyed a Taliban command post, killing a senior militant leader and a number of his deputies. NATO said the Jan. 25 air strike "was outside the area of the agreement" and did not violate it.

However, Mr. Wafa said the Taliban told a gathering of elders last week that they considered the air strike a violation, and it appeared the assault was in retaliation.

Violence in Afghanistan has risen sharply in the last year. About 4,000 people died in insurgency-related violence in 2006, according to a count by the Associated Press based on numbers from Afghan, NATO and U.S. officials.

Afghan District 'Under Taliban Control': Defence Ministry (AFP)

AFP, February 3, 2007

The southern Afghan district of Musa Qala was under the control of the Taliban, the Afghan defence ministry said as NATO-led forces said the situation was still unclear.

"It is under Taliban control since yesterday," ministry spokesman General Zahir Azimi told AFP of the remote, rural district in the southern province of Helmand.

Asked if that meant there were no police or administration structures in place, he said: "That's right."

The interior ministry told AFP Friday that the district centre -- the town of Musa Qala -- was "under serious threat and pressure from the enemy" after an attack late Thursday but was "not completely under control of the enemy."

The NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) refused to confirm or deny Saturday that the Taliban were in control.

An ISAF statement late Friday said there were reports that "an unknown number of Taliban have entered the Musa Qala district centre in Helmand province, that pressure has been placed on the elders and the Afghan national flag has been taken down."

DOJ_NMG_0127888

"The exact situation in the town is still unclear. Indications are that the town elders are currently safe in their residences," it said.

The British military, which has most of its 6,000 deployment to Afghanistan in Helmand, said it had no new information since a Ministry of Defence statement that the situation was unclear.

The statement also said it was "misleading to report that the Taliban have 'taken the town'."

British forces pulled out of the Musa Qala district centre four months ago on the request of the government, after tribal elders said they would keep the Taliban out.

The deal has been controversial, with fears that it would provide the Taliban with a sanctuary.

Pakistan Says Taliban Activity Is Hard To Stop (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

RAWALPINDI, Pakistan, Feb. 2 — Faced with mounting criticism that Pakistan is not doing enough to thwart incursions into Afghanistan by Pakistan-based Taliban militants, the president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said Friday that securing the porous border was not the sole responsibility of this country.

He also insisted that despite some lapses, Pakistan's security forces were fully behind him in an effort to root out the resurgent Taliban.

"Pakistan will not be allowed to be made a scapegoat," he said, adding that securing the border was also the responsibility of Afghanistan and American and NATO forces.

Pakistan and Afghanistan have traded accusations in recent months over who bears responsibility for enabling the Taliban to regain strength and mount attacks on NATO and allied troops in Afghanistan.

While General Musharraf acknowledged that the Taliban were getting support from within Pakistan, he denied accusations that his security agencies were abetting the insurgency. "This is so preposterous I do not even want to comment," he said. Maintaining that the Pakistani military is a professional force, General Musharraf said there was "no question of anyone abetting."

A correspondent for The New York Times, Carlotta Gall, recently reported that she had found anecdotal evidence in and around Quetta to support charges by Western diplomats and Pakistani opposition figures that the Pakistani intelligence agencies were encouraging the Taliban insurgency in Afghanistan.

General Musharraf said fighters had been able to slip over the border in part because Pakistan's border guards were poorly armed and were up against "well-trained, well-armed and well-motivated people." He said he would arm the guards better and provide them with security.

The president also denied allegations that some Taliban leaders were taking refuge in Pakistan. Last month the Afghan Intelligence Service announced that it had detained a Taliban spokesman who said the Taliban leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, was in Pakistan. General Musharraf said he was "500 percent sure" that Mullah Omar was in Afghanistan. He said Mullah Dadullah, a top Taliban commander, and other top leaders were also in Afghanistan.

The president did say Mullah Dadullah had escaped arrest three times in Pakistan, though he did not mention when.

General Musharraf also defended the peace deal reached late last year with tribal militants in North Waziristan, a semiautonomous tribal area straddling the border with Afghanistan, calling it "a partial success."

Diplomats and intelligence officials from several countries have said Islamic militants are using the peace deal to consolidate their hold in northern Pakistan and are openly flouting the terms of the accord, in which they agreed to end cross-border help for the Taliban. But the president said that his government was trying to wean the local population away from the militants and that using military force was not the answer.

General Musharraf provided details of plans to fence the porous and craggy Pakistani-Afghan border — a solution to curb cross-border movement that Pakistan has advocated but Afghanistan has rejected.

He said Pakistan would selectively fence 22 miles of the border in North-Western Frontier Province and would later erect a 155-mile fence in Baluchistan Province. He said plans to mine the border had been suspended, "due to sensitivities of the international community."

Pakistan To Fence Border Of Afghanistan (AP)

By Matthew Pennington,

AP, February 3, 2007

President Gen. Pervez Musharraf acknowledged Friday that outgunned Pakistani frontier guards have allowed insurgents to cross into Afghanistan but denied the army or intelligence service was actively helping the Taliban.

DOJ_NMG_0127889

Musharraf said the army would soon fence parts of the porous border to stop militant infiltration, despite Afghan opposition. Many observers have been skeptical that the plan will prevent many militants from crossing, especially because the proposed fencing would cover only a tiny portion of the rugged frontier.

Musharraf said Pakistan was being made a scapegoat for the bloodiest surge in violence in Afghanistan since the fundamentalist Taliban regime was ousted five years ago for hosting al-Qaida.

"A misperception is being created that the resurgence of Taliban is from Pakistan. This is absolutely wrong. The resurgence of the Taliban is in Afghanistan, but some support goes from Pakistan," Musharraf said at his army office in Rawalpindi.

His defense of Pakistan's efforts to fight terrorism — and his admission of lapses — follow criticism from U.S. military officials who say cross-border attacks into Afghanistan have risen threefold since Pakistan signed a September peace deal with pro-Taliban militants in its North Waziristan region.

Musharraf said there had been "some incidents" of security forces at isolated border posts "turning a blind eye." He cited an example of two guards, located 500 yards from their section base, being outnumbered by around 20 highly trained and motivated al-Qaida militants.

But he denied any official collusion with militants, saying the powerful Inter-Services Intelligence was staffed by army officers who obey the chain of command.

"There is no question of anyone abetting," Musharraf said.

Anthony Cordesman, an analyst at the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the situation at the border could reflect divisions within Pakistan's security services.

But while individual Pakistani soldiers may be helping Taliban fighters, "it doesn't in any sense mean there is any coherent Pakistani military involvement," Cordesman said.

The role of the shadowy ISI — which helped create the Taliban in the 1990s to project Pakistan's influence over its western neighbor — has been the subject of growing international debate.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai has directly accused it of fomenting the insurgency and claims the agency is harboring Taliban leader Mullah Omar in the Pakistani city of Quetta.

Musharraf said Omar has not been in Pakistan since studying there as a teenager, although he revealed that other Taliban leaders come and go.

He said a top militant commander, Mullah Dadullah, had been inside Pakistan three times but evaded capture. He called it "a combined failure" of Pakistan and anti-terror allies who shared the intelligence.

But in December, Pakistan helped foreign forces "eliminate" Mullah Akhtar Mohammad Osmani — a top Omar lieutenant — in southern Afghanistan, just across the border from Pakistan, Musharraf said.

"You could not have done this unless ISI cooperated," he said.

He accused Afghanistan of failing to police its own border, saying Pakistan had about 1,000 posts along the 1,510-mile frontier, while on the Afghan side there were less than 100.

He announced Pakistan had begun preparations to fence seven or eight locations — a total of 22 miles — along its northwest border. They would not use land mines because of concerns from the international community, Musharraf said.

However, he said plans for a second phase foresaw using both fencing and mines to secure 150 miles of the border further south in Baluchistan province.

"No one has the right to criticize unless they come up with an alternative solution," Musharraf said.

Arsallah Jamal, governor of Afghanistan's eastern Khost province, which borders Pakistan, said the decision would just divide people and not stop terrorism.

Afghan federal government officials could not be reached for comment.

The United States, meanwhile, gave eight Cobra attack helicopters to Pakistan on Friday to help it combat Taliban and al-Qaida militants in the border regions. The U.S. Embassy said another 12 Cobras were to be delivered later in a military aid package worth $50 million.

____

Associated Press writer Jason Straziuso in Kabul, Afghanistan, contributed to this report.

DOJ:

Challenge To U.S. Attorney Appointment Should Be Dismissed, Filing Says (ADG)

By Linda Satter

Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, February 3, 2007

A filing last week challenging the constitutionality of the December appointment of Tim Griffin to be U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas is off base and should be dismissed, Griffin's office said Friday in a written response.

The challenge and the response were filed in the case of Antoine Demetrius Baker of Little Rock, who is charged with capital murder and may face the death penalty if Griffin's office seeks and obtains permission to present that option to jurors in the event of a conviction.

Baker is accused of engineering the December 2002 shooting death of Jerry Otis, 21, who was scheduled to testify against Baker in an aggravated robbery and theft case stemming from an August 2002 altercation in which Otis was hit in the face with a pistol and robbed of $ 250.

On Jan. 23, Baker's newly appointed attorney, John Wesley Hall of Little Rock, filed a motion to declare Griffin's Dec. 20, 2006, interim appointment by U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales unconstitutional. Hall said an illegal appointment would prevent Griffin's office from legally carrying out its plan to add allegations to an existing indictment to justify seeking the death penalty against Baker.

Hall said the interim appointment violates Article II, Section 2, of the U. S. Constitution, which covers presidential appointments, as well as a section of the U. S. Code that was altered last year as part of Congress ' reauthorization of the USAPATRIOT Act.

Assistant U. S. Attorney Patrick Harris, the lead prosecutor in Baker's case, said in an 18-page response that Hall's interpretation of the sections and his corresponding arguments "lack merit," and that Griffin's appointment "was plainly lawful" and "also entirely constitutional."

Griffin's appointment immediately followed the resignation of Bud Cummins, who says the Department of Justice asked him to resign after five years on the job to give someone else a chance at the plum political appointment.

Griffin is a lawyer who had worked as an assistant under Cummins for several months and previously was a military prosecutor, a legislative attorney and an attorney in private practice, as well as a special assistant to President Bush who worked under Bush's political adviser, Karl Rove.

The ouster of Cummins, a popular and well-respected U. S. attorney on both sides of the political aisle, along with the forced resignations of a handful of other U. S. attorneys across the country, prompted an outcry from those who say the Bush administration is trying to circumvent the normal process of selecting top federal prosecutors. The situation also has prompted proposed legislation to reinstate language in the USAPATRIOT Act to limit attorney general appointments to 120 days.

Harris reiterated what the Justice Department has said — that it intends to formally nominate Griffin and submit his nomination for Senate approval, in line with the standard procedure for installing new U. S. attorneys.

Harris also argued, in part, "Because United States Attorneys are 'inferior officers,' the Appointments Clause of the Constitution expressly permits Congress to vest their appointment in the Attorney General, and does not require the advice and consent of the Senate before they may be appointed."

He also noted, "It is wellestablished that a court cannot dismiss an indictment issued under a United States Attorney whose appointment was allegedly infirm."

The matter is pending before U. S. District Judge G. Thomas Eisele.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Siemens Faces Scrutiny In U.S. (WSJ)

By Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

German industrial giant Siemens AG, already weighed down by a cross-border corruption probe, faces heightened scrutiny after it disclosed that U.S. authorities also are investigating the matter.

Siemens said the Department of Justice is investigating "possible criminal violations of U.S. law by Siemens." It also said it understands that the enforcement division of the Securities and Exchange Commission is conducting an "informal inquiry" into the allegations of wrongdoing.

The Munich-based conglomerate said in December that it had uncovered €420 million, or about $545 million, in suspicious transactions stretching back more than seven years. That disclosure came after more than 200 German police raided offices and homes of Siemens employees in mid-November, arresting several people linked to the company's telecommunications-equipment business.

DOJ_NMG_0127891

German prosecutors are working with investigators in neighboring countries and said they suspect Siemens officials diverted funds through sham consulting contracts into slush funds to bribe customers abroad. Authorities released half a dozen people -- including a former Siemens management-board member and a former chief financial officer of the telecom unit -- before Christmas after they agreed to cooperate.

Siemens says that it is cooperating fully with investigators and that it has "zero tolerance" for illegal behavior. It says any alleged wrongdoing was confined to "individual acts" by certain managers but acknowledged in December that it had identified "a material weakness" in its financial controls.

Some of the top suspects who have been interrogated by German prosecutors allege that top management was aware of bribes and other illegal payments. Prosecutors are investigating the allegations to determine how high up the corporate ladder the alleged corruption traveled.

The German company disclosed the DOJ investigation and the SEC's informal inquiry on Thursday as part of a regulatory filing with the SEC detailing its financial results for its first quarter ended Dec. 31, 2006. A Siemens spokesman said Friday that the company had learned of the DOJ investigation the previous week. He declined to provide more details.

The DOJ and SEC declined to comment.

The disclosure of a U.S. investigation doesn't come as a surprise. Shares of Siemens are listed on the New York Stock Exchange, and the company warned in a December regulatory filing with the SEC that both the SEC and the DOJ might launch investigations of their own. Still, a Washington-based investigation heightens the legal risks for Siemens, which could face lawsuits and be banned from bidding for infrastructure contracts in the U.S. and other countries if there is evidence of wrongdoing.

Siemens's shares were down 84 European cents at €84.30 in Frankfurt. Siemens's share price has risen in recent months despite the criminal probe. Most investors have been focusing on rising profit as management restructures far-flung holdings to narrow the company's focus and jettison underperforming businesses -- including the telecom unit, formerly Siemens's largest.

Siemens says it also is taking aggressive steps to improve its compliance procedures.

Write to Mike Esterl at mike.esterl@dowjones.com1

Sumner Redstone Settles Suit With Son Over Family's Fortune (WSJ)

By Matthew Karnitschnig

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

Hollywood mogul Sumner Redstone, the chairman of both CBS Corp. and Viacom Inc., settled a lawsuit with his estranged son over the family's vast fortune, ending a potentially messy confrontation that threatened to complicate his succession plans.

The terms of the agreement, filed in a court in Maryland where the family business, National Amusements Inc., is incorporated, weren't disclosed. But people close to the matter said the family company repurchased the one-sixth stake held by the son, Brent Redstone.

The sale also consolidates the elder Mr. Redstone's control over the family business. Before the settlement, Sumner Redstone owned two-thirds of National Amusements stock, while his son and daughter, Shari Redstone, shared equal ownership of the other third. Sumner Redstone now owns 80% of National Amusements and his daughter the remaining 20%. It was unclear how much National Amusements paid for the stake. The lawsuit valued the company, which holds a controlling stake in Viacom, CBS and a large cinema chain, at $8 billion.

A spokesman for Sumner Redstone confirmed that a settlement had been reached but said the two sides had agreed to keep the details confidential. A lawyer for Brent Redstone said his client had no comment.

Brent Redstone's suit, in which he alleged that his father led a campaign to "freeze out" his son from the family business, offered a rare glimpse into the difficult personal relationships of one of Hollywood's most powerful men. Sumner Redstone expressed shock at the suit and said it had both pained and angered him.

In his lawsuit, filed last year in the Circuit Court of Maryland for Baltimore, Brent Redstone, 56 years old, sought the dissolution of National Amusements. Brent, a former Boston prosecutor who now lives on a ranch in Colorado, claimed in the suit that he was barred from gaining access to his one-sixth stake and was allowed only to sell it back to his family.

It is unclear what role Shari will play when her father dies. But Sumner Redstone has said he would like his daughter to play a larger role in the company's affairs. She is president of National Amusements and runs the business's movie-theater chain.

Sumner Redstone faces another lawsuit, this one brought by his nephew, Michael, who claims he and other family members were bilked out of their inheritance. National Amusements says the allegations are "baseless."

Write to Matthew Karnitschnig at matthew.karnitschnig@wsj.com1

DOJ_NMG_0127892

CRIMINAL LAW:

Federal Prosecutors Widen Pursuit Of Death Penalty As States Ease Off (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey, Gary Fields

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

At a time when many states are backing away from capital punishment, the federal government is aggressively pursuing -- and winning -- more death sentences, including in jurisdictions that traditionally oppose them.

On Tuesday, federal prosecutors in New York persuaded a jury to give a death sentence to Ronell Wilson, a 24-year-old man convicted of killing two undercover detectives by shooting each in the back of the head. The decision -- the first time in more than 50 years that a federal jury in New York agreed to sentence someone to death -- marked something of a milestone for the Justice Department in its continuing effort to apply the death penalty more evenly across the country.

Today, there are 47 people on federal death row -- more than double the number six years ago -- and Mr. Wilson this week became the seventh sentenced in a state without a death statute of its own since the federal death penalty was reinstated in 1988. The ranks may grow in the months ahead, with several capital cases on tap in locales traditionally opposed to the death penalty.

The last federal execution was in 2003, when Louis Jones Jr. died by lethal injection at an Indiana facility where all federal executions now take place.

"I get the sense that it's really beginning to change a lot. There seems to be a renewed emphasis on this," said Jensen Barber, an attorney defending Larry Gooch, a man facing federal drug-related murder charges and a potential death sentence in Washington, D.C.

The growth in federal capital cases, many observers say, results from a heightened effort by the Justice Department to centralize the process for deciding whether prosecutors should push for capital punishment.

Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin says the government is making an effort to pursue capital punishment uniformly across the country. "We have in place a clearly defined review process to ensure the death penalty is applied in a consistent and fair manner nationwide," he said.

Congress in 1986 began expanding federal jurisdiction to crimes that traditionally had been prosecuted by states -- imposing mandatory minimum sentences in crack cocaine cases, for example -- and two years later expanded federal reach into capital cases. Still, it took 14 years before federal prosecutors under then-Attorney General John Ashcroft managed to obtain capital convictions in jurisdictions that didn't have the death penalty at the local level.

In many cases, the Justice Department has asserted jurisdiction even though local prosecutors were prepared to handle the cases. In Puerto Rico, for example, federal prosecutors have unsuccessfully sought death sentences for four defendants since 2003 although Puerto Rico's constitution explicitly states that "The death penalty shall not exist."

Puerto Rico's Secretary of Justice at the time, Anabelle Rodriguez, said her department's only recourse was to try to negotiate with the federal government to make it "respect local idiosyncrasy" so a death sentence wouldn't be enforced.

The rising count on federal death row comes as many states reconsider the death penalty or issue moratoriums on the punishment for a variety of reasons, including sloppy executions and exonerations of condemned inmates because of DNA evidence.

Since the 1988 reinstatement of the federal death penalty, prosecutors have attempted to bring capital cases in federal courts across the country. Typically, this has proved much easier in states such as Texas, which have death penalties of their own, than in states such as Iowa, which don't. In 2000, there were 18 inmates on federal death row, but none were from a state that disallows capital punishment.

Things began to change in 2002, when federal prosecutors secured a death sentence in Michigan, a state without a death penalty. A year later, Mr. Ashcroft ordered U.S. attorneys in New York and Connecticut to seek death penalties against 12 defendants even though prosecutors handling the cases had recommended against doing so or decided not to pursue capital charges. At the time, the Justice Department said there shouldn't be "one standard in Georgia and another in Vermont."

"There's all this talk about how death row is declining, but that's not true for the federal system," said Ruth Friedman, director of the Federal Capital Habeas Project, a federally funded program that assists lawyers in the post-conviction stage of capital cases.

Indeed, the rising count on federal death row in recent years has occurred while the number of inmates on state death rows has been falling. After a long rise, the number of people on state death rows has fallen to 3,344 last year from 3,593 in 2000, according to the Death Penalty Information Center, an organization that tracks capital cases.

DOJ_NMG_0127893

Eric Holder, a former U.S. attorney in Washington who was deputy attorney general during the Clinton administration, said that in the 1990s, he and then-Attorney General Janet Reno weren't as likely to override a local federal prosecutor who didn't think a crime warranted capital punishment.

Overriding local federal prosecutors "was relatively rare during the Clinton years," Mr. Holder said. "Having both been local prosecutors, we really deferred to our U.S. attorneys' understanding that they knew their local situations."

The Justice Department declined to comment on this point.

Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center, said concerns that federal capital cases were being clustered in pro-death penalty states led the Justice Department under Mr. Ashcroft to intensify its push for death sentences in states that traditionally oppose the punishment.

This process is often difficult. In two recent cases in Washington, D.C, federal judges ruled out the possibility of death penalties. In New York, juries have opted for life sentences instead of executions in more than a dozen federal cases.

Mr. Gooch, the defendant in the drug-related murder case, was initially charged with two murders and slated for trial under D.C. law, which prohibits capital punishment. Later, the U.S. attorneys charged him with two additional killings connected with a drug ring -- making it a federal case and bringing the death penalty into play.

Mr. Barber, his lawyer, unsuccessfully challenged the move, citing a 1992 referendum undertaken at the behest of Congress in which D.C. voters overwhelmingly banned the use of capital punishment. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting congressional delegate, has written a letter to the U.S. attorney for D.C., objecting to the "new and troubling pattern" of federal capital cases in the district.

Stay Of Executions (LAT)

By Andrew Cohen

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

LURKING LARGELY beneath the radar the last few weeks, while media coverage has focused on the perjury and obstruction-of-justice trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby and the Bush administration's flip-flop on domestic surveillance, were a series of important legal and political developments in the increasingly muddled world of capital punishment in the United States.

Nearly 13 years after U.S. Supreme Court Justice Harry Blackmun famously promised that he would no "longer tinker with the machinery of death," judges and politicians are tinkering — and doing so in ever emboldened ways. From Jan. 19 through Jan. 26, reports the Death Penalty Information Center, eight executions were stayed in North Carolina, Ohio and Texas — with four more postponed Thursday in Tennessee.

In North Carolina, a state judge blocked three executions after death row inmates challenged the state's lethal injection procedures. In Ohio, three more executions were stayed pending more thorough clemency reviews. Two Texas capital cases were halted, one by a state judge and one by the U.S. Supreme Court.

And in California, a federal trial judge in December declared unconstitutional the state's method of lethal injection. Even the conservative U.S. Supreme Court, which in large measure has the final say on whether and to what extent capital punishment may be used, has begun to pay more attention to death penalty procedures. The justices in January heard three capital cases out of Texas and agreed to hear another out of Washington state before the end of the term.

But it's not just the judiciary that gummed up the machinery of death last month. In Maryland, legislators proposed a measure that would ban capital punishment in the state, a bill Gov. Martin O'Malley said he would sign into law. In the Ohio cases, Gov. Ted Strickland, new to his post, declared that he has "serious questions" about capital punishment, and a former corrections director who oversaw executions in the Buckeye State said he favors the end of capital punishment. In New Jersey, a state commission recommended the abolition of the death penalty in that state too. And it was Tennessee Gov. Phil Bredesen on Thursday who declared a 90-day moratorium on executions, halting the four in that state.

None of this means the end of capital punishment is near. A majority of Americans still support capital punishment in one form or another (and there are still states, mostly in the South and the West, where juries are still handing down death sentences for murder). But there is a clear, marked trend toward limiting the circumstances in which capital punishment is applied and the manner in which executions are performed. As the Death Penalty Information Center notes, "The number of death sentences per year has dropped dramatically since 1999."

In some cases, the architects of this national change are loyal to capital punishment and only want to protect it from substantive challenge by firming up the fairness in its procedures (which, trust me, needing firming up). These folks argue — and with good reason if Supreme Court precedent is any guide — that if more isn't done to ensure that death sentences are fairly meted out, they will one day be halted. In other cases, it is the opponents of capital punishment who have been able to muster support for their cause by using compelling statistics that show the failure of the death penalty as a deterrent.

DOJ_NMG_0127894

In part, the refined attitudes about the death penalty also have come about because of advances in technology. New DNA testing and, just as important, a newfound willingness by judges and prosecutors to revisit old capital cases have led to many well-publicized exonerations of death row inmates, each one cutting into the core of confidence that people have about the reliability and accuracy of capital punishment. Since 1973, reports the Death Penalty Information Center, at least 120 people on death row have been exonerated for one reason or another.

Where is capital punishment likely to be at the end of this mini-upheaval? I have no idea. But I am willing to offer an educated guess: The death penalty will exist in fewer states than it does now. And in those states where it still exists, capital procedures, from jury selection through lethal injection, will be subject to a much more rigorous judicial review. Politicians may be more willing to ensure that capital defendants get decent representation at trial, and when they do not, judges may be more willing to toss tainted convictions. And DNA, the latest "great equalizer," will loom in the background of every capital case that does not otherwise involve irrefutable evidence.

After a generation of often reckless expansion of the death penalty, the pendulum is starting to swing back. The change didn't start in January 2007. But it sure looks like it is picking up the pace.

Andrew Cohen is CBS News' chief legal analyst.

Federal Jury Finds Former Secretary Guilty In Theft Of Coca-Cola Secrets (FINDLAW/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

(AP) - ATLANTA-A federal jury convicted a former Coca-Cola secretary Friday of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the world's largest beverage maker in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi.

Joya Williams faces up to 10 years in prison. No sentencing date was immediately set.

The jury of seven women and five men deliberated for 11 1/2 hours over three days. On Thursday, jurors told U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester they were "hung" and could not decide. Forrester told the jury to try again Friday.

Williams showed no visible reaction when the verdict was announced. She remains free on bond, pending sentencing.

Williams was fired as a secretary to Coca-Cola's global brand director at the company's Atlanta headquarters after the allegations came to light.

The government says Williams stole confidential documents and samples of products that hadn't been launched from The Coca-Cola Co. and gave them to Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney as part of a conspiracy to sell the items to Purchase, New York-based PepsiCo Inc. for at least $1.5 million (â,¬1.15 million).

Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing. Duhaney testified previously that Williams spearheaded the scheme. Dimson did not testify.

The government said Williams was deeply in debt, unhappy in her job and seeking a big payday, so she embarked on the scheme to steal trade secrets.

Defense lawyer Janice Singer urged jurors to use their common sense, and she argued that prosecutors did not prove their case beyond a reasonable doubt.

Singer suggested that Dimson and Duhaney stole the documents and product samples from Williams without her knowledge and conspired to sell them to Pepsi behind her back. Williams testified earlier this week she left a key under her doormat for one of the co-defendants, perhaps explaining how they could have gotten into her home.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said during his closing argument Wednesday that the key under the mat claim was one of many lies told by Williams.

During two days on the stand, Williams testified that she did not steal anything from Coke, but rather took documents and product samples home to protect herself in case her boss questioned whether she was doing her job.

She also claimed that $4,000 (â,¬3,072) in cash she deposited into her bank account in June 2006, just days after Dimson was given $30,000 (â,¬23,041) in cash from an undercover FBI agent in exchange for Coke materials, came from a friend, not from Dimson.

But the friend, Clifton Carroll, testified Tuesday that Williams was lying; he said the most money he ever loaned her was $400 (â,¬307), and that was after her July 5 arrest.

Williams' credibility was an issue for the jury to weigh during its deliberations.

After the verdict was announced, Singer said her client had been "prepared for the worst. She was ready for whatever the jury did."

"She's holding her own," Singer added. "She seems pretty strong right now."

Pak, the prosecutor, said, "We're happy with the verdict. It was the right verdict based on the evidence in the case."

DOJ_NMG_0127895

He said it is too early to tell what sentence the government will recommend. He noted that under federal guidelines, the fact that Williams testified and denied involvement could weigh against her at sentencing.

--

Associated Press Writer Giovanna Dell'Orto contributed to this story.

Coke Worker Guilty Of Stealing Secrets (FT)

By Andrew Ward In Atlanta

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

A former Coca-Cola secretary was on Friday found guilty of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the soft drink company with the aim of selling them to PepsiCo for more than $1.5m.

Joya Williams could face up to 10 years in prison for the crime, which was foiled after PepsiCo received a letter offering "very detailed and confidential information" about its fierce rival.

PepsiCo informed Coke about the plot and the FBI was brought in to investigate, with the help of an undercover agent posing as a go-between for PepsiCo.

Two co-conspirators – Edmund Duhaney and Ibrahim Dimson – pleaded guilty in October but Ms Williams contested the charges.

Jurors had been deadlocked over the verdict, but on thursday the judge told them to keep trying to reach a decision.

The trial was in Atlanta, where Ms Williams worked as an administrative assistant to Javier Sanchez Lamelas, a senior Coke marketing officer.

Prosecutors played surveillance video taken inside Coke's headquarters showing the 41-year-old stuffing documents into her bag and handling bottles of prototype beverages, sometimes late in the evening.

Jurors heard that the stolen materials included details of a new Coke product code-named Project Lancelot.

The 120-year-old recipe of Coke's trademark cola – the so-called "secret formula" -- was not involved.

Prosecutors explained how Ms Williams passed the stolen materials to her co-conspirators, both ex-convicts, who told PepsiCo they planned to sell to the highest bidder.

"Just think," PepsiCo was urged in a letter. "Instead of having to second-guess what your number one competitor is doing, you will know exactly what products and marketing campaigns they are going to set in motion."

The undercover FBI agent agreed to buy the clandestine information on behalf of PepsiCo and made several payments to Mr Dimson worth a combined $45,000, including a cookie tin full of cash handed over at Atlanta airport.

Mr Dimson wanted a further $1.5m for the most valuable items.

Ex-Duracell Worker Stole Trade Secrets (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., Feb. 2 (AP) — A former Duracell employee pleaded guilty Friday in Federal District Court to stealing trade secrets from the company, the authorities said.

Prosecutors said the former employee, Edward R. Grande, 48, a cell development technologist from Seymour, Conn., copied and downloaded computer research last year about Duracell's AA batteries.

Mr. Grande then sent the information to two Duracell competitors, prosecutors said. Neither of Duracell's competitors had requested or solicited Duracell's trade secret information, and both of the rivals sent the information back to Duracell.

Duracell, a unit of Procter & Gamble, generates more than $1 billion in revenue from the sale of AA batteries.

Sentencing is scheduled for April 23.

"The theft of trade secrets is a serious crime that has the potential to cause significant economic damage to the owners of trade secrets and their shareholders," the United States attorney for the district of Connecticut, Kevin O'Connor, said.

Mover Shot By Prince George's Official Dies (WP)

By Eric Rich And Ruben Castaneda, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Hospitalized Man Too Ill To Give Details of Incident

A furniture deliveryman who was shot last week by a Prince George's County homeland security official died yesterday without having recovered to the point that he could describe the circumstances of the shooting, authorities and an attorney for his family said.

DOJ_NMG_0127896

Brandon D. Clark, 22, of Oxon Hill succumbed to his injuries at Prince George's Hospital Center. He and a co-worker had been in critical condition there since they were shot by Keith A. Washington, who is a veteran county police officer, as they delivered a Marlo Furniture bedroom set to his home in Accokeek.

Police initially said that Washington, a former driver for County Executive Jack B. Johnson, apparently acted in self-defense and that Clark and his co-worker, Robert White, would probably be charged with assault. They have since backed off that statement, saying they would wait until detectives have completed their work before deciding whom to charge.

The movers were unarmed, authorities have said.

In a statement yesterday confirming Clark's death, Prince George's Police Chief Melvin C. High said, "This is an unfortunate turn of events that now becomes a part of the internal and criminal investigation."

The case has attracted wide attention because of a pattern of previous complaints against Washington, 45, who was appointed deputy homeland security director by Johnson in 2004.

A law enforcement source confirmed yesterday that -- as Clark's girlfriend and the attorney for the family have said -- the deliverymen contacted a supervisor on the night of the shooting. According to the girlfriend, Leelee Best, the men told the supervisor that Washington was angry over a bedrail. The family attorney, Michael J. Winkelman, said the men were instructed to give Washington whatever he wanted.

Another source familiar with the investigation said yesterday that, in a brief report filed immediately after the shooting, Washington alleged that Clark and White, 36, of the District, were in a part of the house they were not supposed to be in. Both sources spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Under state law, police officers have up to 10 days to give a full statement after a shooting. Washington has not responded to messages seeking comment since the incident.

Speaking to reporters yesterday morning, Winkelman said Clark's family members were grieving but were grateful "for the outpouring of public and private support" they have received. He asked for "continued thoughts and prayers" for White, who remains in critical condition.

Winkelman said that during the time he was hospitalized, Clark was unable to communicate with his family in any substantive way about the events that led to his shooting. As far as he knows, Winkelman said, Clark "never told his side of the story to anyone before he died."

Clark was a graduate of DuVal High School, where he played on the football team. Clark's family has described him as a big, gentle man, easygoing and slow to anger, standing 6 feet 4 inches and weighing more than 260 pounds.

Glenn F. Ivey, state's attorney for Prince George's, has said two investigations of the shooting incident will proceed on separate tracks: One team of police detectives will investigate Washington's use of force; the other set of detectives will look into what crimes, if any, occurred during the encounter.

Ivey said yesterday that a grand jury would consider the matter once he has received the findings of the investigations, Clark's autopsy report and other documents. "We can't rush into the grand jury," he said. "It would be counterproductive to hurry the investigations."

Official Has History Of Altercations, Sources Say (WP)

By Cheryl W. Thompson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

In the 10 days since Prince George's County homeland security official Keith A. Washington shot two unarmed deliverymen at his Accokeek home, some critics have told of run-ins with him dating back 15 years. They describe a man who loses his temper easily and has ended up in physical and verbal altercations.

Washington's supporters, including relatives and some county officials, have been reluctant to talk in the midst of an investigation, other than to say that Washington acted in self-defense.

The case took a turn yesterday when one of the men, Brandon D. Clark, 22, died at Prince George's Hospital Center. Clark, of Oxon Hill, and Robert White, 36, were delivering a Marlo Furniture bedroom set to Washington when they were shot during an altercation. White, of the District, remained in critical condition.

Washington, a deputy director of homeland security and a 16-year member of the county's police force, did not respond to messages left on his cellphone. He has been on paid administrative leave since the incident Jan. 24.

Washington has come under investigation at least three times by the Prince George's police department for assault complaints or "unbecoming conduct" and has been sued at least twice, including once by a D.C. police officer who said that Washington assaulted him and had him falsely arrested, according to interviews and court records.

"Keith has a bad temper," said Michon Charles, the mother of Washington's teenage daughter, Hali. "He gets hot under the collar very quickly."

DOJ_NMG_0127897

Charles, who dated Washington briefly, recalled the day 13 years ago when Washington stormed into the property management office where she worked in San Antonio and yelled at her with her co-workers in earshot.

"He had a fit," Charles said, when they began discussing child support.

Charles asked a fellow employee to call the police, and the employee, Frances Broussard Peterson, said she told Washington, "You can't act like that in here."

Washington, 45, is a close friend, occasional dinner partner and fraternity brother of County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D), who named him to the homeland security position in 2004. Johnson said at the time that Washington would "lead this county in the right direction, ensuring that the office of Homeland Security provides the protection and required services that the county needs and desires." He said in an interview last summer that he hired Washington because he was "mentally tough."

Washington once served as Johnson's driver. He also worked on and contributed to Johnson's campaign in 2002. He was one of few county police officers to support Johnson, who, as state's attorney, had focused on combating police abuses. Washington ran unsuccessfully last year for County Council.

Washington, who was born in Houston, joined the Army at 18 so he could earn money to pay for college, he said in an interview last year. According to his rÃ©sumÃ©, he is a lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserve and has extensive training in counterterrorism.

Hali Washington, 18 and the elder of his two daughters, said she and her father have had a troubled relationship for years. He went through a period of not paying child support, court records show. She said she last saw him New Year's Eve, when she was visiting her aunt -- his sister -- in Houston for the holidays. He was upset that his sister had agreed to let his daughter and her cousin attend a party at a nightclub that evening, Hali Washington said.

"He made a huge scene in the courtyard of the apartment complex," she said in a phone interview from San Antonio, where she lives with her mother. "He was acting crazy and screaming. He told me he wasn't going to be my dad if I stayed there."

Washington has also had problems with other police officers, records show.

D.C. Police Officer Robert L. Johnson Jr. was walking across the parking lot of the Oak Tree Restaurant in Oxon Hill in 1994 when Washington, who had been hired to work security there, stopped him, according to a complaint by Johnson contained in a civil lawsuit.

Washington recognized Johnson from an earlier run-in at another nightclub, said another D.C. police officer who said he was with Johnson at the nightclub. Johnson said Washington "physically constrained" him and "placed him under arrest with no justification," according to court records. A judge found Johnson not guilty, said lawyer Robert Matty, who defended Johnson. Washington denied in the lawsuit that he acted improperly.

Johnson then sued Washington, the restaurant owner and the county for assault and battery and false arrest. The case was dismissed after Johnson was shot and killed in 1997 after a traffic dispute near the 6th District police station, where he worked, said G. Clifton Patterson, another attorney for Johnson.

Gerard F. Policicchio, who owned the Oak Tree Restaurant, said he hired Washington on the recommendation of another officer to work there in case "things got a little out of hand." He said that Washington was "outstanding."

"He was not over-physical with anybody at all," Policicchio said. "He was always level-headed. Never the rambunctious type to go after something that wasn't there."

In 2000, a jury found that Washington and a county corrections officer had violated the rights of an Adelphi man, David P. Maslousky, who was arrested after he objected to the way Washington treated a motorist in 1997. Maslousky said he was strip-searched by a corrections officer at the police station. He sued the officers and the county, and a jury awarded him $260,000. The case was appealed, and Washington prevailed at a new trial.

In January 2004, Dennis Tozser, a neighbor, complained to the police department about Washington. The two were members of a homeowners association board in Accokeek when, Tozser said, Washington pushed him during a neighborhood watch meeting. Washington was saying that the management company ignored him when he requested copies of contracts the association had with vendors, Tozser said.

"I stepped in to say there's more to the story, and Keith said, 'Let's go outside and settle this,' " Tozser recalled. "He wanted to duke it out and took off his jacket. I put my hands in my pocket and kept them there, because I wasn't getting involved with a police officer," he said. "That's when he shoved me in the chest."

Police Capt. A. Mark Ciccone told Tozser in a letter nearly a year later that there was no cause to discipline Washington. "The investigation of your complaint . . . has failed to sufficiently sustain any acts of misconduct on his part," Ciccone said.

Also in early 2004, Washington was charged with a misdemeanor on suspicion of assaulting a property manager during a homeowners board meeting. He was suspended with pay pending an investigation. The charge was later dropped.

Tozser said he sees Washington at civic association meetings and said the two are cordial.

DOJ_NMG_0127898

"I've talked to him. I've met with him," Tozser said. "I thought he sought anger management and had things under control, because it's been a long while since I heard anything with regards to him getting involved in a situation like this."

News researcher Alice Crites contributed to this report.

Feds Tout Results In Crime Crackdown (NOTP)

By Gwen Filosa, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, February 3, 2007

Team approach nets convictions, arrests

Federal agents announced a slew of arrests, indictments and convictions Friday, saying it marks only the start of their promise to team up with New Orleans police to end the violent crime wave plaguing New Orleans.

Their haul includes a north shore man who admitted trying to hire a hit man to murder a federal agent; a disgraced doctor now criminally charged with abusing her prescription power to deal painkillers; and a 21-year-old man accused of selling heroin and crack at a public housing complex.

By hitting suspects with gun and narcotics charges, federal law enforcement has vowed to stifle the group of violent offenders who seemingly glide in and out of the state criminal justice system.

"The feds are not screwing around," said Jim Bernazzani, the FBI's special agent in charge of the New Orleans field division. "The train has left the station."

In all, the federal, state and local partnership racked up two guilty verdicts, nine indictments of ten defendants, four arrests and one guilty plea in a plot to murder a Drug Enforcement Administration agent.

"We are ratcheting up the pressure as we speak," said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten during a news conference Friday in which various federal agencies ticked off their recent results. "We're not going to be able to do this logistically every week. The federal numbers are small, but the power and leverage we wield is enormous."

Cases ticked off

Letten and his colleagues announced the following cases:

Chris Walker, 31, of Hammond, pleaded guilty in federal court Friday for hatching a plot to kill a DEA agent who helped bust him and others in a crack cocaine ring based in Tangipahoa Parish. He admitted shopping for a hit man while in jail and paying $1,000 as a down payment for the killing. Walker faces a maximum sentence of life in prison. Johnnie Sims, 26, of Robert, pleaded guilty in November to similar crimes.

Jacqueline Cleggett, a former doctor living in Baton Rouge, is charged with illegally distributing OxyContin, Vicodin, methadone and other drugs between June 2000 and February 2002 from her eastern New Orleans medical practice. She faces a 37-count indictment accusing her of handing out a few thousand tablets before her medical license was revoked.

John Sears, 21, of New Orleans is charged with dealing crack cocaine, heroin and marijuana in the courtyard of the Iberville public housing complex, which neighbors the French Quarter. New Orleans police arrested him Jan. 23 in the 1500 block of Bienville Street after recognizing him from previous arrests.

Sears had a loaded .38-caliber handgun in his waistband, police said, and a body search turned up five grams of crack and seven grams of heroin hidden in his underpants. Twenty grams of marijuana was found in his pants pocket, the indictment says.

When arrested Jan. 23, Sears was already awaiting trial at Orleans Parish Criminal District Court on a 2004 case of dealing cocaine and heroin, and a second case from 2005 in which he is charged with dealing crack. Sears is in federal custody without bond.

Jermaine Surtain, 29, is now in the custody of the U.S. Marshal's Office, charged with having firearms that were stolen from Puglia's Sporting Goods in Metairie on New Year's Day. Surtain, who has a 2000 conviction for possession of crack cocaine, faces the federal felon-in-possession charge and up to 10 years in prison.

Surtain was nabbed with a stolen M-15 assault rifle, one of 122 guns looted from the store, authorities said. Surtain, of Algiers, was arrested Jan. 7 in Luling and booked with one count of burglary. But as of Friday, he will face prosecution at U.S. District Court after a team-effort investigation between the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office and federal agents.

Surtain fits the federal effort's plan to remove armed convicted felons from the streets and send them through the U.S. Attorney's Office, officials said.

'No revolving door'

"In the federal system, there is no revolving door," Bernazzani said.

On Monday, FBI agents will meet with NOPD homicide detectives and begin pounding the pavement Tuesday, Bernazzani said.

Fifteen agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration have been in the city since last week, embedded with the New Orleans Police Department, said Bill Renton, the DEA special agent in charge in New Orleans.

"The city is populated by great people," Renton said. "We can't let a small cadre of thugs run them out of the city."

The NOPD said the federal agents are working side by side with patrol officers.

"They're at roll calls, they're in these dark alleys and they're kicking in the doors with us," said NOPD Deputy Chief James Scott, "They're in the cars with us."

On Thursday night alone, Scott said, police and DEA agents teamed up to confiscate 141 grams of cocaine and three weapons.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives announced Friday that it will reward tipsters to its hotline, (504) 581-GUNS, with $1,000 if their calls lead to arrests on federal firearms violations.

"We'll pay the caller $1,000 within 72 hours," said Bob Browning of ATF.

. . . . . .

Gwen Filosa can be reached at gfilosa@timespicayune.com or (504) 826-3304.

Va. Men Plead Guilty In Fake Purse Scam (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Designer Knockoffs Were Sold at Parties

A father and son pleaded guilty yesterday to supplying phony designer purses at massive discounts for "purse parties" in Northern Virginia and for kiosks they operated at malls throughout the Washington region.

Lalit Kumar Ohri, 63, and his son Gaurav Ohri, 28, both of Fairfax, admitted that they sold purses bearing the trademarks of some of the nation's leading designer labels, including Gucci and Prada. The pair had the counterfeit bags embossed with the sought-after labels or gave the labels to purchasers, some of whom affixed them to the purses with glue. The purses were purchased by the father and son from suppliers in New York.

"I bought bags. They were counterfeit bags. . . . They were not genuine," Gaurav Ohri, director of operations for the family company, Sonya Handbags, said as he pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to traffic in counterfeit goods.

"We had the labels we put on the bags. They looked like the real labels," Lalit Ohri, the company's owner, said as he pleaded guilty to the same charge in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. Both face up to five years in prison when they are sentenced April 20.

With the last-minute pleas, they avoided a trial scheduled for Monday that had promised to be unusual at a federal courthouse that has hosted some of the nation's most prominent terrorism and spy cases. Representatives from Kate Spade, Louis Vuitton and other high-profile designers had been expected to testify, and prosecutors were planning to show the jury a sampling of hundreds of phony designer purses.

The case has focused attention on the trendy purse parties that began more than a decade ago in New York City and have been going on in Northern Virginia since at least 2000, according to partygoers. Held in private homes, the gatherings feature flowing wine and plentiful food, along with hundreds of designer handbags sold for hundreds of dollars less than the real deal. It is a crime to sell trademarked goods but not to purchase them.

Several women known as "purse ladies," who run the purse parties, had been expected to testify at the trial. The Ohris sold counterfeit purses to women who then re-sold them at purse parties "throughout Northern Virginia," Assistant U.S. Attorney Jeanine Linehan said in court yesterday. Purses at the parties could be purchased for $40 to $50 each. Prices of genuine designer handbags by labels such as Prada and Gucci range from hundreds of dollars to more than $2,000.

The investigation of the Ohris began with an anonymous tip from a partygoer, according to court documents and law enforcement officials. Federal agents then raided the home of one of the purse ladies, recovering about 100 handbags and self-adhesive designer labels. That led to a raid at the Ohris' warehouse in Lorton, where 30,000 purses were recovered, along with more than 100 phony Kate Spade labels in a desk drawer, court documents said.

Of the 30,000 purses, more than 6,000, with a retail value of $198,000, were determined to be trademark-infringing, Linehan said.

Lalit Ohri is a retired lieutenant colonel in the army of India who started his business in the early 1990s. By 2003, kiosks operating under the name Sonya Handbags were in 13 malls, including Tysons Corner Center and Fair Oaks Shopping Center in Virginia, Montgomery Mall and Columbia Mall in Maryland and the Old Post Office Pavilion in the District.

Counterfeit purses are sold on street vendor carts in Washington and other major cities, and enforcement of trademark laws is spotty. Experts say the problem has mushroomed in recent years.

Barry Rejects Offer, Maintains Innocence (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0127900

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

A D.C. Superior Court judge set a June 12 trial date yesterday for D.C. Council member Marion Barry on several traffic offenses -- charges that Barry and his attorney insist are unfounded.

Barry (D-Ward 8), a former D.C. mayor, has rejected an offer from prosecutors to plead guilty to operating a motor vehicle while impaired in an incident in which police said they detected the smell of alcohol. Had he accepted the offer, prosecutors would have dropped the other charges, including the more serious offense of driving under the influence. Prosecutors also would have dropped charges in connection with a subsequent traffic stop.

But in a hearing yesterday morning, Barry's attorney, Frederick D. Cooke Jr., told Magistrate Judge Milton C. Lee that there is little common ground between the D.C. attorney general's office and the defense and that a deal is unlikely.

"He can't plead guilty to an offense he didn't commit," Cooke said.

The charges against Barry, who stood next to his attorney during the brief hearing, stem from two traffic stops last year in the District.

In the first incident, Barry was pulled over Sept. 10 by uniformed Secret Service officers near the White House after allegedly running a red light. Police said he smelled of alcohol, and Barry was asked to take a breathalyzer test. An initial test came in below the legal limit, but officers said they wanted to conduct a urine test for alcohol, Cooke said in an interview. Barry declined to provide a urine sample, and according to Cooke, he said he was willing to take another breath test, which police chose not to administer.

The officers charged Barry with driving under the influence, which can be done when a driver refuses the urine test. But Cooke said that the officers should have given Barry another breath test unless they documented some reason why they could not. Absent that, Cooke said, all they have to stand on is Barry's .02 reading, which is below the legal limit.

"The only objective data says that he was not intoxicated," Cooke said.

Traci L. Hughes, a spokeswoman for the attorney general's office, said the officers had the discretion to demand that Barry submit to a different type of test and the authority to charge him when he did not. Barry also was charged with misuse of temporary tags and operating an unregistered vehicle.

The second episode was Dec. 16, when Barry was stopped by U.S. Park Police officers in Southeast Washington for driving too slowly. Police said that Barry's license was suspended; he insisted that it was valid and that the D.C. Department of Motor Vehicles verified it. The attorney general's office did not charge him with driving without a license.

Prosecutors did, however, file other charges against Barry, including misuse of temporary tags and operating an unregistered vehicle. In both incidents, Barry was driving a loaner vehicle while his car was being repaired.

Cooke said Barry did not know that there was a problem with the registration of the vehicle and therefore did nothing wrong.

"It's undue harassment," Barry said after the hearing. "They know they don't have a case."

Crashing The Party (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

As Super Bowl Looms, FBI Eyes Online Wagering

If the U.S. government gets its way on Super Bowl Sunday, all bets will be off -- all online bets, that is.

Federal prosecutors and agents in the FBI's organized crime unit have been mounting a large-scale crackdown on Internet gambling, with indictments against executives at gaming Web sites, arrests of foreign businessmen who process payments, and subpoenas to investment banks that may have helped bankroll the operations.

The aggressive campaign has gathered steam in recent weeks, as Americans prepare to wager more than $5 billion on tomorrow's game between the Chicago Bears and the Indianapolis Colts, the biggest betting day of the year, according to industry experts.

The arrests in California and in the U.S. Virgin Islands last month of two board members of Neteller, a British company that facilitates online money transfers, is spurring overseas executives with even modest gambling connections to avoid traveling to the United States lest they be nabbed. And it is leaving legal analysts and bettors crying foul about the government's approach.

"This escalation or, no, we should say surge, in this war of intimidation Justice is waging right now really has had an effect," said I. Nelson Rose, a professor at Whittier Law School in California and author of a textbook on gambling law.

Justice Department officials have long been on record as saying that Internet gambling breaks the law. They cite the long-standing Wire Act, a statute making it a crime to use telephone lines to place a bet within the United States or overseas. The 1961 law, which applies to businesses instead of individual bettors, was designed to eradicate the Mafia from the gambling arena.

But after the 2000 wire-fraud conviction of sports betting entrepreneur Jay Cohen for operating a Web site in Antigua, federal prosecutors enforced it only sporadically. The campaign heated up last year, after the government indicted two popular sports betting Web sites: Antigua's WorldWide Telesports Inc., and London's BetOnSports PLC. Both companies have announced they will no longer accept wagers from U.S. clients.

Then Congress dealt in. At the last minute, lawmakers inserted an online-gaming measure into the port security bill that chokes the flow of money by barring the use of credit cards, checks and fund transfers to make and settle bets. President Bush signed the bill into law in October.

But it has been the wave of criminal charges against individual executives and businesses that prompted a real exodus from the U.S. market. Americans bet nearly $6 billion online in 2005, but the flood of public companies out of the country has made it difficult to estimate current amounts, said Eugene Christiansen, who tracks such spending.

Meanwhile, U.S. authorities show few, if any, signs of folding, even in the face of rulings by the World Trade Organization that the United States cannot put foreign rivals at an economic disadvantage on the Internet gambling issue.

"Criminal prosecutions related to online gambling will be pursued even in cases where assets and defendants are positioned outside of the United States," Michael J. Garcia, the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, said last month.

Yet legal experts say there are questions about whether Internet gaming is a crime worthy of extradition in most foreign jurisdictions, and whether the executives meant to break the law, given that their operations are legal in their home countries.

Moreover, although the Justice Department has suggested that all forms of Internet gambling violate the law, analysts say that online horse racing, poker and fantasy leagues may be exempt. Gambling in some form, from state-sponsored lotteries to race tracks and slot machines, is legal in a majority of the 50 states, which collect billions in tax revenue from the enterprises each year.

A. Jeff Ifrah, a defense lawyer in the District office of Greenberg Traurig, said the Justice crackdown is confounding some legal analysts because "it is unclear how the government randomly targets members of this industry for prosecution, and why it is doing so on the heels of legislation that only recently prohibited facilitating certain gaming activity."

Neteller, which had provided payment services to more than 80 percent of worldwide gaming merchants, watched its business swell after PayPal and parent company eBay agreed to leave the business and forfeit $10 million to settle civil charges three years ago over financial transfers to offshore and online gambling firms.

Now, however, with the arrest of two of its founders, the British Web site is scrambling to exit the U.S business. Neteller is besieged with requests from frustrated bettors who want to recoup billions in deposits and winnings. The money is being held in trust accounts while the company holds conversations with the Justice Department about the status of its executives and other board members.

"The answer is, it's a bit confused at the moment," Neteller spokesman George Cazenove said. "I'm sure they will get their money back. You've got to give Neteller a bit of space."

Prosecutors have increased efforts to force advertising companies and Web sites to reject paid ads for Internet gambling sites. They also sent subpoenas to at least three investment banks, HSBC, Dresdner Kleinwort and Credit Suisse. Richard Lindsay, spokesman for HSBC, said the subpoena it received late last year requested information "pertaining to some Internet gambling companies."

The crackdown against public, regulated foreign businesses has left small private companies to fill the void, an issue that worries industry officials and consumer groups who say the smaller entities are less subject to oversight and more difficult to police. In essence, they argue, the government drive could turn into another prohibition, and have the perverse impact of fostering underground, illegal activity.

"The net effect of this is, responsible people are out of the business," said Frank J. Fahrenkopf Jr., president of the American Gaming Association, a casino industry trade group.

But federal officials disagree. Mark J. Mershon, FBI assistant director, last month cautioned that companies handling Americans' offshore bets "amount to a colossal criminal enterprise masquerading as legitimate business."

Staff writer Tomoeh Murakami Tse and staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

Fake Degrees Bought By 14 Confound Fire Officials (NYT)

By Cara Buckley

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

The Fire Department has not decided whether to take disciplinary action two days after a report revealed that 14 of its employees had used, or tried to use, bogus diplomas to be promoted or hired.

DOJ_NMG_0127902

According to the report, by the Department of Investigation, the 14 employees paid hundreds of dollars to buy fake degrees from "St. Regis University," an online diploma mill that required no course work, to fulfill the department's educational requirements.

But a spokesman from the Fire Department and a fire union official said the report overstated the extent of the problem. While 13 employees and one job applicant bought the degrees from a fake online university to be promoted or hired, the fire department rejected the phony diplomas from all but three. Ten were hired or promoted anyway because they later legitimately obtained the required credits. The Fire Department also said it began rejecting diplomas in 2003 from the so-called university, which claimed that it was based in Liberia.

"Of the 14 people, only 3 were promoted with that degree," said Francis X. Gribbon, a department spokesman. "We promoted 2,500 people since 2001. This is a handful of people we are talking about."

Yet according to Thomas Von Essen, who was fire commissioner from 1996 to 2001, the report underscored what he described as a lax attitude toward obtaining college credits in the department. Beginning in the late 1990s, Mr. Von Essen introduced requirements that higher-ranking Fire Department officials obtain a set number of college credits to be promoted. New hires would need college credits, too.

The Uniformed Firefighters Association, the fire officers' union, fought part of the new requirements. One of their arguments was that higher-ranking officers who came on the job when only high school diplomas were required should not need college credits to advance.

Though the new standards were adopted, Mr. Von Essen said resistance to them persisted.

"I'm absolutely not surprised that this happened, because the seriousness of education has never been accepted by the chiefs, and the higher ranks in the department," said Mr. Von Essen, now senior vice president at Giuliani Partners, the consulting firm of former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

But Peter L. Gorman, president of the officers' union, said most of the employees named in this week's report did nothing wrong. One of the employees, Daniel O'Gara, a battalion chief, had received a letter from a supervisor on the department's tenure desk, stating that his diploma met department requirements. But the letter writer confused "St. Regis University" with Regis College, a private college in Massachusetts. Still, Mr. Gorman said, the letter cleared Chief O'Gara of blame. "There was no cover-up; there was no intent to get false degrees," Mr. Gorman said.

Mr. Gribbon, the department spokesman, said the department began scrutinizing credits obtained, especially from online schools, after discovering in 2003 that "St. Regis University" was a fake. "We tightened up rules on all of them," he said.

But the department has also eliminated the requirement that new employees have college credits, in part to attract more minority applicants to its ranks. Starting in March, basic training will last 13 weeks instead of 8, Mr. Gribbon said, and will be extended to 23 weeks by year's end. Additional elements, like public relations and writing skills, were being folded into the training too, Mr. Gribbon said.

Several firefighters yesterday shrugged off the relevance of college credits to their jobs, saying experience rather than education mattered most.

Arthur Jens, 45, a retired firefighter from Engine 13, Ladder 12 in Chelsea, said: "Education's always a great thing. The more education you have, the better off you are. But as far as actual firefighting, I think the biggest thing is experience. That's the biggest factor in a fire."

According to Jason Post, a spokesman for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler met with Nicholas Scoppetta, the fire commissioner, yesterday to review the report. All 14 employees were still on the job, a Fire Department spokesman said.

"It is acceptable to wait more than two days before taking any action," Mr. Post said.

Former Judge Cites Pressure To Pay Friends Of Party Boss (NYT)

By Trymaine Lee

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

A former Brooklyn judge told a jury yesterday that she feared her career would be over if she did not pay $10,000 to associates of Clarence Norman Jr., the longtime leader of the borough's Democratic machine, for get-out-the-vote efforts and fliers during her re-election campaign in 2002.

The former judge, Karen B. Yellen of Brooklyn Civil Court, who ran on the Democratic ticket in the 2002 primary along with Mr. Norman, was the key witness for the prosecution in the weekold corruption trial against Mr. Norman, a former 12-term state assemblyman, in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn.

DOJ_NMG_0127903

It is Mr. Norman's fourth corruption trial in two years. In this case, he is accused of pressuring Judge Yellen and another judicial candidate for thousands of dollars. In the week leading up to the 2002 primary, prosecutors say, Mr. Norman demanded that Judge Yellen pay his associates or be "dumped" and lose the party's support.

Wearing a bright red blazer and a frilly white blouse, Ms. Yellen wiped away tears and gestured to the jury, saying, "This was a fight for my career, and I knew I had to do anything possible to save it."

She looked into the faces of the jurors and seemed to plead for their sympathy.

"I would no longer be a judge," she said. "I would be out of a job."

In the end, she lost anyway, beaten by upstart candidates.

Ms. Yellen's testimony repeated much of that given on Thursday by Jeffrey Feldman, Mr. Norman's former second in command.

Mr. Feldman and Ms. Yellen testified that Mr. Norman became angry when a member of the judge's camp asked what would happen if she did not pay. Prosecutors have said Mr. Norman wanted her to pay Ernest Lendler, a printer, $1,000 for a flier he designed, and William H. Boone III, a longtime associate of Mr. Norman's, $9,000 for get-out-the-vote efforts on Primary Day in the mostly black districts of central Brooklyn.

"The words he used was that 'we will dump her,' " Ms. Yellen testified. She said she was "shocked" and "astonished" by Mr. Norman's reaction.

During cross-examination, Mr. Norman's lawyers suggested that Ms. Yellen, who is white, was willing to spend money in white neighborhoods but not in black ones.

Anthony Ricco, a lawyer for Mr. Norman, said that Ms. Yellen had had no problems courting the black vote but drew the line on spending money to capture it.

"Didn't you and your advisers say it was a waste of time because Jewish people vote for Jewish candidates and black people vote for black candidates?" Mr. Ricco asked.

"But when you went to the chicken dinners in the African-American neighborhoods, did you say to those people, 'I'm here for your support,' " he asked, "and how good the chicken was?"

Ms. Yellen looked over at the jury and said: "No, I didn't. Because the chicken wasn't that good."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Calif. Teens Get Probation For Halloween Hate-crime Beating (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

LONG BEACH, Calif. (AP) — Four of nine black teenagers convicted in the racially charged beating of three white women on Halloween were sentenced to probation Friday.

Punishment could have ranged up to confinement in a California Youth Authority lockup until age 25. The teens were ordered to serve 250 hours of community service, 60 days house arrest, and take anger management and racial tolerance programs.

"It was an awful crime. Terrible, emotional and physical injuries," Juvenile Court Judge Gibson Lee said.

Last week, Lee convicted nine teens — eight female and one male — of felony assault, with a hate-crime enhancement against all but one.

Among those sentenced Friday were an 18-year-old youth, his twin sister, their 16-year-old sister — who didn't receive the hate-crime enhancement — and another 16-year-old girl.

The other five defendants face sentencing next week. Names of the defendants were withheld because they are juveniles or were juveniles at the time and were tried as juveniles.

The 18-year-old male teenager had pleaded with the judge, saying he was innocent and tried to help the victims, including taking a skateboard away from an assailant who was using it as a weapon.

"What will my life be like? I'm 18 and convicted of a hate crime," he said.

The victims were in an affluent area of Long Beach that draws crowds with fancy Halloween displays when a crowd of black youths yelled racial insults and one shouted "I hate whites," according to prosecutors.

One victim testified the trio was pelted with small pumpkins and lemons. A witness testified two of the women were beaten with skateboards.

Prosecutors said the beating only ended when a black motorist stopped, pulled the assailants away and shielded the women with his body.

DOJ_NMG_0127904

"I'm not sure if all the emotional scars will ever completely vanish," 21-year-old Loren Hyman, one of the victims, said earlier in a victim impact statement. "I feel like the beating I endured on Halloween night is still not over."

Two 15-year-old boys face trial later on charges of felony assault with the hate-crime enhancement.

Long Beach, 22 miles south of downtown Los Angeles, is a major U.S. cargo port with a racially diverse population of 475,000 and neighborhoods ranging from high-end shoreline condos to low-income urban areas.

Judge Defers Decision On Port Chester Election (NYJN)

By Liz Sadler, THE JOURNAL NEWS

New York Journal News, February 3, 2007

PORT CHESTER - A federal judged deferred a decision yesterday on whether to stop the March 20 village election for two seats on the Board of Trustees.

U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson will instead wait to hear arguments from both sides in the voting rights lawsuit filed by the U.S. Department of Justice against Port Chester, he said in a pre-trial conference.

The judge said he will presume that holding the election would cause irreparable harm, as the Justice Department alleges. The village must prove otherwise at trial later this month in order to proceed with the election.

Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, argued that stopping the election would actually cause irreparable harm to the village because it would force a special election and disenfranchise voters. He said the trustee race would provide a good "snapshot" of Hispanic voter turnout because a Hispanic candidate is running.

But U.S. Attorney David Kennedy said "this can only be decided after a full and fair hearing." He said it would be "informative but wrong" to hold the election in March.

The Justice Department sued the village in December, asserting that its at-large method of electing its six trustees violates the federal Voting Rights Act. It is asking the judge to replace Port Chester's system with one in which trustees are elected from six districts. It is also asking the judge to stop the March trustee election until voting districts are implemented.

The village argues that its election system is fair and has soundly denounced the Justice Department's case.

Trial dates are scheduled for Feb. 13-15 and 20-22.

Reach Liz Sadler at esadler@lohud.com or 914-694-3525.

Court: No Discrimination (MOULTO)

By Lori Glenn

Moultrie (GA) Observer, February 3, 2007

Ruling says Ellenton farmer was not unfair to Puerto Ricans

ELLENTON — The U.S. Court of Appeals 11th Circuit Thursday upheld a decision from the U.S. Justice Department that a Colquitt County farmer did not discriminate against 17 Puerto Rican farmworkers in favor of Mexican labor.

The plaintiffs had traveled from Puerto Rico to Georgia in 2003 to work for Booth Farms under a contract approved by the U.S. Department of Labor. They arrived a few days after a group of federal H2A program workers from Mexico.

Producer Larry Booth, of Ellenton, had maintained that some of the citizen workers (Puerto Rico is a territory of the United States) were slow pickers and didn't pick enough to earn the equivalent piece rate of $7.49 an hour, the Adverse Effect Wage Rate at the time, so he fired them citing economic reasons. The plaintiffs complained that no Mexican H2A workers who didn't work up to Booth's standard weren't fired and subsequently filed a discrimination suit. Federal law requires that employers hire Americans over H2A workers, but the plainiffs said Booth favored Mexican workers over Puerto Rican regardless of production rates.

The 17 workers, some of whom Booth said he didn't fire, were represented through the Georgia Legal Services Farmworker Division. Booth represented himself pro se with some assistance from friend and cousin former Georgia Senator Franklin Sutton, also of Ellenton. Booth wasn't able to secure financing for his farming operation because of the suit and had to sell out, he said. Plus, the same 17 plaintiffs have filed a suit in Puerto Rico against Booth Farms seeking about $383,000.

"Hell from Day One," Booth said. "I can truthfully say I would have worked them if they would have worked. And four of them I didn't fire."

"The argument that Georgia Legal Services had was that even though you had to pay them minimum wage, they weren't required to do anything. This makes a distinction between nonproduction and production, and that's a good thing," Sutton said.

Sutton said he isn't fool enough not to think that some farmworkers have been mistreated over the years, but he also thinks that Legal Services are extorting producers.

"They didn't care whether I was liable for those charges or not," Booth agreed. "All they wanted from me from day one is a settlement. They started sending me letters saying that we could settle for a lesser amount. They didn't have no concern on my part as far as I was liable or not. They never considered that. ... I'm proud that they did take it to the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals. That makes it a stronger case for us."

DOJ_NMG_0127905

Georgia Legal Services, funded through private and public sources, often handles cases involving failure to pay workers, cheating workers out of wages, discrimination and failure to keep recruitment promises, according to its Web site. Legal Services has represented complaints against Colquitt County producers in the past. Many, if not all up until now, have been settled out of court.

One local H2A farmer only would consent to an interview if The Moultrie Observer didn't use his name for fear of retaliation by Legal Services. He's been sued several times but settled each time because of the enormous expense of a trial.

"There for a while we were paying about $80,000 a year just to fight lawsuits. ... We settle just to get rid of it," he said.

And that's what these farmers think fuels Legal Services' fire.

"They want to settle it because they know they haven't got a case. It's frivolous stuff," he said.

This producer and several others, also wishing to remain anonymous, said they hire workers through the relatively costly H2A program because they want to hire legal workers to avoid trouble, but Legal Services haunts them with what they call "frivolous lawsuits."

"Immigration told us we needed to get legal, they were going to start raiding our farms," said one producer. "They don't go by what the law says. They sue for anything they want to sue on. If they win, it changes the playing field. If they don't win, so what — they're out soliciting for another case from somewhere else. It doesn't cost the worker anything. ...They say they don't target H2A, but they do."

Voting Rights: Noxubee Case A National Test (JCL)

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, February 3, 2007

Discriminating against the free exercise of the right to vote is wrong, regardless of race and regardless Mississippi's past history of white-on-black oppression.

Quietly, with little fanfare, a national test of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is under way in Mississippi.

This month, U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee has been presiding over the first case in U.S. history in which the federal government has accused black election officials of violating the Voting Rights Act by discriminating against white voters.

The U.S. Justice Department is alleging that Noxubee County Democratic Party Chairman Ike Brown and other Noxubee County election officials have rigged the voting process against white voters by manipulating voter rolls, making public threats to ban some whites from voting, certifying candidates who did not live in districts they sought to represent, miscounting ballots to ensure white candidates lost and other discriminatory acts.

Brown has denied all allegations, accusing the white minority in Noxubee County of petty complaints after years of white discrimination against black voters there.

The key question facing Judge Lee isn't whether Noxubee County or Mississippi has a sordid history of white election officials discriminating against black voters. The county and the state are guilty on both counts.

The question is if Brown and other black officials in Noxubee have used their powers to do the very same thing to white voters.

The Voting Rights Act must be enforced equally for voters of all races.

Push To Resolve Fading Killings Of Rights Era (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

ATLANTA, Feb. 2 — For every infamous killing that tore at the South in the 1950s and '60s, there were many more that were barely noted, much less investigated.

Virtually all such cases gained momentum only when the victims of the past found voices in the present, like those that helped arrest a 71-year-old man last month in connection with the Klan killings of two black teenagers in Mississippi in 1964. Rather than police officials, it has often been journalists and filmmakers who have combed through documents and tracked down witnesses, fueling some 15 years of successful prosecutions.

Only now, with time running out because potential witnesses and suspects are dying off, have law enforcement officials begun to take a systematic approach to unsolved civil rights crimes. The Federal Bureau of Investigation recently canvassed its field offices for the first time, compiling a list of 51 victims in 39 cases, most of which were never investigated by the bureau.

The list was prompted not by the string of convictions, but by a letter about the lynching of two black couples at the Moore's Ford Bridge, east of Atlanta, in 1946, said Chip Burrus, the assistant director of the F.B.I.'s criminal investigative division.

DOJ_NMG_0127906

"When I read the letter, I said, 'I've never heard of Moore's Ford. What is this about?' " Mr. Burrus said. "There've got to be more of these things."

That a single letter prodded the F.B.I. to action illustrates how slender are the time-brittled fibers that knit together the outcome in these fading crimes.

In the case that produced the recent arrest, timing was crucial. If the bodies of the victims, Henry H. Dee and Charles E. Moore, had been found just three weeks earlier in the summer of 1964, their deaths might have been largely forgotten.

The two friends, a sawmill worker and a college student, were 19 when they disappeared in May 1964, last seen hitchhiking on the highway near Meadville, Miss. They were beaten and drowned by Klansmen who mistakenly believed the two were involved in plotting an armed uprising. Two months later, on July 12, a fisherman spotted the torso of Mr. Moore in a Mississippi River backwater called the Old River. Mr. Dee was found the next day.

At the time, an extensive search was under way for three civil rights workers, two of whom were white New Yorkers, who had disappeared on the opposite end of the state in what became known as the "Mississippi Burning" case. The initial classification of Mr. Moore's body as that of a Caucasian male, and thus potentially one of the missing rights workers, caused a spurt of media coverage.

That fleeting interest had two results, said David Ridgen, a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation producer who has made a documentary about the case. It prompted the F.B.I. to investigate, and it ensured that there was enough in the historical record to arouse the curiosity, decades later, of scholars and reporters.

Countless other race killings, however, were minimally recorded. In the late 1980s, when the Southern Poverty Law Center in Montgomery, Ala., was creating its memorial to 40 civil rights martyrs, most of whose cases remain unprosecuted, researchers found more than 80 victims who could not be included because not enough was known about the circumstances of their deaths.

"It was so frustrating and sad," said Sarah Bullard, the project's chief researcher. "If the information wasn't there I couldn't include them, no matter what I suspected or felt."

Mr. Burrus of the F.B.I. said he was not familiar with the monument or the center's research, but that the bureau had also consulted civil rights groups in compiling its list.

Because local newspapers often ignored such killings, Ms. Bullard pored over microfilm of national newspapers and records compiled by the Tuskegee Institute, internal memorandums of the N.A.A.C.P. and other civil rights groups, and cartons of news clippings collected by a research group called the Southern Regional Council and stored in the basement of a Korean grocery in Atlanta.

Ms. Bullard recalled references to an unidentified teenager who was found in the Big Black River in Mississippi wearing a Congress of Racial Equality T-shirt. After scouring all her sources, she learned only his name, Herbert Oarsby.

"There were activists who were trying to pay attention," Ms. Bullard said, "but at the same time there were African-American communities who knew that racist crimes amongst them were not going to be investigated or reported and made the choice not to seek justice because it would bring on further violence against them."

That may have been the case with Mr. Moore's mother, Mazie, who made her elder son Thomas promise not to avenge or seek justice for his brother's death. In 1964, when reporters found her at the country shack where she had lived all her life, she repeatedly praised the white residents of Franklin County, a Klan stronghold, and said there was nothing to be done.

Alvin Sykes, a civil rights advocate who has urged the federal government to pass the Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Bill, which would provide $11.5 million per year to investigate these cases, said part of that money would be used to encourage people scared into silence at the time to come forward. "We have absolutely no idea how many of them are out there," Mr. Sykes said.

Mazie Moore died in 1977, and in 1998 Thomas Moore finally decided to seek justice, contacting the local district attorney, Ronnie Harper, who was unaware of the case. Mr. Harper requested information from the F.B.I., and was told that no file on the case existed.

But in 2000 two journalists, Jerry Mitchell of The Clarion-Ledger in Jackson and Harry Phillips of ABC News, obtained copies of the F.B.I. investigation file that was said to be missing, which had led to the arrest of Charles M. Edwards and James F. Seale in November 1964, though the charges were dropped when the district attorney said there was not enough evidence to make a case.

Mr. Phillips used the file to track down the F.B.I.'s principal informant, Ernest Gilbert, then 74, persuading him to do an on-camera interview about the case, and Mr. Mitchell reported that because the crime began in the Homochitto National Forest, where the two victims were tied to trees and beaten with switches, federal prosecutors might have jurisdiction in the case.

But even those breakthroughs did not force prosecutors to act. Mr. Harper says he was told by the F.B.I. that Mr. Gilbert would not testify. The F.B.I. closed the case in 2003 because the jurisdiction issue could not be resolved, said Deborah Madden, a spokeswoman for the F.B.I. office in Jackson. Mr. Gilbert died in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0127907

Thomas Moore, living in Colorado Springs, grew tired of telling reporters his brother's story with no result. But in 2005, Mr. Ridgen, the documentary producer, convinced him that the two should go back to Mississippi together.

On that trip, they discovered that Mr. Seale was not dead, as several newspapers had reported, but was still living in Franklin County. Then came a coincidence: Thomas Moore had served in the same Army unit as Dunn Lampton, who became the United States attorney in Jackson in 2001. Mr. Moore and Mr. Ridgen persuaded Mr. Lampton to reopen the case, resulting in the recent arrest of Mr. Seale, who has pleaded not guilty.

"Thomas Moore had a lot of information about what happened, and I made use of that," Mr. Lampton said. "You don't come into an office and go back and start digging through all the old files to find something to do. It's only when someone brings that to your attention."

Number Of People Stopped By New York Police Soars (NYT)

By Al Baker And Emily Vasquez

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

The New York Police Department released new information yesterday showing that police officers stopped 508,540 individuals on New York City streets last year — an average of 1,393 stops per day — often searching them for illegal weapons. The number was up from 97,296 in 2002, the last time the department divulged 12 months' worth of data.

After inquiries by the City Council and civil rights advocates, the department delivered four bound volumes of statistics to the Council in midafternoon. The raw data showed that more than half of those stopped last year were black: an average of 67,000 per quarter.

At the same time, the average number of people arrested per quarter as a result of such stops almost doubled to 5,317 last year, from 2,819 in 2002, and summonses nearly quintupled, to a quarterly average of 7,292 last year from 1,461 in 2002.

Until yesterday, the most recent information released by the Police Department about how and why it stops people to search them, sometimes looking for illegal guns, was from 2003, according to city officials and city and court records. Some officials have said that lag put the department at odds with a pair of legal requirements that sprang from public outrage at the 1999 fatal police shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed black street peddler.

The department, which rejects such assertions, has not released numbers from 2004 and 2005, or from the last three months of 2003.

Those who review the data are now grappling with dual issues: determining why the Police Department waited so long to release any new figures, and why it is stopping more people and searching them.

The issue of these police-public encounters — called "stop and frisks" — became an emotional flashpoint after the shooting of Mr. Diallo, whose death in a barrage of 41 police bullets led to weeks of protests and scores of arrests outside 1 Police Plaza, in Lower Manhattan.

Many of the protesters contended that there was a pattern of racial profiling in stop-and-frisks. A state study later in 1999 confirmed racial disparities in such stops.

The guidelines to monitor stop-and-frisks in detail were set forth in a city law signed in 2001, and in a federal court case settled by the Bloomberg administration in 2004. Both called for the Police Department to release to the City Council, four times a year, basic data about the people who are stopped and questioned by officers, and the reasons for such encounters.

But until yesterday, it had been a year since the department reported its stop-and-frisk activity, and those numbers dated from a three-month period ending in September 2003.

In the meantime, the Civilian Complaint Review Board, an independent city agency that investigates charges of police misconduct, found that complaints involving stops and searches have more than doubled in recent years, increasing to 2,556 last year from 1,128 in 2003. Complaints involving police stops now account for 33 percent of all complaints, up from 20 percent in 2003.

At a City Council hearing on Jan. 24, Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly assured council members that his officers were not practicing racial profiling in street stops.

"Officers are stopping those they reasonably suspect of committing a crime, based on descriptions and circumstances," Mr. Kelly said, "and not on personal bias."

Paul J. Browne, the chief police spokesman, said later that the department's analysis of the numbers showed that while 55.2 percent of the stop encounters last year involved blacks, 68.5 percent of crimes involved suspects described as black by their victims (or by witnesses, in the case of homicides). Hispanics, he said, made up 30.5 percent of those stopped and 24.5 percent of suspected offenders. For whites, he said, the numbers were 11.1 percent and 5.3 percent, respectively.

DOJ_NMG_0127908

Mr. Browne said that aggressive street enforcement was partly responsible for the increase in stop-and-frisks. Also, he said, "careful accounting" of such encounters by the department in recent years made the increase seem greater. "Part of it is taking guns off the street and responding to complaints where we use stop-and-frisk," he said.

It was unclear last night how much of the increase in stops was due to suspected gun possession or how many led to gun arrests. Mr. Browne could not confirm a direct line between gun arrests and increases in stops, and said officers' efforts to take guns off the streets were just one facet of the crime suppression the stop-and-frisk forms reflected.

The 2006 figures, delivered yesterday by two officers in plain clothes, were contained in four books of about 250 pages each. Councilman Peter F. Vallone Jr., chairman of the Council's public safety committee, said his staff was unable to interpret the numbers immediately.

The department's lag in releasing the numbers came to light after the fatal shooting in November of another unarmed black man, Sean Bell, and has been seized on by civil rights advocates, academics and current and former government officials. Mr. Bell's death was not related to a stop-and-frisk operation, but it has become a valve for frustrations over relations between the police and minority residents. But members of the City Council said they had been requesting the material even before the Bell shooting.

Jeffrey Fagan, a professor of law and public health at Columbia University who studied the issue in 1999 for Eliot Spitzer, then the attorney general, said he was not surprised that the number of stop-and-frisks went up "during a period of no accountability."

But, he added, "it is an astonishing fact that stop rates went up by 500 percent when crime rates were flat." Police officials and a city lawyer said there were several reasons the department had fallen behind in releasing the numbers. Compiling the reports, they said, has been hampered by antiquated technology, especially since the numbers have risen. The department has been working to modernize its reporting system, officials said, and has not been withholding the data deliberately.

Some observers questioned whether producing data on street stops remained on the department's front burner during the age of terrorism.

"I just don't think it's a priority," Dr. Fagan said of the data collection.

The total number of stops includes cases in which the officers acted to prevent what could have been terrorist activity, the police said. But those stops are relatively rare, they said, and there is no separate category for keeping track of them. Searches of subway riders' bags are not considered stop-and-frisk encounters because people willing to forgo entry to the subway can decline them.

Joel Berger, who monitored matters of police conduct as an executive in the city's Law Department from 1988 to 1996, said: "It is particularly frightening that the Police Department is not following the statute that requires reporting on stop, question and frisks. It is the thing that happens most often and most troubles people, and the failure to report the numbers is, effectively, very alarming."

Mr. Spitzer first dug into the issue of street stops after the Diallo shooting and found that Hispanics and blacks were being disproportionately targeted. After adjusting for varying crime rates among racial groups, his analysis found that blacks were stopped 23 percent more often than whites. Hispanics were stopped 39 percent more often than whites.

In the wake of those findings, the city signed a law allowing the Council to collect the Police Department's stop-and-frisk data on a quarterly basis. Separately, the federal class-action lawsuit, Daniels v. City of New York, alleged that the police habitually used racial profiling in stop-and-frisk situations. When the city's corporation counsel settled the case in January 2004, the agreement required the police to disclose data on such encounters through 2007.

The idea was that increased transparency about police stops would not only foster analysis of one of the department's most crucial tactics for reducing crime, but also would help restore the public's trust.

Mr. Spitzer's study reviewed police records known as UF-250s. Officers must fill them out after making forcible stops, including those in which a person is frisked or searched. His report noted that officers did not always fill them out. The form shows the race of the person stopped as well as the reason.

Under a system begun in the spring of 1999, police officials said, forms completed at individual precincts were taken to 1 Police Plaza, where their 50 points of data were gathered. Envisioning a daunting backlog, Mr. Kelly in 2005 directed that the process be decentralized so that the raw data could be recorded quickly, at the precinct level.

Mr. Kelly told officials at the Jan. 24 hearing that the data for the remainder of 2003, and for all of 2004 and 2005, would take longer to provide. That is "because it must be compiled manually, rather than in a technologically advanced way," according to a letter sent Thursday from the Law Department to a plaintiff in the federal case.

"We've been patiently waiting for years now," Councilman Vallone, told Mr. Kelly at the hearing. "We would again request that you give us that information."

DOJ_NMG_0127909

For a time, the police gave the data to the City Council with some regularity. But the frequency of the reports slowed, and in February 2006, the department released data for the third quarter of 2003.

Then, the flow of data stopped. Until yesterday.

But city leaders came under criticism as well for failing to more forcefully demand the data. "The City Council has failed to ensure that the Police Department is producing the reports, as required by the statute," said Christopher Dunn of the New York Civil Liberties Union. "As a result, it has not been doing any monitoring of stop-and-frisk activity, which was the very point of the statute."

Court Bars Government Benefit For Same-Sex Domestic Partners (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 2 — Same-sex domestic partners are not entitled to health benefits from public universities or local and state governments under the State Constitution's two-year-old marriage amendment, the Michigan Court of Appeals said in a ruling released Friday.

In a reversal of a lower court ruling, a three-judge panel found that the amendment, which bans same-sex marriage, also prohibited government agencies from recognizing "similar unions" like domestic partnerships for any purposes.

"By officially recognizing a same-sex union through the vehicle of a domestic partnership agreement, public employers give same-sex domestic couples similar status to that of married couples," the judges wrote.

Such action, they added, would "run directly afoul of the plain language of the amendment."

The American Civil Liberties Union, which filed a supporting brief in the case, expressed "deep disappointment" with the decision and said it would appeal to the State Supreme Court.

The issue of benefits became contentious when Michigan voters passed the marriage amendment in November 2004 because several public employers, including universities and local governments, had policies or agreements in place that extended health care to same-sex domestic partners of employees.

The formal case began in 2005 when National Pride at Work Inc., a gay advocacy group based in Washington, and a number of individuals sought to settle the question about benefits through the court.

They sought a declaratory judgment that the amendment did not prohibit public employers from conferring health benefits to employees' same-sex domestic partners.

Among their arguments was that a denial of benefits would violate the state's equal- protection clause. They also said that proponents of the marriage amendment had made assurances that its passage would not affect benefits to same-sex partners.

A trial court in Ingham County granted the judgment in 2005, saying that the extension of benefits in the context of employment contracts did not come close to the legal status of marriage in society.

But Mike Cox, the Michigan attorney general, asked for a stay of the ruling and reconsideration, which was granted.

The new ruling was dated Thursday but released on Friday.

Deborah A. Labelle, a lawyer for the A.C.L.U. of Michigan, said in a statement, "After today's decision, many men and women in Michigan with children now stand to lose their benefits."

Michigan Court Rules Against Gay Benefits (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

LANSING, Mich. (AP) -- Public universities and state and local governments would violate the state constitution by providing health insurance to the partners of homosexual employees, the Michigan Court of Appeals ruled yesterday.

A three-judge panel said a 2004 voter-approved ban on homosexual "marriage" also applies to same-sex domestic partner benefits. The decision reverses a 2005 ruling from an Ingham County judge who said universities and governments could provide the benefits.

"The marriage amendment's plain language prohibits public employers from recognizing same-sex unions for any purpose," the court wrote.

A constitutional amendment passed by Michigan voters in November 2004 made the union between a man and a woman the only agreement recognized as a marriage "or similar union for any purpose." Those six words led to the court fight over benefits for homosexual couples.

Homosexual couples and others had argued that the public intended to ban homosexual "marriage" but not block benefits for unmarried opposite sex or same-sex domestic partners.

The appeals court agreed with the Michigan attorney general, Republican Mike Cox, who said in a March 2005 opinion that same-sex benefits are not allowed in a state that does not recognize same-sex unions.

DOJ_NMG_0127910

The legal challenge was mounted by 21 homosexual couples who work for the city of Kalamazoo, universities and the state.

"The protection of the institution of marriage is a long-standing public policy and tradition in the law of Michigan," Judges Kurtis Wilder, Joel Hoekstra and Brian Zahra noted In the unanimous ruling.

Jeffrey Montgomery, executive director of the Triangle Foundation, a leading homosexual advocacy group in Michigan, said the legal sanctity of marriage was not in question.

"This ruling will result in families being robbed of their health care and other basic necessities that are fundamental to protecting their well-being," he said.

The case will be appealed to the Michigan Supreme Court, said Jay Kaplan, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union of Michigan.

"We're very disappointed by this result," he said. "It's a misguided analysis, and they produced a heartless result. It was never the voters' intention in 2004 to take away health insurance benefits from families and children."

The Right Reform (WP)

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

LAWMAKERS locally and nationally are moving in the right direction in pushing for improvements in how Americans vote. Foremost is the growing movement to require an independent way to verify the results of electronic voting. It's critical, though, that this reform effort be calibrated so that local election officials are given the time and resources to do the job properly.

Congress is expected to consider legislation this year requiring that the nation's electronic voting machines produce a paper trail so that people can verify the accuracy of their votes and to facilitate recounts in disputed elections. Meanwhile, as reported by the New York Times, states such as Florida may abandon touch-screen voting. The Virginia legislature is considering a bill that would phase out the machines, and Maryland appears headed toward some kind of requirement for a paper trail.

While we have not been in the camp of those seeing fanciful conspiracies in electronic voting, a backup system is without question the best way to safeguard security and ensure voter confidence. One worry, however, is whether unreasonable mandates will be placed on local communities. Some of the problems that Maryland experienced during last fall's elections were attributed to election workers being overwhelmed by new and unproven technology. Already, officials such as state Sen. President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr. (D-Calvert) have expressed doubt about whether the state has the money or the time to implement big changes for the 2008 presidential election.

It's clear that this will be the impetus from Congress, where Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.) has lined up a majority of House members in support of his bill requiring paper ballots in time for the presidential primaries. Mr. Holt is correct about the urgency of the need for reform, but it's important that this reform be a lasting one.

ANTITRUST:

Viacom Orders Removal Of Videos From YouTube (WSJ)

By Matthew Karnitschnig

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

Deciding that trading its copyright protection for Internet buzz was no longer viable, Viacom Inc. ordered Google Inc.'s YouTube to remove all of its content from the video Web site.

Viacom's decision to force YouTube, which hosts a vast array of video content uploaded by its users, to take down more than 100,000 video clips from its Web site may yet prove to be a negotiating tactic aimed at drawing the company into a deal. But Viacom executives said privately they had determined that the marketing boost they once believed YouTube provided them has proved to be a mirage.

"People are waking up to the fact that there is no marketing advantage," a Viacom executive said. "There's no novelty anymore." YouTube Chief Executive Chad Hurley said in an interview that other media companies such as CBS and NBC that partnered with YouTube felt otherwise.

Viacom's decision comes after the two camps failed to reach a distribution agreement despite months of negotiation punctuated by pointed rhetoric from Viacom, which owns a stable of cable networks that includes MTV, Nickelodeon and Comedy Central as well as the Paramount movie studio.

DOJ_NMG_0127911

Viacom wants to be paid for the inclusion of its content on YouTube. Viacom video clips, such as those from "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart," count among YouTube's most-viewed content. Viacom said the roughly 100,000 clips it ordered removed accounted for 1.2 billion video streams.

"We have been quite indulgent to this point," Viacom Chief Executive Philippe Dauman said in an interview. "We cannot continue to allow YouTube or Google to continue to profit from our content without a reasonable commercial agreement."

"They are more focused on the money they can make in the short term," said David Eun, Google's vice president of content partnerships. "We're still more focused on innovation than the short-term economics." Mr. Eun said Google still hoped to come to a licensing agreement with Viacom. Mr. Hurley said the company was in the process of removing the videos that Viacom requested, and that it currently doesn't generate any revenue from advertising on the YouTube pages where videos are displayed, a claim Viacom disputes.

Copyright law compels YouTube to remove all content it doesn't hold the rights to if it receives a complaint from the owner. YouTube regularly receives such requests from media companies and readily complies with them.

Viacom has previously asked the site to take down full-length episodes of its shows but has allowed it to continue to carry short clips. Like other media companies, Viacom has had to balance the advantages of exposure on YouTube, which says consumers view its videos more than 100 million times a day, with protecting its copyrights.

Until now, the company considered YouTube's broad distribution worth the copyright infringement. Though Viacom offers much of its video content free on its own Web sites, those sites have struggled to draw the Web-savvy youngsters who regularly flock to YouTube.

Viacom also has provided YouTube with a list of all of its programs and ordered the Web concern to keep Viacom content off the site in the future. It is unclear whether there is a legal basis for Viacom to enforce this request, however. The so-called safe harbor provisions that govern online copyrights stipulate that Internet companies remove content they don't own when they receive a complaint from the copyright holder. But it isn't clear whether sites such as YouTube can be forced to prevent the content from being put online to begin with.

In explaining the reasons for its decision, Viacom complained that YouTube had yet to install filtering tools to slow the flow of unauthorized content onto the site.

"YouTube and Google retain all of the revenue generated from this practice, without extending fair compensation to the people who have expended all of the effort and cost to create it," the company said in a statement.

YouTube last year said it intended to introduce digital fingerprinting technology that could automatically identify copyrighted video and audio clips in order to remove them or share related ad revenue with content owners.

In an interview earlier this past week, Google Chief Executive Eric Schmidt said Google would "eventually do some very significant deals" related to its online video services, including YouTube. Google has been in discussions with a number of television and music companies about licensing their video and music for use on its video services, and at the same time stave off any copyright lawsuits against Google over content uploaded by users without its owners' permission.

The CEO declined to comment on any specific possible deals but said he "wasn't in a great hurry on this issue -- it's more important to get it right." He acknowledged copyright concerns but added, "We have answered those by saying we're working very hard on fingerprinting technologies."

--Kevin Delaney contributed to this article.

Write to Matthew Karnitschnig at matthew.karnitschnig@wsj.com5

Viacom Tells YouTube To Remove Content (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin And Aline Van Duyn In New York

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

Google's strategy for its newly acquired YouTube site was dealt a serious blow on Friday when Viacom, the owner of MTV, demanded that all its clips be removed from the user-generated internet company's site.

Viacom, which owns youth brands such as Nickelodeon and Comedy Central, made the demand after months of negotiations with YouTube and Google. It said more than 100,000 affected video clips on the YouTube site had generated more than 1.2bn video streams.

The move threatens to wreck Google's attempts to cement commercial relationships with traditional media groups, which supply most material.

Since acquiring YouTube for $1.65bn in October, Google and Eric Schmidt, its chief executive, have made a frantic effort to forge relationships with traditional media companies. They have managed to sign short-term deals with CBS, Warner Music, Sony-BMG and Universal Music.

Discussions with Viacom appeared to break down over the splitting of advertising revenues from Viacom content. There was also a fight over which company would make those sales.

Viacom executives were frustrated that YouTube had failed to implement a content-monitoring system by the beginning of the year, as it had promised, so companies could easily tell when their material was being posted.

It accused Google and YouTube of reaping all the revenue from their material "without extending fair compensation to the people who have expended all of the effort and cost to create it".

YouTube said it would comply with the request.

"It's unfortunate that Viacom will no longer be able to benefit from YouTube's passionate audience which has helped to promote many of Viacom's shows," YouTube said in a statement. "We take copyright issues very seriously. We prohibit users from uploading infringing material, and we cooperate with all copyright holders to identify and promptly remove infringing content as soon as we are officially notified."

Viacom and other traditional media groups are eager to distribute their content to audiences of social networking and user-generated websites, which are wildly popular with young consumers. But they are wary of losing commercial and editorial control.

They complain that most clips posted on the sites are derived from their copyrighted work and have been appropriated without permission.

Viacom believes it has particular leverage because it specialise in youth-oriented and short-form video clips. It has previously demanded that clips from programmes such as Comedy Central's Daily Show be removed.

Under US copyright laws, sites are protected from legal action as long as they respond in a timely manner to requests to remove unauthorised material. NBC Universal, Disney and Viacom complain that they have to monitor hundreds of thousands of clips.

Viacom Decides YouTube Is A Foe (WP)

By Mike Musgrove, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Videos Reclaimed After Talks Fail

Viacom Inc. demanded that online-video-sharing site YouTube remove all video clips of its content yesterday and accused the site of profiteering.

The media company, which owns the Comedy Central, Nickelodeon and MTV cable networks, said there were some 100,000 clips of its shows on the site that have been viewed 1.2 billion times. The request, which YouTube said it would honor, came after months of profit-sharing negotiations between the two companies failed.

The dilemma for Viacom, as it yanks back control over clips from its popular networks, is whether YouTube is more of a marketing tool that helps it win new viewers, or a business threat.

"We have been very indulgent for a period of time, but we've come to the point where we can't let YouTube and Google continue to profit at our expense without an agreement in place," Viacom chief executive Philippe P. Dauman said in an interview yesterday.

Though YouTube, which was purchased by Google last year, said it would take down the clips, as of yesterday afternoon there were still thousands for shows like Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report" on its site.

The tussle between the companies is indicative of a rocky transition for traditional broadcast interests, which must try to make business sense out of the online entertainment age, in which content is easy to produce, copy and distribute. Many networks are putting shows on their own Web sites, but YouTube, which is just a year old, has become the online nexus for trading both homemade and cribbed video. It serves up 100 million videos and its users upload 65,000 videos a day, and now that it's backed by Google's massive advertising machine, YouTube stands to become its own advertising behemoth.

With valuable ad revenue at stake, Viacom is not the first company to publicly take YouTube to task over copyright issues. Last month, Twentieth Century Fox subpoenaed YouTube to learn who uploaded pirated copies of episodes of television shows "24" and "The Simpsons." Last year, a group representing Japanese authors and copyright holders asked the site to take down 30,000 videos.

Such copyrighted content often makes its way to YouTube's most-watched lists. Yesterday, an interview with Bill Gates that had aired Monday night on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show With Jon Stewart" ranked No. 6 on YouTube. The clip remained online early yesterday evening.

YouTube, in its own defense, has argued that the popularity of such clips helps promote programs.

DOJ_NMG_0127913

"It's unfortunate that Viacom will no longer be able to benefit from YouTube's passionate audience which has helped to promote many of Viacom's shows," the company's statement said. Some networks, like NBC, have selectively allowed clips of such shows as "Saturday Night Live" and "The Office" to remain on the site for promotional reasons.

Even when people violate YouTube's user agreement and post copyrighted material, the site is not in violation of the law so long as it removes the infringing videos at the copyright holders' request, said Tim Wu, a law professor at Columbia University.

"It's a common misconception that YouTube is a big land mine of liability," he said, "but the law in this area favors YouTube much more than people realize."

Because both sides have an interest in keeping content available, most of YouTube's copyright disputes with the television networks have been resolved through profitable arrangements, said Forrester Research media analyst James L. McQuivey.

CBS, for example, started a channel on YouTube's site last year, with clips from such programs as "The Late Show with David Letterman," and has even credited YouTube with boosting its ratings. In three months, the new channel has been viewed 90 million times.

McQuivey said he would expect Viacom and YouTube to eventually strike a similar deal. "It's a great way to drive eyeballs," he said.

YouTube, meanwhile, is not the only one defending itself against claims that it's making money piggybacking on others' content.

This week, Amanda Congdon, former host of the popular online show "Rocketboom," found that ablog, Valleywag, took one of her videos and added its logo. Though she doesn't mind when fans post videos of her content, Valleywag crossed the line, she said.

"They basically harvested a video from my site and plopped their logo on it. They made it seem like there was some sort of affiliation, which there isn't," she said. "I just think it's kind of underhanded to advertise on someone else's content."

YouTube Removing Viacom TV Shows Media Firm Says 'Daily Show,' MTV Snippets Must Go (SFC)

By Ellen Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 3, 2007

YouTube, the popular online video site, has begun removing more than 100,000 unauthorized clips belonging to entertainment giant Viacom -- everything from snippets of Jon Stewart's "The Daily Show" to Nickelodeon's "SpongeBob SquarePants."

The purge comes after Viacom demanded that YouTube take down the material, accusing the site of violating its copyrights. Viacom says it's the largest order to delete videos it has ever made.

The dispute reflects how popular San Bruno's YouTube has become as an online source of entertainment. And it highlights the dilemmas media companies face as they try to keep control of their material in the digital age.

Since exploding onto the Web less than two years ago, YouTube has drawn ire -- as well as millions of loyal fans -- for its vast and rapidly growing library of videos, many of them copyrighted clips from popular television shows and movies. The site's mushrooming popularity got the attention of Internet powerhouse Google, which bought YouTube for $1.65 billion last year.

Viacom, whose properties include MTV, Comedy Central, BET, TV Land and Nickelodeon, said it spent months negotiating with YouTube so that it could be paid for its material to appear on the site. That copyrighted material -- amounting to 1.2 billion streams, according to Viacom -- is uploaded by YouTube users, despite measures the site takes to stop the practice.

"YouTube and Google retain all of the revenue generated from this practice, without extending fair compensation to the people who have expended all of the effort and cost to create it," Viacom said in a statement.

YouTube said it takes copyright issues seriously, but it added that media companies gain from having their shows displayed.

"It's unfortunate that Viacom will no longer be able to benefit from YouTube's passionate audience, which has helped to promote many of Viacom's shows," a YouTube spokesperson said in a statement.

But in an interview, Viacom general counsel Mike Fricklas said that Viacom should have control over how and what it promotes. "When everyone gets a free pass to the movies, it's no longer promotional," he said.

YouTube has already struck partnerships with CBS, NBC and others to post authorized clips on the site. Last fall, CBS said that in the first month it operated a YouTube channel, it garnered 29.2 million views, and credited the partnership for increasing ratings.

By law, YouTube must take down copyrighted material when it is alerted to it. This happens regularly. Last fall, the Japanese Society for Rights of Authors, Composers and Publishers demanded that YouTube delete 30,000 copyrighted clips from the site.

DOJ_NMG_0127914

Even NBC, which, like CBS, has a branded YouTube channel, continues to order YouTube to remove some 1,000 clips a month.

James McQuivey, principal analyst with Forrester Research, said he expects the two sides to return to the bargaining table quickly. By demanding its clips be erased from YouTube, Viacom is making a point that its shows offer more value than YouTube's other partners. Viacom shows appear on paid cable rather than broadcast channels, for instance, and "The Daily Show" and "The Colbert Report" are consistently on YouTube's top-watched lists.

On the other hand, YouTube and Google want to come to an agreement quickly because they don't want it to appear that media companies can play hardball and dictate deal terms, McQuivey said.

Page C - 1

Viacom Asks YouTube To Remove Over 100,000 Unauthorized Video Clips (USAT/AP)

By Seth Sutel, The Associated Press

USA Today, February 3, 2007

NEW YORK — Media company Viacom, which owns the cable networks MTV, VH1, Nickelodeon and the Paramount Pictures movie studio, asked YouTube on Friday to remove more than 100,000 unauthorized clips from its hugely popular video-sharing site.

Viacom said in a statement that after several months of talks with YouTube and its corporate parent, the online search leader Google, "it has become clear that YouTube is unwilling to come to a fair market agreement that would make Viacom content available to YouTube users."

Viacom said that YouTube and Google had failed to deliver on several "filtering tools" to control unauthorized video from appearing on the hugely popular site.

The company was now asking YouTube to take the clips down, but stopped short of filing a lawsuit.

Under federal copyright law, online services such as YouTube are generally immune from liability as long as it responds to takedown requests such as these, which YouTube often does. Less clear legally is what happens when another user posts the same video, something commonly done on the free video-sharing site.

A spokesman for YouTube didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

In November, YouTube agreed to delete nearly 30,000 files after the Japan Society for Rights of Authors, Composers and Publishers complained of copyright infringement.

Some media companies such as CBS and General Electric's NBC Universal have made deals to allow YouTube to use video clips from their programming, but others have yet to agree with the site over ways to get compensated for the use of their copyrighted material.

Universal Music Group, a division of French telecommunications giant Vivendi SA, had threatened to sue YouTube for copyright infringement, saying it was a hub for pirated music videos, but later reached a licensing deal with them last year.

Despite Viacom's problems with YouTube, the company's MTV Networks division reached a licensing deal last year with Google that allows the search company's video service to use clips from MTV and its sibling networks under a revenue-sharing agreement.

Equity Endorses Blackstone Bid (WP/BLOOM)

Bloomberg News

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Board Rejects Vornado's Larger Offer in Takeover Attempt

Equity Office Properties Trust, the target of the largest real estate takeover, yesterday rejected a $41 billion offer from Vornado Realty Trust, saying a $38.3 billion cash bid by Blackstone Group L.P. is less risky for shareholders.

Equity Office said a sale to New York-based Vornado would take months to complete, while a buyout by Blackstone would close within days. Given the time delay, Equity Office put the value of Vornado's bid of $56 a share in cash and stock at $54.28 to $54.88. Blackstone's offer is $54 a share.

The stock closed yesterday at $55.38, up 23 cents a share.

Equity Office of Chicago postponed a vote on the Blackstone bid by two days to Feb. 7 to give shareholders time to review its stance on the Vornado offer, according to a statement filed yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission. If Blackstone's bid is approved, the purchase would be completed on or about Feb. 9.

The decision by the board of the biggest U.S. office landlord is a setback to Vornado chief executive Steven Roth, who first pursued the company in July. Now Blackstone's Stephen A. Schwarzman must win approval of Equity Office investors to complete the biggest leveraged buyout ever and gain 543 buildings across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0127915

Equity Office's board said in its SEC filing that Vornado's offer "fails to adequately compensate Equity Office shareholders for the increased risk when compared to the Blackstone transaction, whose closing conditions have largely been satisfied."

The board "unanimously voted to reaffirm its recommendation" of Blackstone's bid, Equity Office said.

Equity Office said that even though four Vornado shareholders holding 7 percent to 9 percent of Vornado stock indicated they would approve the sale, Equity Office is still concerned that shareholders will reject the transaction.

Proxy adviser Glass, Lewis & Co. recommended that investors vote against the Blackstone bid. Vornado's offer is "financially superior" and allows shareholders to continue to own "important office property assets," the proxy adviser said in a report.

Lawsuit Targets Dell, Intel (MERCN)

By Therese Poletti

The San Jose Mercury News, February 3, 2007

Intel's program of rebates to its computer-making customers has come under serious fire again, this time in a massive class-action complaint claiming the chip giant's rebates to Dell inflated the troubled computer maker's profits by $800 million a year.

A 252-page lawsuit was filed against Dell in federal court in Austin, contending that Dell did not disclose the rebates -- which the suit also called kickback payments -- from Intel. The suit claims that Dell's reported profits were propped up by about $800 million a year by rebates Intel paid to Dell in return for exclusively using Intel chips in its computers.

The suit was filed by a well-known law firm, Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, on behalf some Dell shareholders, including Amalgamated Bank.

Until last year, Dell was the only computer maker to solely use chips developed by Intel. While most PC and computer server makers have been using chips developed by Intel archrival Advanced Micro Devices, Dell was a major holdout. Last year, it began to use AMD chips.

The suit was filed Wednesday, the same day founder Michael Dell said he was returning as chief executive after Kevin Rollins resigned. The company's chief financial officer, James Schneider, stepped down in December and was replaced by board member Donald Carty.

Dell officials did not return calls seeking comment. But Chuck Mulloy, a spokesman for Intel in Santa Clara, said that upon a preliminary review of the suit, ``Some of the allegations with respect to Intel appear to be completely made up.'' Mulloy noted that the suit rehashes some of the allegations already put forth in an antitrust lawsuit filed against it in June 2005 by AMD.

``It is very thoroughly investigated,'' said Bill Lerach, one of the founding partners of Lerach Coughlin in San Diego.

The suit contends that Dell's direct business model was not operating successfully or creating the strong operating margins that the company was reporting. ``In truth, Dell's financial results were being falsified,'' the suit claimed. It also contended that Dell's results were ``temporarily inflated'' by large cost cuts, improper accounting tricks and ``its secret receipt of some $200 million per quarter in rebate/kickback payments from Intel in return for exclusively purchasing Intel microprocessors/chips.''

The suit named as defendants 16 current and former Dell executives, including Randy Mott, who is now executive vice president and chief information officer at Hewlett-Packard. Intel is also named as a defendant, as is Dell's accounting firm, PricewaterhouseCoopers.

``We conduct discounting based on volume purchase, just like every other semiconductor supplier,'' said Mulloy of Intel. ``We are going to move very quickly'' to respond, he added.

The suit even contends that there were several meetings to discuss how Dell would receive the so-called e-CAP dollars from Intel, how the rebates would be spread out and how Dell would account for them. The suit said these meetings typically took place ``behind closed doors at the top executive level,'' and participants included Dell, Rollins and former Intel Chairman Andy Grove.

The suit seeks to represent others who purchased Dell's stock from Feb. 13, 2003, to Sept. 8, 2006.

Dell Accused Of Hiding Intel Payments (AP)

By David Koenig, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

A new class-action lawsuit claims that computer maker Dell Inc. inflated profits with secret payments of about $1 billion a year from chip maker Intel Corp.

The lawsuit was filed Wednesday, the same day the company announced that founder Michael S. Dell would return to the chief executive's role amid more disappointing financial news.

DOJ_NMG_0127916

Filed in U.S. District Court in Austin, the lawsuit also claimed that Dell concealed problems in accounting and product quality from shareholders while company executives reaped $3.3 billion from selling their stock.

Dell spokesman Dwayne Cox declined comment Friday on the lawsuit and wouldn't say whether the company had received payments from Intel.

A spokesman for Intel, which was also named as a defendant, said the company had done nothing wrong and vowed to fight the lawsuit. He said that some of the charges "appear to have been completely made up" and that Intel payments to Dell were legal.

"It's pricing. It's discounting," said the Intel spokesman, Chuck Mulloy. "It's a normal business practice. Our business practices are both fair and lawful."

Mulloy declined to describe the payments to Dell, saying it was a private matter of pricing with a customer. He said the company had not been contacted by securities regulators or federal prosecutors.

The case was filed by the class-action firm of lawsuit firm of Lerach, Coughlin, Stoia, Geller, Rudman & Robbins LLP on behalf of two institutional investors.

Mary Blasy, one of the lawyers who filed the lawsuit, said in an interview that the plaintiffs don't claim that the payments were illegal. Rather, she said, they believed Dell cheated investors by concealing the payments, which the company didn't control and gave a false picture of Dell's financial strength.

The lawsuit charges that Dell got the Intel payments "for shipping only Intel-based products and not doing business with AMD," Advanced Micro Devices Inc. Dell began using chips from Intel's rival last year.

The payments to Dell were mentioned in an ongoing antitrust lawsuit that AMD filed against Intel in 2005. The Lerach law firm learned the size of the payments from Dell insiders, Blasy said.

The lawsuit named as defendants Dell and 16 current and former officials; Intel; and Dell's accounting firm, PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP. It seeks class-action status for investors who bought Dell stock from February 2003 to September 2006.

Other lawyers continue to file securities lawsuits against Round Rock-based Dell, whose shares have lost nearly half their value in the past two years while stock of rival PC maker Hewlett-Packard Co. doubled. Dell shares fell 28 cents, or 1.18 percent, to close at $23.52 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Last week, lawyers for a Maryland investor filed a lawsuit in the same Austin court on behalf of Dell. The derivative lawsuit charged that Michael Dell, former CEO Kevin Rollins and other executives with unjust enrichment and gross mismanagement.

Both the recent lawsuits claim that Dell executives pushed the stock to artificially high levels by making false statements about the company's operations dating to early 2003. They said Dell leaders withheld knowledge about such problems as faulty laptop computer batteries that were later recalled and a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation of Dell.

The lawsuits come at a tumultuous time for Dell. This week, Michael Dell stepped back into the CEO's role that he had turned over to Rollins in 2004. The same day, Dell said it expects fourth-quarter sales and earnings to be below Wall Street estimates.

Dell has been losing market share to rivals and failing to meet Wall Street's expectations for higher earnings. The company's image was also battered in August by the voluntary recall of 4.2 million laptop batteries made by Sony Corp (NYSE:SNE - news). and the disclosure of an ongoing SEC probe into accounting issues.

Delta Creditors' Committee Approves Terms Of $2.5 Billion In Bankruptcy Exit Financing (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

(AP) - ATLANTA-Lawyers for Delta Air Lines Inc., the third-largest U.S. carrier, said Friday in court papers that the company's creditors' committee has approved the terms of the $2.5 billion (â‚¬1.9 billion) in financing that Delta has secured to emerge from bankruptcy protection.

The disclosure was made as Delta amended its reorganization plan for a second time. Other technical changes also were made to the plan, which was first filed Dec. 19 and amended on Jan. 19.

Delta's chief bankruptcy lawyer, Marshall Huebner, said the official unsecured creditors' committee's support of the exit financing is a "tremendous milestone for us as we move toward exiting Chapter 11 under our standalone plan."

The filing also provided a few new details of the behind-the-scenes discussions in recent weeks by Delta's board regarding US Airways' now withdrawn $9.8 billion hostile takeover bid.

Delta's board discussed US Airways' revised proposal several times before US Airways withdrew the bid on Wednesday, including that day. The board took no action.

DOJ_NMG_0127917

"Given the withdrawal, no further action by the Delta board regarding the revised US Airways proposal is contemplated," Friday's court filing by Delta's lawyers says.

Tempe, Arizona-based US Airways Group Inc. withdrew its bid for Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines Inc. after Delta's official committee of unsecured creditors said it supports Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy protection in the spring as a standalone carrier, thus rejected US Airways' merger offer.

US Airways had wanted to postpone a Feb. 7 bankruptcy hearing involving the disclosure statement to Delta's reorganization plan. But the hearing will go forward. If the disclosure statement is approved, Delta can begin soliciting votes to approve its reorganization plan.

Several creditors have objected to the disclosure statement, but Delta's lawyers are currently working to resolve those objections.

Delta is hoping to hold a confirmation hearing on its reorganization plan in April.

Delta has estimated it will be worth $9.4 billion (â‚¬7.22 billion) to $12 billion (â‚¬9.22 billion) if it emerges from Chapter 11 as a standalone company. That valuation did not change in the amended reorganization plan filed Friday.

On the Net:

Delta Air Lines: http://www.delta.com

MediaNews Acquires Santa Cruz Sentinel (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

DENVER - MediaNews Group Inc. said Friday that it has acquired the Santa Cruz Sentinel from Community Newspaper Holdings Inc.

MediaNews, with 56 daily publications, said the California Newspapers Partnership -- which is majority-owned by MediaNews -- acquired the Sentinel, a daily.

MediaNews funded its share of the purchase through a revolving credit agreement. Gannett Co. and SF Holding Corp., the other partners, contributed their share of the purchase price. Financial terms were not disclosed.

Dean Singleton, MediaNews' chief executive officer, said the Santa Cruz newspaper will bolster the company's reach in California. "The Santa Cruz Sentinel is a fine newspaper today but will be strengthened by the resources of our existing newspapers," he said.

MediaNews, which owns the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers, acquired the Monterey County Herald, San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. last year. The complex $1 billion deal included $300 million in financing from the Hearst Corp., owner of the San Francisco Chronicle. The deal between MediaNews and Hearst is the subject of a federal antitrust lawsuit filed by a San Francisco businessman.

MediaNews is the nation's fourth-largest newspaper company, with 56 daily newspapers and about 120 nondaily publications in 13 states.

Judge: Microsoft Can Question Expert Who Found Violation (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 3, 2007

The computer expert who said he found evidence that Microsoft is violating a federal consent decree can be interviewed by Microsoft lawyers for up to five hours, Polk County District Court Judge Scott Rosenberg has ruled.

The expert, Andrew Schulman, is a witness for Iowa consumers suing Microsoft for anti-trust violations and up to $330 million in damages.

The consent decree ended a federal anti-trust case against Microsoft several years ago.

Schulman reportedly found evidence it was being violated while digging through mountains of secret computer code that is used to drive Microsoft products.

Microsoft lawyers had already questioned Schulman for seven hours in an earlier deposition, but he reported the violation after that testimony. His report caused Microsoft lawyers to ask for permission to question Schulman again before he testifies in court.

Lawyers on the other side resisted, requiring the ruling from Judge Rosenberg.

UPDATE: Analyst Sees Express Scripts Winning Caremark With Sweetened Bid (DOW)

Dow Jones, February 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127918

SAN FRANCISCO (Dow Jones) - Express Scripts Inc. is expected to triumph in its bidding war with CVS Corp. for pharmacy benefit manager Caremark Rx Inc. with a sweetened offer price, one industry analyst concluded after conducting a survey of Caremark and CVS clients.

"Absent a significant external event (pressure from Congress, material adverse change in the industry) or a stronger sales pitch from Caremark-CVS (entirely possible), we expect Express Scripts (ESRX) will acquire Caremark (CMX) at a higher price," Cowen & Co. analyst Kemp Dolliver wrote in a research note Friday. He assumed a $3-a-share increase to Express Scripts' current offer, to roughly $62 a share.

"We continue to think that Express Scripts has the upper hand in the competition for Caremark," Dolliver said. "Our survey indicates that Caremark's and CVS' clients share the same uncertainty over the deal as the investment community."

Dolliver subsequently reiterated an outperform rating on Express Scripts shares.

Caremark in November agreed to a so-called "merger of equals" with retail drugstore chain CVS Corp. (CVS) in a deal that would give Caremark shareholders 1.67 shares of CVS share for each share held.The following month, Express Scripts launched a competing, hostile $26 billion cash-and-stock bid for its larger PBM rival which, at the time, represented a 15% premium over CVS' offer.

The Caremark-CVS bid was sweetened in January with a $2 a share onetime dividend.

PBMs provide prescription services to health-benefit-plan sponsors, employers, managed-care organizations and others, dispensing prescriptions through a network of retail pharmacies and their own mail-order service. Some retail pharmacies, CVS included, operate their own mail-order services, but they primarily fill prescriptions in stores.

As healthcare costs continue to rise, so does pressure to keep retail drug prices low. Though the market has shown it understands how the Caremark-CVS deal would benefit CVS, noted Cowen's Dolliver, by reducing exposure to cannibalization from the mail-order channel and offering the potential to attract more foot traffic, it is much less sure of the benefits for Caremark. " Both management teams have touted the potential benefits for customers, but we and the market view them as insignificant competitively," Dolliver wrote.

CVS and Caremark have also cited antitrust concerns as one of the top reasons to reject the competing offer from Express Scripts. Caremark is the largest PBM on a market capitalization basis and figures among the nation's three biggest, along with Express Scripts and Medco Health Solutions Inc. (MHS) . CVS is the second-largest drugstore chain in the U.S.

But Dolliver, who surveyed benefit managers and senior executives from 124 employers that use either CVS or Caremark as their PBM, said "very few" of them share the antitrust concerns.

"The majority of respondents are undecided, but only one of the eight Caremark clients with drug spending of $100 million or higher expressed any concern," Dolliver wrote. "This data confirms our view that the Federal Trade Commission should clear Express Scripts' offer after a brief review."

Express Scripts earlier this week said it would withdraw and subsequently refile its antitrust filing in connection with its bid in an attempt to get FTC approval without the need for a second request for information.

The CVS deal has already been given the green light by the FTC. Caremark shareholders are set to vote on it Feb. 20, and CVS shareholders will cast their votes Feb. 23. Both companies have said they expect to complete the deal by March if shareholders approve the proposal.

Shares of Express Scripts were changing hands for $70.11 in midday trading, up 21 cents. Caremark shares were down 20 cents, at $60.50, while shares of CVS were off by 16 cents, at $33.13.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Scientists Dispel Global Warming Doubts (FT)

By Fiona Harvey

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

The world's leading climate scientists on Friday swept away the last doubts surrounding global warming, saying they were certain human activities were altering the climate and warning severe effects were inevitable unless greenhouse gas emissions were curbed.

The evidence for climate change caused by fossil fuel combustion was "unequivocal", said the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, a body comprising 2,500 climate experts convened by the UN.

Their report predicted severe heatwaves, droughts, storms and floods resulting from an expected rise of 3 degrees Celsius in average global temperatures by 2100. It will be difficult for governments to ignore because it was agreed by all UN members, including the US and China.

DOJ_NMG_0127919

Six years in the making, the report is the most authoritative ever produced on climate change and will form the basis for negotiations on a possible successor to the Kyoto treaty, the main provisions of which expire in 2012.

Rajendra Pachauri, chairman of the IPCC, said: “You can see [from the report] what the costs of inaction are. Everything is [included in the report] by consensus, so the implication is that it has the stamp of acceptance by all governments in the world.”

Yvo de Boer, secretary-general of the UN climate change secretariat, said work should now begin on a successor treaty to Kyoto that would include obligations on developed countries to cut carbon dioxide emissions and incentives for poor countries to limit theirs.

Stavros Dimas, the European Union’s environment commissioner, called the IPCC’s findings “a grim report” and urged governments to agree to the European Commission’s proposal of reducing emissions by 30 per cent by 2020.

Jacques Chirac, French president, proposed a new worldwide environmental organisation under the UN, to spearhead action on emissions.

But the report met a cool reception from the US government. Sharon Hays, leader of the US delegation in Paris and deputy director of the White House office of science and technology policy, said: “This summary for policymakers captures and summarises the current state of climate science research and will serve as a valuable source of information for policymakers.”

The US is the world’s biggest emitter of greenhouse gases and has rejected the Kyoto treaty.

Achim Steiner, director-general of the UN Environment Programme, said in the light of the report’s findings, it would be “irresponsible” to resist or seek to delay actions on mandatory emissions cuts.

Climate Paper Prompts Call To Act (BBC)

BBC.com, February 3, 2007

Governments around the world have called for urgent action to tackle climate change, after a major report said mankind was very likely the cause.

The EU said it was the starkest warning yet, while the UK said climate change threatened world peace and prosperity.

The US administration said the report was "valuable", but rejected mandatory controls to reduce greenhouse gases.

The report, by more than 2,000 top scientists, says world temperatures could increase by 3C by 2100.

The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) also projected that sea levels were most likely to rise by 28-43cm, and said global warming was likely to influence the intensity of tropical storms.

The findings are the first of four IPCC reports to be published this year.

'Serious negotiation'

EU Environment Commissioner Stavros Dimas said he was now deeply concerned by the accelerating pace of climate change.

"It is now more urgent than ever that the international community gets down to serious negotiations on a comprehensive new worldwide agreement to stop global warming," he said.

UK Environment Secretary David Milliband said that international political commitment, which had so far been lacking, was now needed.

South Africa's Environmental Affairs Minister Marthinus van Schalkwyk said failure to act would be "indefensible".

And officials from Indonesia and the Maldives said they feared for the future of their countries, both threatened by rising sea levels.

US Energy Secretary Sam Bodman said he accepted the conclusions of the scientists.

How computers model climate

"We're very pleased with it. We're embracing it. We agree with it," he said.

"Human activity is contributing to changes in our Earth's climate and that issue is no longer up for debate."

But he said that a unilateral US programme to cut emissions might damage the US economy and send business overseas.

Meanwhile the head of the Senate Environment Committee, Barbara Boxer, called on Mr Bush to show "real leadership" on the issue of climate change.

"I'm calling on the president to convene a summit at the White House of the 12 largest global warming emitters," she said, adding that she would bring the IPCC scientists to brief the Senate in the next few weeks.

The US contributes around one-quarter of the world's greenhouse gas emissions.

Strong language

The report, produced by a team tasked with assessing the science of climate change, was intended to be the definitive summary of climatic shifts facing the world in the coming years.

The agency said that it would use stronger language to assess humanity's influence on climatic change than it had previously done.

DOJ_NMG_0127920

In 2001, it said that it was "likely" that human activities lay behind the trends observed at various parts of the planet; "likely" in IPCC terminology means between 66% and 90% probability.

Now, the panel concluded that it was at least 90% certain that human emissions of greenhouse gases rather than natural variations are warming the planet's surface.

U.N. Climate Panel Says Warming Is Man-Made (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

An international panel of climate scientists said yesterday that there is an overwhelming probability that human activities are warming the planet at a dangerous rate, with consequences that could soon take decades or centuries to reverse.

The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, made up of hundreds of scientists from 113 countries, said that based on new research over the last six years, it is 90 percent certain that human-generated greenhouse gases account for most of the global rise in temperatures over the past half-century.

Declaring that "warming of the climate system is unequivocal," the authors said in their "Summary for Policymakers" that even in the best-case scenario, temperatures are on track to cross a threshold to an unsustainable level. A rise of more than 3.6 degrees Fahrenheit above pre-industrial levels would cause global effects -- such as massive species extinctions and melting of ice sheets -- that could be irreversible within a human lifetime. Under the most conservative IPCC scenario, the increase will be 4.5 degrees by 2100.

Richard Somerville, a distinguished professor at the Scripps Institution of Oceanography and one of the lead authors, said the world would have to undertake "a really massive reduction in emissions," on the scale of 70 to 80 percent, to avert severe global warming.

The scientists wrote that it is "very likely" that hot days, heat waves and heavy precipitation will become more frequent in the years to come, and "likely" that future tropical hurricanes and typhoons will become more intense. Arctic sea ice will disappear "almost entirely" by the end of the century, they said, and snow cover will contract worldwide.

While the summary did not produce any groundbreaking observations -- it reflects a massive distillation of the peer-reviewed literature through the middle of 2006 -- it represents the definitive international scientific and political consensus on climate science. It provides much more definitive conclusions than the panel's previous report in 2001, which said only that it was "likely" -- meaning between 66 and 90 percent probability on a scale the panel adopted -- that human activity accounted for the warming recorded over the past 50 years.

Some of the report's most compelling sections focused on future climate changes, because the buildup of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere would exert an effect even if industrialized countries stopped emitting greenhouse gases tomorrow. Gerald Meehl, a senior scientist at the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo., who helped oversee the chapter on climate projections, said that in the next two decades alone, global temperatures will rise by 0.7 degrees Fahrenheit.

"We're committed to a certain amount of warming," said Meehl, who worked with 16 computer-modeling teams from 11 countries. "A lot of these changes continue through the 21st century and become more severe as time goes on."

Meehl added, however, that a sharp cut in greenhouse gas emissions could still keep catastrophic consequences from occurring: "The message is, it does make a difference what we do."

For the first time, IPCC scientists also looked at regional climate shifts in detail, concluding that precipitation in the American Southwest will decline as summer temperatures rise, just as precipitation in the Northeast will increase. Linda Mearns -- another NCAR senior scientist who was also one of the lead authors -- said these changes could cause water shortages and affect recreational activities in the Southwest. Developing countries in Africa and elsewhere could also experience severe droughts.

Governments and scientific organizations across the globe nominate scientists to produce and review the IPCC assessment without pay under the auspices of the United Nations. A group of key authors and government officials met in Paris this week to finalize the document, which reflects three years of work.

"Every government in the world signed off on this document, including the U.S.," said World Bank chief scientist Robert T. Watson, who chaired the last round of deliberations. Watson added that compared with the 2001 report, "the difference is now they have more confidence in what they're doing."

The authors concluded that Earth's average temperature will increase between 3.2 and 7.8 degrees Fahrenheit over the next century, while sea levels will rise between seven and 23 inches.

IPCC scientists also said that global warming will not trigger a shutdown within the next 100 years of the North Atlantic ocean current that keeps Northern Europe temperate, though they do not predict whether it might occur in future centuries. In a similar vein, the authors said they did not have sophisticated enough computer models to project how much melting of the Greenland ice sheet would boost sea levels over the next century, but they suggested that over several centuries the ice sheet's disappearance could raise sea levels by a devastating 23 feet.

DOJ_NMG_0127921

Bush administration officials said yesterday that they welcomed the report and emphasized that U.S. research funding helped underpin its conclusions. National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration Administrator Conrad C. Lautenbacher Jr., who oversees much of the nation's climate research, said in an interview that the international assessment will lead to "a more objective and informative public debate."

But environmental advocates said the White House -- which remains opposed to mandatory limits on U.S. carbon emissions -- is making a mistake in assuming research and technological advances alone will address global warming.

"The administration's proposals are at least a decade away," said Angela Anderson, vice president for climate programs at the National Environmental Trust. "The promise of better technologies tomorrow shouldn't stop us from doing what we can today."

House and Senate Democratic leaders back a cap on greenhouse gases and hope to enact such legislation this year; next week, several of the report's authors are to testify in congressional hearings.

In an interview yesterday, House Science and Technology Committee Chairman Bart Gordon (D-Tenn.) called the report "a unanimous, definitive world statement" on climate change that, if anything, was too conservative. "It's time to end the debate and act," Gordon said. "All the naysayers should step aside."

Some critics, however, question the push for nationwide limits on emissions from power plants, automobiles and other industrial sources. At the George C. Marshall Institute, a think tank that receives funding from Exxon Mobil, chief executive William O'Keefe and President Jeff Kueter issued a statement urging "great caution in reading too much" into the report until the panel releases its detailed scientific documentation a few months from now.

"Claims being made that a climate catastrophe later this century is more certain are unjustified," they said, adding that "the underlying state of knowledge does not justify scare tactics or provide sufficient support for proposals . . . to suppress energy use and impose large economic burdens on the U.S. economy."

Science Panel Says Global Warming Is "Unequivocal" (NYT)

By Elisabeth Rosenthal, Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 2 — In a grim and powerful assessment of the future of the planet, the leading international network of climate scientists has concluded for the first time that global warming is “unequivocal” and that human activity is the main driver, “very likely” causing most of the rise in temperatures since 1950.

They said the world was in for centuries of climbing temperatures, rising seas and shifting weather patterns — unavoidable results of the buildup of heat-trapping gases in the atmosphere.

But their report, released here on Friday by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, said warming and its harmful consequences could be substantially blunted by prompt action.

While the report provided scant new evidence of a climate apocalypse now, and while it expressly avoided recommending courses of action, officials from the United Nations agencies that created the panel in 1988 said it spoke of the urgent need to limit looming and momentous risks.

“In our daily lives we all respond urgently to dangers that are much less likely than climate change to affect the future of our children,” said Achim Steiner, executive director of the United Nations Environment Program, which administers the panel along with the World Meteorological Organization.

“Feb. 2 will be remembered as the date when uncertainty was removed as to whether humans had anything to do with climate change on this planet,” he went on. “The evidence is on the table.”

The report is the panel’s fourth assessment since 1990 on the causes and consequences of climate change, but it is the first in which the group asserts with near certainty — more than 90 percent confidence — that carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases from human activities have been the main causes of warming in the past half century.

In its last report, in 2001, the panel, consisting of hundreds of scientists and reviewers, said the confidence level for its projections was “likely,” or 66 to 90 percent. That level has now been raised to “very likely,” better than 90 percent. Both reports are online at www.ipcc.ch.

The Bush administration, which until recently avoided directly accepting that humans were warming the planet in potentially harmful ways, embraced the findings, which had been approved by representatives from the United States and 112 other countries on Thursday night.

DOJ_NMG_0127922

Administration officials asserted Friday that the United States had played a leading role in studying and combating climate change, in part by an investment of an average of almost $5 billion a year for the past six years in research and tax incentives for new technologies.

At the same time, Secretary of Energy Samuel Bodman rejected the idea of unilateral limits on emissions. "We are a small contributor to the overall, when you look at the rest of the world, so it's really got to be a global solution," he said.

The United States, with about 5 percent of the world's population, contributes about a quarter of greenhouse gas emissions, more than any other country.

Democratic lawmakers quickly fired off a round of news releases using the report to bolster a fresh flock of proposed bills aimed at cutting emissions of greenhouse gases. Senator James M. Inhofe, the Oklahoma Republican who has called the idea of dangerous human-driven warming a hoax, issued a news release headed "Corruption of Science" that rejected the report as "a political document."

The new report says the global climate is likely to warm 3.5 to 8 degrees Fahrenheit if carbon dioxide concentrations in the atmosphere reach twice the levels of 1750, before the Industrial Revolution.

Many energy and environment experts see such a doubling, or worse, as a foregone conclusion after 2050 unless there is a prompt and sustained shift away from the 20th-century pattern of unfettered burning of coal and oil, the main sources of carbon dioxide, and an aggressive expansion of nonpolluting sources of energy.

And the report says there is a more than a 1-in-10 chance of much greater warming, a risk that many experts say is far too high to ignore.

Even a level of warming that falls in the middle of the group's range of projections would be likely to cause significant stress to ecosystems, according to many climate experts and biologists. And it would alter longstanding climate patterns that shape water supplies and agricultural production.

Moreover, the warming has set in motion a rise in global sea levels, the report says. It forecasts a rise of 7 to 23 inches by 2100 and concludes that seas will continue to rise for at least 1,000 years to come. By comparison, seas rose about 6 to 9 inches in the 20th century.

John P. Holdren, an energy and climate expert at Harvard, said the report "powerfully underscores the need for a massive effort to slow the pace of global climatic disruption before intolerable consequences become inevitable."

"Since 2001, there has been a torrent of new scientific evidence on the magnitude, human origins and growing impacts of the climatic changes that are under way," said Mr. Holdren, who is the president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. "In overwhelming proportions, this evidence has been in the direction of showing faster change, more danger and greater confidence about the dominant role of fossil-fuel burning and tropical deforestation in causing the changes that are being observed."

The conclusions came after a three-year review of hundreds of studies of past climate shifts; observations of retreating ice, warming and rising seas, and other changes around the planet; and a greatly expanded suite of supercomputer simulations used to test how the earth will respond to a growing blanket of gases that hold heat in the atmosphere.

The section released Friday was a 20-page summary for policymakers, which was approved early in the morning by teams of officials from more than 100 countries after three days and nights of wrangling over wording with the lead authors, all of whom are scientists.

It described far-flung ramifications for both humans and nature.

"It is very likely that hot extremes, heat waves and heavy precipitation events will continue to become more frequent," said the summary.

Generally, the scientists said, more precipitation will fall at higher latitudes, which are also likely to see lengthened growing seasons. Semi-arid subtropical regions, already chronically plagued by drought, could have a further 20 percent drop in rainfall under the panel's midrange outlook for increases in the greenhouse gases.

The summary added a new chemical consequence of the buildup of carbon dioxide to the list of mainly climatic and biological effects foreseen in its previous reports: a drop in the pH of seawater as oceans absorb billions of tons of carbon dioxide, which forms carbonic acid when partly dissolved. The ocean would stay alkaline, but marine biologists have said that a change in the direction of acidity could imperil some kinds of corals and plankton.

The report essentially caps a half-century-long effort to discern whether humans, through the buildup of carbon dioxide and other gases released mainly by burning fuels and forests, could influence the earth's climate system in potentially momentous ways.

The group operates under the aegis of the United Nations and was chartered in 1988 — a year of record heat, burning forests and the first big headlines about global warming — to provide regular reviews of climate science to governments to inform policy choices.

DOJ_NMG_0127923

Government officials are involved in shaping the summary of each report, but the scientist-authors, who are unpaid, have the final say over the thousands of pages in four underlying technical reports that will be completed and published later this year.

Big questions remain about the speed and extent of some impending changes, both because of uncertainty about future population and pollution trends and the complex interrelationships of the greenhouse emissions, clouds, dusty kinds of pollution, the oceans and earth's veneer of life, which both emits and soaks up carbon dioxide and other such gases.

But a broad array of scientists, including authors of the report and independent experts, said the latest analysis was the most sobering view yet of a century of transition — after thousands of years of relatively stable climate conditions — to a new norm of continual change.

Should greenhouse gases continue to accumulate in the atmosphere at even a moderate pace, average temperatures by the end of the century could match those last seen 125,000 years ago, in the previous warm spell between ice ages, the report said.

At that time, the panel said, sea levels were 12 to 20 feet higher than they are now. Much of that extra water is now trapped in the ice sheets of Greenland and Antarctica, which are eroding in some places.

The panel said there was no solid scientific understanding of how rapidly the vast stores of ice in polar regions will melt, so their estimates on new sea levels were based mainly on how much the warmed oceans will expand, and not on contributions from the melting of ice now on land.

Other scientists have recently reported evidence that the glaciers and ice sheets in the Arctic and Antarctic could flow seaward far more quickly than estimated in the past, and they have proposed that the risks to coastal areas could be much more imminent. But the climate change panel is forbidden by its charter to enter into speculation, and so could not include such possible instabilities in its assessment.

Michel Jarraud, the secretary general of the United Nations World Meteorological Organization, said the lack of clarity should offer no one comfort. "The speed with which melting ice sheets are raising sea levels is uncertain, but the report makes clear that sea levels will rise inexorably over the coming centuries," he said. "It is a question of when and how much, and not if."

The warming and other climate changes will be highly variable around the world, with the Arctic in particular seeing much higher temperatures, said Susan Solomon, the co-leader of the team writing the summary and the section of the panel's report on basic science. She is an atmospheric scientist for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

The kinds of vulnerabilities are very much dependent on where you are, Dr. Solomon said in a telephone interview. "If you're living in parts of the tropics and they're getting drier and you're a farmer, there are some very acute issues associated with even small changes in rainfall — changes we're already seeing are significant," she said. "If you are an Inuit and you're seeing your sea ice retreating already, that's affecting your life style and culture."

The 20-page summary is a sketch of the findings that are most germane to the public and world leaders.

The full report, thousands of pages of technical background, will be released in four sections through the year — the first on basic science, then sections on impacts and options for limiting emissions and limiting inevitable harms, and finally a synthesis of all of the findings near year's end.

In a news conference in Paris, Dr. Solomon declined to provide her own views on how society should respond to the momentous changes projected in the study.

"I honestly believe that it would be a much better service for me to keep my personal opinions separate than what I can actually offer the world as a scientist," she said. "My stepson, who is 29, has an utterly different view of risks than I do. People are going to have to make their own judgments."

Some authors of the report said that no one could honestly point to any remaining uncertainties as justification for further delay.

"Policy makers paid us to do good science, and now we have very high scientific confidence in this work — this is real, this is real, this is real," said Richard B. Alley, one of the lead authors and a professor at Pennsylvania State University. "So now act, the ball's back in your court."

UN Report Predicts Global Warming Effects In U.S. (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Global warming is "very likely" a human-caused problem that will last for centuries and require concerted international action to reduce its potentially devastating impacts, a United Nations panel of climate experts declared Friday in a landmark report.

Now the question is whether the bleak report will change the politics of global warming in the U.S. and lead to a more united effort to deal with the problem—and for the moment, that appears uncertain.

DOJ_NMG_0127924

The Bush administration embraced the report but rejected demands for a mandatory system of capping "greenhouse gas" emissions, such as carbon dioxide. Instead, the administration said President Bush would rely on his plans to develop more renewable fuel and require more efficient vehicles.

But with Democrats controlling Congress, pressure is apt to build on the White House to take a tougher approach. More than half a dozen bills—some of them bipartisan—have been presented to Congress calling for mandatory caps on emissions, though the administration said they would hurt the economy and not effectively deal with the problem.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said, "President Bush should immediately work with Congress to pass legislation that requires reductions in the emissions of greenhouse gases, and he should call together the leaders of the world to obtain their binding commitment to reducing pollution around the globe."

The report by the UN's Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change struck a chord of urgency as it warned of rising sea levels, more powerful storms and rapidly shifting weather patterns, including floods and droughts, resulting from a warming of the planet that it said could last a thousand years.

The scientists from 113 countries said they are now 90 percent confident that global warming is caused by mankind, in contrast with a 2001 report in which they said they were 60 to 90 percent confident.

Achim Steiner, executive director of the UN Environment Program, said the focus should shift from the cause of global warming "to what on Earth are we going to do about it. The public should not sit back and say, `There's nothing we can do.'"

"Warming of the planet is unequivocal," the 21-page report concluded, "as is now evident from observations of global average air and ocean temperatures, widespread melting of snow and ice, and rising global mean sea level."

In effect, the panel said governments and people cannot prevent the planet from warming but that steps can be taken to stem the projected increases.

The panel forecast global temperature increases of 2 to 11.5 degrees Fahrenheit by the year 2100 but added that its best estimate was for a rise of 3.2 to 7.1 degrees. Warming during the 21st Century would "very likely be larger" than that of the 20th Century, the report said.

Some scientists question such conclusions about global warming.

Patrick Michaels, a scholar at the CATO Institute, a Washington libertarian think tank, said that "it is not news to say that human beings are responsible for much of the warming in the late 20th Century."

But Michaels said the report was not as alarming as portrayed. He cited a prediction by the panel that sea levels would rise by a modest 7 to 23 inches by the end of the century and noted that this was slightly less than the panel reported in 2001.

"What this report does is place this very small but very widely quoted group of alarmists—who are talking about 20 feet of sea-rise—far, far beyond the fringes [of environmental science]," he said.

But the report, as well as Bush administration officials, said the relatively modest increases in the sea level do not take into account the recent increased rate of ice melting in Greenland and Antarctica.

"[The sea-rise prediction in the report] is less," Stephen Johnson, administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, told reporters. "But we believe there are other effects that haven't been taken into account yet."

The report said an additional 3.9 to 7.98 inches of sea-level rise are possible if the recent melting of polar ice sheets continues at its recent rate.

Joseph Romm, an assistant secretary of energy in the Clinton administration, said in an interview that if the rate of recent ice loss from Greenland and Antarctica continues, there would be a dramatic rise in sea levels that would devastate coastlines around the world.

Romm, author of a book on global warming, called the report "very solid and alarming." He said a "hidden bombshell" in the report is a finding that as the Earth grows hotter, the less the soil is able to absorb carbon. That would lead to an acceleration of greenhouse gases, he said, and could be devastating to the ecosystem and to the economy.

"The key point is that it said humans are the most likely cause," Romm said. "If we are the main cause, we are the main solution. You can't endorse the report and not endorse strong action on climate change."

The Bush administration said it is already taking action. The White House noted that Bush has devoted nearly $29 billion to climate-related science, technology, international assistance and incentive programs since 2001.

Bush has spent nearly $9 billion on climate science research, "leading the world with unparalleled financial commitment," the White House said in a statement.

In his State of the Union speech last month, the president acknowledged that global warming is a problem and that he is taking steps to do something about it. But it has not been his top priority.

He refused to endorse the 1997 Kyoto agreement to create a mandatory system to cap carbon-dioxide emissions, saying it would harm the U.S. economy and wouldn't be effective because fast-developing countries like China and India are not abiding by it.

DOJ_NMG_0127925

During his first presidential campaign, he had pledged to regulate carbon dioxide emissions under the Clean Air Act, but he backtracked when he took office.

At the Energy Department on Friday, Secretary Samuel Bodman said the president has set an "aggressive" goal to cut greenhouse gas emissions by 18 percent by 2012, through increasing the supply of renewable fuels like ethanol and reforming the government's fuel economy standards for cars.

Bodman also called for a dramatic increase in nuclear-power generation here and around the world.

Deal With Warming, Don't Debate It, Scientists Warn (LAT)

By Thomas H. Maugh, Karen Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

A United Nations report released Friday that blames humans for the "runaway train" of global warming has abruptly shifted the international debate from "Are humans to blame?" to "What are we going to do about it?"

"The world's scientists have spoken," said Timothy E. Wirth, president of the United Nations Foundation. "It is time now to hear from the world's policymakers. The so-called and long-overstated 'debate' about global warming is now over."

The 21-page report, released in Paris by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, proposed no solutions. There is no world consensus on how best to bring about the radical restrictions in emissions that would be needed to mitigate global warming.

The most significant effort to reach a common solution was the 1997 Kyoto Protocol, which so far has not had much impact.

The report said that it was "unequivocal" that global warming was occurring and that it was at least 90% certain humans were responsible. It predicted temperatures would rise 3.2 to 7.2 degrees Fahrenheit by 2100 and that sea level would rise 7 to 23 inches, perhaps more.

If the Greenland ice sheet were to melt completely, it would lead to a 21-foot increase in sea level, forcing the relocation of more than 300 million people living in low-lying areas worldwide.

The report also said warming would continue even in the extremely unlikely event that global carbon dioxide could be stabilized at its current level. Such a stabilization would require an immediate 70% to 80% reduction in emissions, said Richard Somerville of the Scripps Institution of Oceanography in La Jolla.

Although most of the scientific data behind the report have come out before, their aggregation into a single report, phrased in the boldest of terms, sparked an intense reaction Friday.

"The degree of certainty, which was already very high, is now as close to certain as scientists are willing to say," said former Vice President Al Gore, a longtime champion of environmental issues whose documentary on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth," is nominated for two Oscars.

Echoing a phrase that was widely heard Friday, Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) called the report "a scientific smoking gun."

The warming would have a powerful impact on California and the Southwest, with hotter weather, less rainfall and a loss of water supply because of the diminishing snowpack in the Rocky Mountains.

Deflecting criticism

Bush administration officials downplayed the United States' contribution to global warming.

"We are a small contributor when you look at the rest of the world," Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman said in a Friday teleconference.

The U.S. is the single largest contributor to global warming, producing about a quarter of the world's carbon dioxide emissions even though it accounts for about 4.5% of its population.

China, with 20% of the world's population, produces 14.5% of global emissions.

The proportion of emissions contributed by the U.S. is decreasing, however, as developing nations, particularly China and India, build up their economies.

Though global warming cannot be reversed, it can be mitigated, said climatologist Gerald Meehl of the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo. If emissions are reduced, "we'll have fewer climate changes and less warming. If they are higher, we'll have much greater changes. The longer you wait to begin reducing emissions, the worse the problem gets and the more you have to do to do something about it."

The report is the fourth in a series compiled by 2,500 scientists from 130 nations. Although the projections in the report have not changed substantially from those of the last study, scientists' confidence in the assertions has increased sharply.

DOJ_NMG_0127926

Compiling the report has been a large international effort with 16 climate modeling groups from 11 countries working independently. "What's really striking … is that the models keep improving with time, but the answers don't keep changing," Meehl said. "That allows us to say with a lot more confidence what we are looking at."

And since the last report was issued, "we have six years of new data, and they are among the seven warmest years on record," said climatologist Kevin Trenberth of the National Center for Atmospheric Research.

The data show that the warmth of the last half century "is unusual in at least the previous 1,300 years," the report said, and the last time the polar regions were significantly warmer for an extended period was about 125,000 years ago. That warming was caused by changes in Earth's orbit and led to melting of the Greenland ice cap.

As warming continues, it will produce wide changes in regional climates, including: more droughts in the tropics and subtropics; more heat waves; fewer frosts; heavier rains, particularly in Canada, the U.S. Northeast and South America's eastern coast; a retreat of the polar ice caps; less snow cover in the Northern Hemisphere; less-saline ocean water because of the increased precipitation; and more intense hurricanes, though they won't become more frequent.

Sea level rises will cause flooding in low-lying areas, such as the island nation of Kiribati in the western Pacific Ocean, the southern tip of Florida and the lower half of Louisiana.

In Southern California, the modest rise in sea level forecast in the report would probably endanger beaches that are less than 100 feet wide, which account for more than half the state's coastline, said Reinhard Flick, an oceanographer with the California Department of Boating and Waterways.

"They are very likely to be lost if we see anything like a 1- to 3-foot rise in sea level," he said. "A lot of these beaches can be in trouble."

The average temperature in the Southland will probably increase by about 8 degrees by the end of the century and rainfall will decrease, according to climatologist Linda Mearns of the National Center for Atmospheric Research. What rain does fall will evaporate more quickly because of higher temperatures, accentuating the dryness of the climate.

The region's water supply will also be imperiled because in the Rocky Mountains, which provide much of the water for the Southwest, the snow season will be shorter and the snowpack diminished.

"Sections of this report read like the Book of Revelations," said Moira Chapin of Environment California.

Yvo de Boer, executive secretary of the U.N. Framework Convention on Climate Change, called for a summit of global leaders to address the problem. "The findings … leave no doubt as to the dangers that mankind is facing and must be acted upon without delay," he said.

French President Jacques Chirac echoed the call, saying, "Now is not the time for half measures…. We are in truth on the historical doorstep of the irreversible."

Curbing emissions

The only previous effort to reduce global emissions was the Kyoto Protocol, which proposed carbon dioxide emission caps for the 35 richest countries. The United States, where emissions are increasing about 1% a year, withdrew from the pact in 2001, contending it was unfair because it did not set limits for developing nations.

Bodman said Friday that the U.S. would not cap emissions because that would lead to a transfer of jobs and industries abroad. "You would have the U.S. economy damaged on the one hand, and the same emissions — in fact, potentially even worse emissions because in many of those countries they don't have the same kind of standards," he said.

Bodman also noted that the U.S. had spent $29 billion on global warming research, technology development and other initiatives — "more than the rest of the world combined."

Countries that agreed to the Kyoto pact are having trouble meeting its goals. Canada's emissions, for example, are a third higher than levels the country agreed to reach by 2012, and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper says the goal is unachievable.

Scientists said it was not too late to take steps toward emission controls, but "it is later than we think," said atmospheric scientist Susan Solomon of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, who co-chaired the panel that produced the summary.

Global-Warming Report Gets U.S. Emphasis (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- U.S. government scientists Friday said the long-term outlook for global warming may be more dire than suggested by this week's United Nations' report, which they say doesn't fully address the impact of clouds and melting glaciers.

Recent evidence of accelerated melting of glaciers in Greenland and the Antarctic ice cap came too late to be included in the report released Thursday by the U.N.-sponsored Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change.

DOJ_NMG_0127927

Glaciers are among the largest sources of fresh water in the world and are contributing to rising ocean levels. Rising sea levels could expose population centers bordering the ocean to more storm damage and could require evacuation in some areas. But the computer models used for the IPCC report based their predictions only on the results of heating of the existing water in the world's oceans, causing the oceans to expand and sea levels to rise, said Tom Delworth, a climate modeler for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the government agency in charge of climate science and weather service.

The IPCC report predicts sea levels will rise by between one to two feet over the next 100 years. Mr. Delworth said there remains "much more uncertainty" over how much accelerated melting of glaciers might add to that.

A second area of continuing uncertainty has to do with the impact of clouds on climate change. Warming the ocean sends more water vapor into the air, and the resulting clouds accelerate global warming by trapping more of the sun's heat in the atmosphere and further warm the ocean. Jim Butler, deputy director of NOAA's global monitoring division, called this "a very scary feedback mechanism."

But, so far, the supercomputers the agency uses to model the effect on the earth's climate -- which were also used for the IPCC report -- aren't detailed or fast enough to predict how much clouds are accelerating the problem. Mr. Delworth said computer models divide the earth's oceans and atmosphere into four million boxes, each about 150 square miles, and that these boxes are too large to model the effects of clouds.

"We could use computers that are one million times faster than they are today and still not be satisfied," Mr. Delworth said.

Further complicating the issue are layers of haze containing pollutants from human activity. Such pollutants, including sulfates, soot, dust and nitrates, tend to make the atmosphere brighter, reflecting more of the sun's heat back into space. The IPCC has found that the net effect of the added pollution is to cool the atmosphere.

A.R. Ravishankara, an atmospheric chemist for NOAA, said this raises a problem for governments attempting to clean the air by removing pollutants. "If you take away this cooling effect, then the heating effect would be exacerbated. It's a highly complex problem."

Global Warming To Continue For Centuries (AP)

By Seth Borenstein

AP, February 2, 2007

PARIS (AP) - Global warming is so severe that it will "continue for centuries," leading to a far different planet in 100 years, warned a grim landmark report from the world's leading climate scientists and government officials. Yet, many of the experts are hopeful that nations will now take action to avoid the worst scenarios.

They tried to warn of dire risks without scaring people so much they'd do nothing - inaction that would lead to the worst possible scenarios.

"It's not too late," said Australian scientist Nathaniel Bindoff, a co-author of the authoritative Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change report issued Friday. The worst can be prevented by acting quickly to curb greenhouse gas emissions, he said.

The worst could mean more than 1 million dead and hundreds of billions of dollars in costs by 2100, said Kevin Trenberth of the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Colorado, one of many study co-authors. He said that adapting will mean living with more extreme weather such as severe droughts, more hurricanes and wildfires.

"It's later than we think," said panel co-chair Susan Solomon, the U.S. National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration scientist who helped push through the document's strong language.

Solomon, who remains optimistic about the future, said it's close to too late to alter the future for her children - but maybe it's not too late for her grandchildren.

The report was the first of four to be released this year by the panel, which was created by the United Nations in 1988. It found:

_Global warming is "very likely" caused by man, meaning more than 90 percent certain. That's the strongest expression of certainty to date from the panel.

_If nothing is done to change current emissions patterns of greenhouse gases, global temperature could increase as much as 11 degrees Fahrenheit by 2100.

_But if the world does get greenhouse gas emissions under control - something scientists say they hope can be done - the best estimate is about 3 degrees Fahrenheit.

_Sea levels are projected to rise 7 to 23 inches by the end of the century. Add another 4 to 8 inches if recent, surprising melting of polar ice sheets continues.

Sea level rise could get worse after that. By 2100, if nothing is done to curb emissions, the melting of Greenland's ice sheet would be inevitable and the world's seas would eventually rise by more than 20 feet, Bindoff said.

DOJ_NMG_0127928

That amount of sea rise would take centuries, said Andrew Weaver of the University of Victoria in Canada, but "if you're in Florida or Louisiana, or much of western Europe or southeast Asia or Bangladesh ... or Manhattan ... you don't want that," he said.

The report spurred bleak reactions from world leaders.

"We are on the historic threshold of the irreversible," warned French President Jacques Chirac, who called for an economic and political "revolution" to save the planet.

"While climate changes run like a rabbit, world politics move like a snail: Either we accelerate or we risk a disaster," said Italy's environment minister, Alfonso Pecoraro Scanio.

And South Africa's Environmental Affairs Minister Marthinus van Schalkwyk said failure to act would be "indefensible."

In Washington, Bush administration officials praised the report but said they still oppose mandatory cuts in greenhouse gas emissions. The problem can be addressed by better technology that will cut emissions, promote energy conservation, and hasten development of non-fossil fuels, said Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman.

About three-fourths of Americans say they expect global warming will get worse, according to a recent AP-AOL News poll. However, other recent polls have found they don't consider it a top priority for the U.S. government.

But doing nothing about global warming could mean up to a 10-degree Fahrenheit temperature rise by the end of the century in the United States, said report co-author Jonathan Overpeck at the University of Arizona.

Elsewhere, the projected effects of global warming would vary on different parts of the globe.

Temperatures would spike higher near the poles, according to the report. Within 22 years - whether greenhouse gases are controlled or not - most of the Northern Hemisphere will see more high temperature extremes, the report showed. Places like Northern Africa will get even less rainfall.

This climate change "is just not something you can stop," said Trenberth. "We're just going to have to live with it. If you were to come up back in 100 years time, we'll have a different climate."

People experience the harshest effects of global warming through extreme weather - heat waves, droughts, floods, and hurricanes - said study co-author Philip Jones of Britain's University of East Anglia. Those have increased significantly in the past decade and will get even worse in the future, he said.

Given all the dire predictions, why are scientists nearly all optimistic? They think their message is finally getting through to the people in charge.

United Nations environmental leaders are talking about a global summit on climate change for world leaders and they hope President Bush will attend.

"The signal that we received from the science is crystal clear," said Yvo de Boer, the executive secretary of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, a multi-national body that tries to change policy to fight global warming.

"That makes it imperative that the political response that comes from this crystal-clear science is as crystal-clear as well.

"I sense a growing sense of urgency to come to grips with the issue," de Boer said. "I think the major challenge is to further the negotiating agenda in a way that makes major players feel safe to step forwardly on this issue."

The major player that has at times been absent is the United States, the biggest emitter of greenhouse gases.

"The world cannot solve the climate change problem without the United States," Achim Steiner, who heads the UN Environment Program, told The Associated Press.

"The world is looking to the Bush administration and to the United States and how it has to be a key part" of solving global warming, he said.

De Boer was optimistic, there too. In an interview, he said that despite U.S. greenhouse gas emissions increasing 16 percent since 1990, change is afoot.

Citing congressional interest and carbon dioxide emission limits requested by top industry CEOs, de Boer said: "I see a very important momentum building throughout the country."

Gore To Testify On Climate Change (POL)

By Ryan Grim

The Politico, February 2, 2007

Former Vice President Al Gore has accepted an invitation to testify next month in a congressional hearing on the highly controversial issue of climate change.

Gore's film, "An Inconvenient Truth," which focused on global warming, received two Oscar nominations this week, one for best documentary feature. For people who make a parlor game of guessing Gore's intentions for 2008, the appearance will surely stoke speculation that he may yet be a late entrant into the Democratic presidential derby.

DOJ_NMG_0127929

Gore will appear at a joint hearing on Wednesday, March 21. He will be the only witness to appear before the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Energy and Air Quality and the Science and Technology Subcommittee on Energy and Environment. Gore served on both committees during his House tenure representing a Tennessee district.

House Energy and Commerce Chairman John D. Dingell, D-Mich., and Science Committee Chairman Bart Gordon, D-Tenn., will jointly chair the hearing. Climate change has proved a politically thorny issue for newly empowered House Democrats. Dingell, whose district includes many auto industry workers, has been locked in a political battle with Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., over panel jurisdiction on climate change issues.

Political Science (WSJ)

By Philip Stott

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

I confess I was afflicted by a profound world-weariness following the release yesterday of the latest gloomy machinations from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC). The U.N.'s global-warming caravanserai, founded in 1988 by the World Meteorological Organization and the United Nations Environment Program, had this time pitched camp in Paris, in order to issue the "Summary for Policy Makers" relating to Working Group One of its "Fourth Assessment Report: Climate Change 2007." This is the group that focuses on "The Physical Science Basis" of climate change, and its summary was greeted with the usual razzmatazz, the Eiffel Tower's 20,000 flashing bulbs being symbolically blacked out on the evening before. Further IPCC reports are due this year, one in April from Working Group Two, on the impacts of, and adaptation to, climate change, and another in May, from Working Group Three on climate-change mitigation.

But it is the science summary that always gives rise to the jamboree -- with journalists, politicians and eager environmentalists desperate to claim that this particular report is the last word on climate change, that it represents a true consensus, that the world is doomed, and that we must recant our fossil-fuel ways. Moreover, as in 2001 with the Third Assessment Report, Friday's release was preceded by speculative leaks, the political shenanigans and spinning beginning even before the final text had been haggled over and agreed upon.

Unfortunately, the IPCC represents science by supercommittee, as rule 10 of its procedures states: "In taking decisions, and approving, adopting and accepting reports, the Panel, its Working Groups and any Task Forces shall use all best endeavors to reach consensus." I bet Galileo would have had a rough time with that.

In this context, it is vital to remember that science progresses by skepticism and by paradigm shifts: A consensus early last century would have given us eugenics. Moreover, the IPCC does no original research, nor does it monitor climate-related data; its evidence is instead from selected secondary sources. But, above all, this supercommittee is more political than is often recognized, rule three firmly reminding delegates that: "documents should involve both peer review by experts and review by governments."

Friday's summary and "best estimates" of temperature-rise by 2100 (as compared to preindustrial times) are thus little more than a committee compromise chewed over by governments with different agendas: an average potential rise of three degrees Celsius (up from 2.5 degrees in 2001); a probable rise of between 1.8 to 4 degrees; a possible rise of between 1.1 to 6.4 degrees. So you can take your pick, also bearing in mind that there are groups outside the IPCC predicting cooling by one or two degrees Celsius. Moreover, the conclusion that climate changes seen around the world are "very likely" to have a human cause is wonderful Alice-through-the-Looking-Glass talk.

Unsurprisingly, the report will please neither a Humeian skeptic nor a rabid apocalyptic. Indeed, even before it appeared, environmentalists were incensed that predictions for the rise in sea levels this century have been lowered to between 28 and 43 cm (11 to 17 inches). They want the polar bears to be drowning now!

For the skeptic, however, the problem remains, as ever, water vapor and clouds. Enormous uncertainties persist with respect to the role of clouds in climate change. Moreover, models that strive to incorporate everything, from aerosols to vegetation and volcanoes to ocean currents, may look convincing, but the error range associated with each additional factor results in near-total uncertainty. Yet, there is a greater concern. Throughout the history of science, monocausal explanations that overemphasize the dominance of one factor in immensely complex processes (in this case, the human-induced emissions of greenhouse gases) have been inevitably replaced by more powerful theories.

Worryingly for the IPCC's "consensus," there is a counterparadigm, relating to the serious uncertainties of water vapor and clouds, now waiting in the wings. In the words of Dr. Henrik Svensmark, director of the Center for Sun-Climate Research at the Danish National Space Center: "The greenhouse effect must play some role. But those who are absolutely certain that the rise in temperatures is due solely to carbon dioxide have no scientific justification. It's pure guesswork." A key piece of research in this emerging new paradigm was published in the Proceedings of the Royal Society A (October 2006): "Do electrons help to make the clouds?"

DOJ_NMG_0127930

Using a box of air in a Copenhagen lab, physicists managed to trace the growth of clusters of molecules of the kind that build cloud condensation nuclei. These are specks of sulfuric acid on which cloud droplets form. High-energy particles driven through the laboratory ceiling by exploded stars far away in the galaxy -- cosmic rays -- liberated electrons in the air, which helped the molecular clusters to form much faster than atmospheric scientists have predicted. This process could well explain a long-touted link between cosmic rays, cloudiness and climate change.

The implications for climate physics, solar-terrestrial physics and terrestrial-galactic physics are enormous. This experiment ties in elegantly with the work of certain geochemists and astronomers, who for some time have been implicating cosmic rays and water vapor, rather than carbon dioxide, as the main drivers of climate change. Indeed, they have put down up to 75% of all change to these drivers.

Cosmic rays are known to boost cloud formation -- and, in turn, reduce earth temperatures -- by creating ions that cause water droplets to condense. Calculating temperature changes at the earth's surface -- by studying oxygen isotopes trapped in rocks formed by ancient marine fossils -- scientists then compared these with variations in cosmic-ray activity, determined by looking at how cosmic rays have affected iron isotopes in meteorites. Their results suggest that temperature fluctuations are more likely to relate to cosmic-ray activity than to carbon dioxide. By contrast, they found no correlation between temperature variation and the changing patterns of CO2 in the atmosphere. But the mechanism remained far from understood -- until last October, that is, when the team in the Copenhagen lab may have discovered it.

Who knows where this exciting research will lead? What it unquestionably shows, however, is that the science of climate change is far from settled, and most certainly not by a government-vetted committee policy "summary" from a U.N. supercommittee.

The inconvenient truth remains that climate is the most complex, coupled, nonlinear, chaotic system known. In such a system, both "doing something" (emitting human-induced gases) and "not doing something" (not emitting) at the margins are equally unpredictable. What climate will we produce? Will it be better? And, if we get there, won't it, too, change?

This is the fatal flaw at the heart of the whole global-warming debacle. Climate change must be accepted as the norm, not as an exception, and it must be seen primarily as a political and economic issue, focusing on how best humanity can continue to adapt to constant change, hot, wet, cold or dry. The concept of achieving a "stable climate" is a dangerous oxymoron.

We must hope that IPCC Working Group Two on adaptation will set a wiser agenda in their April report.

Mr. Stott, professor emeritus of biogeography at the University of London, is co-editor of "Political Ecology: Science, Myth and Power" (Oxford University Press, 2000).

States' Map For Saving The Oceans (WP)

By Leon E. Panetta, James D. Watkins

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Buried beneath the headlines about warming oceans, harmful algae blooms and dwindling seafood stocks is the fact that it is within our power to make immediate, measurable progress toward solving the problems facing our oceans. Innovative state leaders are showing us the way, and the federal government needs to follow their example.

Over the past three years, California, acting to preserve a vital state resource, has developed an Ocean Action Plan; launched the most comprehensive approach to marine protected areas in the nation; and invested more than $30 million in projects to improve water quality, protect ocean habitats and manage sand on its beaches. In the past year, at least 18 states have taken similar steps. Regional, bipartisan alliances were formed to protect the waters, shores, species and economies of the Gulf of Mexico, New York, Puget Sound and the West Coast.

In all of these instances, governors prioritized ocean management and set aside individual state concerns to develop a more effective plan to manage the region's oceans and coasts.

The considerable strides the states and regions made last year in ocean governance earned an A-minus on the Joint Ocean Commission Initiative's latest report card on U.S. ocean policy. That is in stark contrast to the C-minus earned by the nation as a whole. When it comes to managing our oceans, the United States is barely treading water, threatening not only the survival of ocean life but also the lives and livelihoods of those who depend on the ocean as a food source and economic engine.

Our country's C-minus represents a modest improvement from the previous year's grade, a D-plus. The improvement is largely attributable to state action and a few notable federal accomplishments. For instance, passage of the Magnuson-Stevens Fisheries Conservation and Management Act set a firm deadline to end overfishing and will ensure a more scientific approach to fisheries management. The administration's designation of the Northwest Hawaiian Islands Marine National Monument provides important safeguards to 140,000 square miles of ocean and island bounty, and the release of a new national ocean research strategy provides a platform for advancing ocean sciences.

DOJ_NMG_0127931

In most respects, though, the federal government and Congress lag behind states in efforts to protect our oceans. And the failure to commit funding and to reform national and international policy for the long-term preservation of our oceans will hamper additional progress in the states.

It's impossible to effectively manage our oceans without the research necessary to fully understand the complex processes of an ocean ecosystem. Nowhere is this more apparent than with climate change. It's no secret that the oceans and climate are deeply linked -- the oceans store vast amounts of energy in the form of heat and are a sink for much of the carbon dioxide emitted over the past century. Yet while sophisticated atmospheric monitoring systems have been in place for decades, only rudimentary systems exist for our oceans. This leaves us trying to fight climate change with one hand tied behind us. The only way to understand and respond to devastating climate change is with important tools such as an Integrated Ocean Observing System, which the administration's new ocean research plan recommended on Jan. 26.

Unfortunately, even the best-laid plans to preserve the oceans remain empty rhetoric when Congress and the administration fail to commit the funds necessary for implementation. For the second year in a row, federal funding for oceans was stagnant. The Joint Ocean Commission Initiative estimates that a $750 million investment would be a significant step forward for such research as the integrated observing system and management programs like the Magnuson-Stevens Act. Such an investment would protect an ecosystem that represents 95 percent of the habitable living space on the planet and supports ocean-dependent businesses that generate more than $138 billion each year.

The federal government can learn the most from the states by emulating their willingness to heed the advice of environmental and industry experts who say that collaboration is the key to preserving the vital resources in our oceans. The United States is one of the few nations that have failed to accede to the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, essentially a global-scale version of our various regional alliances. Joining the convention would ensure the United States a stake in decisions that affect the health of our oceans, economy and security.

The states have outpaced the federal government on ocean protection for years. It's time for the administration and Congress to dive in. By committing increased science and management funding and supporting the collaborative leadership described above, we can immediately begin to reverse the decline in our oceans.

The writers are co-chairmen of the Joint Ocean Commission Initiative.

Schaghticoke Challenges Cason's Legal Authority (ICT)

By Gale Courey Toensing, Indian Country Today

Indian Country Today, February 3, 2007

KENT, Conn. - The Schaghticoke Tribal Nation has challenged Interior Department Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason's authority to act as "the decision-maker" in overturning the tribe's federal acknowledgement in October 2005.

In the latest twist in the Schaghticokes' decades-long quest for federal recognition, attorneys filed a motion Jan. 23 in U.S. District Court in New Haven, claiming that Cason violated both the Appointments Clause of the Constitution and the Vacancies Reform Act when on Oct. 12, 2005, he issued a Reconsidered Final Determination reversing the BIA's January 2004 positive federal acknowledgement decision.

Cason was functioning as an Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs but was not appointed by the president or confirmed by Congress, and therefore exceeded his authority by issuing decisions that only a "principal officer of the United States" can lawfully render; therefore, the RFD is void, STN's attorneys wrote.

Cason also reversed that day the federal status of the Eastern Pequots, whose federal recognition had been issued two years earlier.

Interior's Inspector General's office could not comment on what the implications would be concerning Cason's other high-level regulatory decisions, if the Schaghticokes' claims are upheld.

The motion is part of the tribe's appeal of the reversal of its recognition. The appeal alleges, among other things, that the RFD was arbitrary and capricious, a violation of the tribe's due process rights and the product of unlawful political influence and congressional interference. It asks the court to restore the tribe's recognition. Interior and its officials are named as defendants.

The appeal is "the Tribe's remaining hope to regain the federal recognition that was wrongly taken from it in the RFD. It is no exaggeration to say that the Tribe is fighting for its very existence. What happened to this Tribe, including the circumstances in which it lost its prior positive recognition are, at a minimum, unusual and deserving of careful review. The Tribe has alleged since its federal recognition first came under attack that various political officials acted improperly to reverse that recognition. This improper delegation of authority to Mr. Cason is one more part of the story of the illegal handling of the Tribe's recognition. The Court should hear the full story of the Tribe's fate," one of the attorneys said.

The Schaghticokes' claims have "no merit," said Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal, who led the state's relentless opposition to the tribe's federal recognition.

DOJ_NMG_0127932

"They are yet another attempt to deflect attention from the real issue: the Schaghticoke Tribal Nation's woefully insufficient evidence in support of its petition for federal recognition. I am confident that the BIA's final decision denying the group federal recognition will stand," Blumenthal said.

On Aug. 2, 2001, Norton named Cason "associate deputy secretary" - a title that does not appear on Interior's organizational chart on its Web site at www.doi.gov. In February 2005, when the duly appointed and confirmed ASIA David Anderson resigned, Norton issued an order relegating all of the ASIA responsibilities, duties and functions to Cason.

"Information obtained by the Tribe - including the recent depositions of former Secretary Norton and Mr. Cason ... makes plain that, in this capacity as Associate Deputy Secretary, James Cason at all relevant times performed duties that rendered him a 'principal officer' of the United States. As such, he is required by the Constitution and case law to have been a PAS [presidential appointee, Senate confirmation] appointee. He was not," the attorneys wrote.

The tribe's attorneys declined to release transcripts of Cason's and Norton's depositions, but Blumenthal included excerpts in a brief he filed opposing the tribe's request to take testimony from other Interior officials.

The tribe's attorneys said "it was no accident" that Cason was appointed outside of the PAS process - he did so to avoid Senate scrutiny. Cason failed to win Senate confirmation in 1989 when former President George H.W. Bush nominated him as Assistant Secretary for Natural Resources Environment in the Agriculture Department. His inability to win Senate confirmation related to his actions in Interior's Land and Minerals Management and Bureau of Land Management during the 1980s.

"Mr. Cason's decisions at the Department of the Interior were uniformly bad when measured against any reasonable standard of public interest and fairness to the public which owns the public lands," said R. Max Peterson, the chief of the U.S. Forest Service during the Reagan years, in an article called "Leave No Tree Behind" posted on www.counter punch.org in August 2003.

Interior's Deputy Inspector General Mary Kendall could not comment on the merits of the Schaghticokes' claims because the issue is in litigation.

"But as a lawyer, not speaking on behalf of the IG's office, I think these are very, very interesting legal issues," Kendall said.

If the tribe's arguments are upheld, what would it mean for all the other high-level decisions Cason has made? Should they stand? Should they be reviewed or vacated?

"I can't go there," Kendall said.

Inspector General Earl Devaney's office has investigated both the tribe's positive recognition process and Cason's roles in Interior.

Devaney investigated the BIA's Schaghticoke recognition process in 2004 at the request of Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd, a Democrat who recently announced he is running for president in 2008. Connecticut officials had accused the BIA and the tribe of political influence, corruption and "bending the rules." The investigation exonerated both the BIA and the tribe of any wrongdoing. The recognition decision was "highly controversial," but the process had been honest and transparent, Devaney said. Connecticut officials then accused the IG's office of corruption and "whitewashing" the investigation.

The IG scrutinized Cason's actions during an 18-month investigation of former Deputy Secretary J. Steven Griles, who was notified by the Justice Department in January that he was likely to be indicted for lying under oath about his relationship with the criminal former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The investigation involved allegations that Griles and "DOI officials" had steered $1.6 million in Bureau of Land Management contracts to Griles' former clients. Griles had assigned Cason to screen all matters relating to the contracts from which he had ostensibly recused himself.

The investigation was not able to pin down any ethical violations, but issued a scathing indictment of Interior's "cowardly and disingenuous" failure "to provide rigorous ethics advice to the political leadership."

The investigation was impeded by the shape-shifting nature of Griles' former oil and gas industry clients who "continually merge, change names, and develop subsidiary companies," and by "an unanticipated lack of personal and institutional memory, conflicting recollections; poor record keeping" and other deficiencies.

Cason's authority to act without a presidential nomination and Senate confirmation also raised a red flag years before the tribe's current claims. In response to a query from Committee on Energy and Natural Resources Chairman Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., in 2002, the Government Accountability Office reported that Cason at that time was not making high level regulatory decisions and, therefore, was not "a de facto officer" of the United States subject to presidential appointment and Senate confirmation.

DOJ_NMG_0127933

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Budget To Seek Cuts For Medicare, Medicaid (LAT)

By Joel Havemann, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 5, 2007

His effort to balance the books in five years includes new spending on education, energy initiatives, farmers and the wars.

WASHINGTON — In a bid to balance the federal budget in five years, President Bush will seek cuts in several key programs. But the spending blueprint he sends to Congress on Monday leaves room for some sweeteners, according to administration officials.

Under the Bush plan, grants for college students would rise after remaining stagnant for three years, and some parts of the No Child Left Behind Act would receive additional funding.

There would be new money to spur the manufacture of hybrid cars and production of ethanol. And a new farm bill would give farmers $1 billion more a year than the current law.

At the same time, Bush will ask for substantial cuts in Medicare and Medicaid, the government's main healthcare programs.

The Pentagon budget, including a detailed request for war funding in 2008, will hit $623 billion, according to a senior Defense official. That total includes $481 billion for the military's normal annual budget, a 10% increase over this year's spending.

That increase is accounted for, in part, by Bush's proposal to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps by a combined 92,000 troops over the next five years.

The budget request also includes, for the first time, funding details for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan; in past years, these war costs have been approved as special emergency funding bills. The 2008 budget will include a $142-billion estimate for war costs, a clear indication that the administration anticipates a high troop level in Iraq through the end of next year.

The White House will also be asking for an additional $93 billion in war funding for the current fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30.

Combined, the two war requests would take total spending on Iraq and Afghanistan to about $737 billion.

Many aspects of Bush's budget almost assuredly will spark criticism from the Democratic-controlled Congress, which can be expected to offer alternative funding levels. His proposed Medicare cuts are likely to receive an especially cold reception.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who is seeking the presidency in 2008, on Friday said she considered it "unconscionable that the president's answer to our healthcare crisis is to cut the already strained healthcare safety net."

Bush's proposal is expected to cut more than $65 billion over five years from Medicare and about $7 billion from Medicaid, relative to the spending levels that the programs would reach under current law. Large as these cuts seem, they represent only about 2% of the total projected spending for the two programs, which will cost about $590 billion this year.

Most of the Medicare cuts target hospitals and other service providers, rather than direct benefits to patients. The proposal includes cutting about 8% in Medicare payments to doctors.

At the same time, patients would have to pay more for their healthcare coverage through higher co-payments and other changes.

The president also will propose restraining the growth of the State Children's Health Insurance Program. In some states, children from families with incomes up to three times the poverty level qualify for assistance; Bush would reduce that threshold to twice the poverty line.

The president's budget would be more generous to low-income college students. The maximum Pell grant would rise to $4,600 in the 2008-09 school year, from $4,050.

The No Child Left Behind Act, which became law early in Bush's first term, would keep its goal of lifting every student to grade-level competency in reading and mathematics by 2014. Some components of the program would get more federal funding, but the Education Department did not say whether overall outlays would rise.

Bush, who in his State of the Union address last week highlighted a push to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil, is expected to ask for $2.7 billion for his "advanced energy initiative." This includes the efforts to develop more hybrid cars and to increase use of ethanol, an alternative fuel which can be produced from grains and grasses.

In the address, Bush proposed cutting the nation's consumption of gasoline 20% within 10 years.

On another front, Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) expressed displeasure with the funding proposal for levee fortifications and other projects to help Louisiana recover from Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0127934

In a letter to Bush, he contended that the budget request would be a "step back" from the president's previous commitment.

joel.havemann@latimes.com

Times staff writers Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar, Julian E. Barnes, Richard Simon and Peter Spiegel contributed to this report.

Budget For Bush, Saving Tax Cuts Is A Tough Balancing Act (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

President Bush's budget, which he submits to Congress on Monday, will be an early effort to cement his legacy in domestic policy. The key question: Can he convince members of Congress that they can extend his cherished tax cuts, all of which expire by 2010, and still balance the budget?

Mr. Bush has pledged to show a path to erasing the existing $248 billion deficit a couple of years after he leaves office, partly so he can claim strong financial stewardship and, more importantly, so he can convince Congress to extend the tax cuts. If the projections are derided as fuzzy math or have unrealistic assumptions, Congress will scoff and ignore them.

Those projections will assume that Mr. Bush's tax cuts, which are estimated to cost about $450 billion over the next five years, are made permanent. But the White House is expected to leave out or underestimate other key costs, including an expensive fix to the alternative minimum tax and additional funding for the war in Iraq beyond 2009. It will also include strong revenue growth that some economists may see as unrealistic.

As the Bush budget will show, the deficit numbers are notoriously dependent on such assumptions. "The numbers don't tell the whole story," says Stan Collender, a budget expert who is managing director of Qorvis Communications LLC. Depending on how you do the math, he says, there's "either a big surplus coming or a big deficit coming."

Projections by the Congressional Budget Office show a $170 billion surplus in 2012. But that number quickly turns into a deficit when other widely expected costs are factored in, including a fix to the AMT, which is slated to snag 23 million Americans this year unless Congress acts, and more spending on defense and the war on terror.

"It's a little hard to see how there could be a meeting of the minds," Sen. Kent Conrad, (D., N.D.) told reporters the other day. "When you adjust the CBO forecast for the proposals of the president, you can see they just drive us right over the cliff in terms of massive growth of the debt."

The 2008 budget is expected to propose about a 10% increase for the Defense Department to $481 billion, as well as a separate request of $141 billion for the broader war on terror, including funding for the Iraq war. Mr. Bush is also expected to ask for another $93 billion in war funds for 2007, on top of the $70 billion Congress approved last year.

Other agencies are bracing for a squeeze, including the Securities and Exchange Commission, which expects flat funding in 2008 after several years of post-Enron increases. Other agencies have also been told to expect flat or small increases in 2008, according to people familiar with the administration's plans.

There will also be some new initiatives, including the president's proposal to provide a standard tax deduction to individuals who purchase health insurance either through their employer or on the open market. That plan, which would make employer-provided health insurance taxable as income and exclude as much as $15,000 of that income per family, is expected to cost the government about $30 billion to $40 billion a year for the first few years but eventually become "revenue neutral" within a decade.

The budget will also show plans to slow the current 7% annual growth rate in Medicare spending. Those savings are expected to come from squeezing health providers, like doctors and hospitals, which will undoubtedly spark a battle on Capitol Hill as those providers seek to escape the budget scalpel.

A Rare Bill In Congress (NYT)

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

The Democratic-led House has made the most of a sorry budgetary business, stripping out billions of dollars in earmarked pork from a spending measure urgently needed to keep the government running this year. The $463.5 billion bill is an omnibus mop-up device necessitated by the fact that nine of 11 major spending bills were left unfinished last fall by the Republican leadership in its final weeks of power. The Democrats, who promised to cut out special-interest budget goodies, killed thousands of earmarks custom-designed by lawmakers.

The stopgap measure roughly duplicates the spending levels of last year's budget, but has enough room for important changes neglected by the last Congress. More than $10 billion was voted for such programs as health care for wounded Iraq war veterans, Pell grants for students and housing vouchers for the poor, and for 500 additional health research grants. Democrats saved two vital Census Bureau initiatives that Republicans had tried to kill: the running survey of the effect of government programs on the poor and disabled, and the testing of new technology needed for the 2010 census.

DOJ_NMG_0127935

The House measure now heads to the Senate as that rare piece of legislative sausage devoid of expensive, toothsome pork. The rush to passage was necessitated by a Feb. 15 deadline to keep the government financed by cleaning up the leftover mess before having to move full time to writing next year's budget.

Earmarks — those undebated dipperfuls of taxpayer-financed contracts that tripled under the Republicans — will undoubtedly return in the new budget. The difference is that they will be subject to new ethics rules, which say lawmakers are supposed to own up to their provenance by specifying the beneficiaries and justifications of earmarks and disavowing that they will personally benefit.

Bush To Seek 3 Percent Raise For Civil Service And Military (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

President Bush will propose a 3 percent pay raise for federal employees and military personnel in his fiscal 2008 budget, scheduled for release on Monday, a senior administration official said yesterday.

Clay Johnson III, deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget, said the president's civil service pay advisers and Pentagon officials had acted independently in coming up with their pay recommendations. If accepted by Congress, the raises would take effect next January.

Under current practice, most of the money for the annual civilian pay raise is allocated across the board, as a nationwide increase, and a small portion is parceled out by locality to reflect labor market conditions. The new budget will propose using an additional factor -- recruitment and retention needs for special occupations -- in distributing raises, officials said. This would give Bush more leeway in salary adjustments.

The administration proposed a similar, three-way pay allocation process in last year's budget, but the recommendation was not taken up by Congress.

Federal pay is an important part of the Washington-Baltimore economy. The region is home to about 10 percent of the federal workforce, and the annual federal employee payroll (not counting the military and U.S. Postal Service) runs about $20 billion. Many corporations and nonprofit organizations use the federal raise as a benchmark when deciding their annual salary adjustments.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), a longtime advocate for federal employees, said he planned to study the budget proposal, particularly in the context of what he called "an already significant pay gap between federal employees and their private-sector counterparts."

Johnson said the proposal to provide the civil service and the military with a 3 percent raise next year was based on the Labor Department's Employment Cost Index, which tracks wage growth in the private sector. In most years, Congress relies on the index as a starting point for debate on government raises.

The pay proposal marks the second consecutive year that Bush's budget has called for equal adjustments in civil service and military pay. The fiscal 2007 budget proposed an average 2.2 percent raise for both groups. Bush put the raise into effect after Congress failed to complete work on fiscal 2007 spending bills.

The Washington-area congressional delegation usually supports equal adjustments in pay for the military and the civil service, and Hoyer and other area House members recently wrote Bush urging him to support a "pay parity" policy in 2008.

While the president's 2008 budget will propose comparable raises for the civil service and the military, Johnson said, he stressed that the recommendations resulted from "two independent agency processes. The goal is not parity, but that is what the two proposals ended being."

Bush To Urge Democrats To Consider His Domestic Policy (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

In an attempt to sustain key elements of a domestic agenda pronounced dead on arrival by congressional critics, President Bush will challenge the newly empowered House Democrats to give his health-care and energy proposals serious consideration when he addresses them today during a retreat in Virginia.

Confronted by the reality of a Congress now controlled by Democrats, Bush has maintained his trademark determination regarding Iraq, pushing forward with a military buildup despite widespread Democratic opposition.

On domestic matters, however, Bush has recently adopted the rhetoric -- but not the policy positions -- often associated with Democrats. He has invoked the menace of global climate change, lamented the nation's growing income inequality, and set ambitious goals to develop alternative fuels and cut gasoline consumption. He has also proposed a plan to make health insurance more affordable to the 47 million people in the country who lack coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0127936

Congressional Democrats have greeted such offerings with suspicion. Leading House Democrats remain dismissive of Bush's health-care proposals, in particular. And as they met yesterday during their retreat in Williamsburg, caucus leaders said the onus remains on the president to reach out by backing the domestic initiatives -- including an increase in the minimum wage and a reduction in student-loan rates -- that the new House approved during its first weeks.

"Is he going to stand in the way, or is he going to join us?" asked Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

Joel D. Kaplan, Bush's deputy chief of staff and a key figure in the development of the president's agenda, said the president's domestic plans confront "real challenges faced by real people, and they provide real solutions."

Under Bush's health-care-coverage plan, the federal government would create a tax deduction to offset the cost of health insurance. The value of employer-provided health insurance that exceeds the deduction would be taxed as income.

Because the deduction would apply to income before taxes for Social Security and Medicare are subtracted, Bush's plan would mean a tax cut for families who buy health insurance even if they pay little or no income tax. For a family earning $20,000 a year, the savings would be significant -- $2,295 a year, the White House said.

The tax plan would be complemented by a Bush proposal to redirect some of the federal health dollars now being spent by states on hospitals and other institutions, so that they can use them to help pay the cost of health insurance for the poor and for people who have difficulty getting coverage because of chronic health problems.

The White House thought that the idea's progressive tilt would be attractive to Democrats. But key Democrats almost immediately rejected the two plans, calling them the latest in a line of GOP efforts to push workers away from employer-provided health insurance and into individually purchased plans.

"We're not too enthusiastic about either of those proposals," said House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (Md.).

Senators Move Donor Disclosures At A Snail's Pace (LAT)

By Dan Morain

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — In a windowless office at the Federal Election Commission, a 10-year-old printer churns out 500 pages an hour — hour after hour.

"It's a mule," says J. Arnold Queen, the man who tends the Hewlett-Packard 8100-N, a discontinued model.

Overnight, the HP-8100 had spewed forth 2,000 pages. It can't crank out more until its trays are emptied. Tens of thousands more pages are backed up in the queue. It will be working through the day, into the night and over the weekend.

Like most beasts of burden, the machine is a throwback, part of an anachronistic and costly system that exists in large part to serve the members — the Luddites, some would say — of the United States Senate.

Unlike candidates for president and the House, political action committees and most state offices, senators refuse to transmit their campaign donation reports over the Internet.

Thanks to a labyrinthine process that takes weeks or months, they are able to delay public access to their campaign donors' identities — sometimes until after the election.

Now that seven senators are running for the White House and using money raised as senators to jump-start their campaigns, the practice is under renewed scrutiny.

Senators have blocked repeated efforts, backed by 25 of their colleagues from both parties, to change the law.

"Here is something no one opposes. No one. Why hasn't it passed?" asks Steven Weissman of the nonprofit Campaign Finance Institute.

The answer, he and others say, is that senators don't really want it to pass. But no one argues against it publicly. It's killed in more subtle ways, away from public view.

Like all federal officeholders, senators were required to submit year-end campaign finance reports by Wednesday. Such reports are public documents. But that doesn't mean they are publicly available. Nor will they be any time soon.

"We've seen months go by when the records are not available," Weissman said.

"It's stupidity," said Bob Biersack, FEC spokesman.

"It's not an accident," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, which advocates more disclosure of campaign finances. "It's disclosure that no one can see."

It's not for lack of technology. Senators, good politicians that they are, use computers to track their campaign contributors and maintain campaign records. But rather than transmit this information electronically to comply with the disclosure laws, senators print the documents — which can run thousands of pages — and deliver them to the Senate's public disclosure unit two blocks away.

DOJ_NMG_0127937

Many senators drop them in the mail. As long as they are postmarked by the filing date, they are in compliance with the law. Some reports may not arrive for days. The report for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) didn't reach the Senate office until Friday.

There, Senate staffers scan the reports, page by page, transforming them back to digital images. That can take two days.

Then they send the reconstituted computer files by e-mail to the FEC. There, the HP-8100 goes to work, printing and collating the material and preparing it for key-punchers.

A report on all of the Senate Democrats' campaign donors last year consumed 5,487 pages. A similar Republican report weighed in at 4,650 pages. At 500 pages per hour, that equates to between nine and 11 hours, paper jams notwithstanding — though Queen notes that the 8100 "just keeps on going."

The process — which occurs quarterly, and more often in election years — doesn't end there.

Once the reports are collated and boxed, a courier picks them up and drives them an hour or so to Fredericksburg, Va. There, a private contractor, ILM Corp., employs workers to type the information back into a computer — at a cost to taxpayers of $250,000 a year.

Since key-punchers are human, they make mistakes. In one case, a $200,000 entry was reported as $2.3 million.

Once that's done, the data are transmitted electronically back to the FEC — which then posts them online. The process can take months.

As a result, voters had no clue who donated to candidates in the closing weeks in six tight races in November, Weissman said. The reports for some challengers and incumbents in Missouri, Montana, Pennsylvania and elsewhere did not become public until after the election.

Donations came from a tobacco company; corporate law firms; and energy, insurance, cable television and Wall Street firms — information that might have helped sway some voters.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who chairs the influential Senate Rules Committee, is among those who endorsed legislation requiring senators to file electronically. The FEC has urged the change at least since 1997. Talk of requiring online filing comes as Congress considers legislation to expand disclosure requirements related to lobbyists. "It's time to bring the Senate into the modern era," Feinstein said in a statement this week.

Neither she nor another advocate of change, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), was available to discuss why the change is being blocked, or by whom.

Baca Defends Actions (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, February 2, 2007

Amid roiling turmoil in the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, chairman Joe Baca Friday refuted accusations that he had called Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a "whore," had mismanaged the group's political arm, thwarted the advancement of female lawmakers and was improperly elected chairman.

In a lengthy statement, Baca said he was "deeply troubled" by the allegations made by several of his colleagues in the 21-member caucus. All its members are Democrats, and both Baca and Sanchez are from California

Sanchez resigned from the caucus Wednesday, accusing Baca of telling people she's a "whore."

"A months-old internal CHC discussion has been repackaged into accusations with sexual overtones through irresponsible reporting and inflammatory headline writing," he said.

He reiterated his statement, issued Wednesday, that the claims were "categorically untrue."

Aides to Sanchez and Reps. Hilda L. Solis and Linda Sanchez, two California Democrats who have been very critical of Baca, could not be reached for comment. Linda and Loretta Sanchez are sisters.

Baca again dismissed Loretta Sanchez's charge that he had referred to her as a "whore" during a meeting with California state legislators, including Democratic Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez. Specifically, Baca noted news reports that Nunez had said he has "no recollection" of the remark.

Baca also disputed claims of Sanchez and three other Latina Democrats that his November election as caucus chairman had not followed the caucus's bylaws because it did not employ secret ballots.

"The election adhered to the established rules and procedures of the CHC so there should be no question about the validity of the process or the outcome," Baca said. "Our bylaws make no mention of secret ballots, simply requiring that there be an affirmative vote of a majority of the CHC Members."

Nonetheless, the caucus held a second vote Jan. 18, and Baca was elected again.

"Although this meeting was open to all CHC members, none of the members who have since expressed concern attended the executive session," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127938

Addressing accusations about the group's political arm, Baca said he had abstained from a vote to direct political contributions to his two sons, a move that had drawn criticism from half a dozen colleagues. He also noted that the sons had refunded the donations "upon concerns coming to light."

He also dismissed allegations of sexism, noting that he had appointed, or recommended, female lawmakers to various leadership posts. And he pointed out that his longtime chief of staff, Linda Macias, had been an "invaluable colleague and friend" for a dozen years and that the majority of his staff are women.

Who's A "Whore"? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

OK, so Loretta is all mad at Joe because he's using money from the club treasury for his boys, who Loretta totally can't stand, so Loretta and her sister, Linda, get some girls to go after Joe's boys, but he's elected to head the club, which makes Loretta go postal and she quits. And then Loretta says Fabian said Joe called her a whore! But now Fabian says he doesn't remember, and Joe's all like, "It never happened."

Sounds like junior high, doesn't it? It's not. It's the California congressional delegation. In particular, it's several Southern California Latino Democrats, hurling charges and countercharges about political money, family, voting improprieties and personality. But it comes down to this: Did Rep. Joe Baca (D-Rialto) call Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Santa Ana) a "whore"? And if so, why?

The trash talking went public this week when Politico.com reported that Orange County's Sanchez had quit the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, which the Inland Empire's Baca chairs. But the bad feelings stretch back a year, when caucus PAC money was being used to boost the political fortunes of Baca's sons, Joe Jr. and Jeremy. Jeremy needed the money to help his family keep the state Assembly seat being vacated by Joe Jr., who was trying to extend the Baca empire into the state Senate. Both Baca brothers lost, despite the infusion of PAC money, and it may be worth noting that their opponents were women: Gloria Negrete McLeod defeated Joe Jr., and his old seat went not to his brother but to Wilmer Amina Carter.

Sanchez and four other Californians — including her sister, Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Lakewood) — and an Arizonan quit the PAC over the use of money for family members. But the Sanchez sisters and other female caucus members angry over the PAC money, the Baca family's dynastic aspirations and the poor treatment of women also complained that the caucus broke its own rules by electing Baca without a secret ballot. Loretta Sanchez said that was the real reason she finally quit.

This week she also claimed that Baca lobbed the W-word at her. Fun as it may be to imagine the two Democrats yelling profanities across the Rotunda, it turns out that Sanchez heard about the "whore" comment secondhand — from, she implied, Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles). Nunez says he remembers no such thing. Baca said it never happened.

Here are some universal truths: Our elected officials should not try to build family dynasties. Female politicians should be treated with as much respect as their male counterparts. Trash talking dirties everyone. And members of Congress should act like adults. Grow up.

FAA Looks For Money For New Air-Traffic Control System (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Federal aviation officials expect on Monday to begin introducing a proposal to finance a new air-traffic control system that they say will be needed to keep pace with increasing air travel over the next two decades.

Without a new system, officials say, passengers would face delays that would dwarf last year's snarls.

"In the long term, we could see real gridlock," said Federal Aviation Administrator Marion C. Blakey.

Few people in the aviation industry dispute Blakey's assessment of future air-traffic congestion, a problem that officials hope to fix by switching from a radar network to one that relies on satellites.

However, a debate is unfolding over how to finance the next-generation network, which could cost $69 billion to $76 billion, according to the Congressional Research Service. The Federal Aviation Administration and other government agencies want the system completed by 2025. They have not said how much it would cost.

The FAA would use its trust fund, which accumulates aviation-related taxes, to pay for the new system. The fund's balance has dropped to $1.8 billion, however, the lowest in a decade, officials said.

The officials say they must change how they collect money for the fund. Its largest source of funding -- taxes paid on airline tickets -- is not keeping pace with costs, they say.

The officials cite several reasons for the shortfall, but attribute it mostly to the growth of low-cost carriers. Those airlines charge less for flights, reducing tax revenue. Officials also note that airlines are using more small jets, adding to the workload of controllers.

DOJ_NMG_0127939

Officials expect increased use of corporate aircraft and small private planes, known as very light jets, that are just hitting the market. Users of corporate jets and other private aircraft pay fuel taxes.

Blakey has hinted that the agency is considering a plan more in line with what airlines have advocated for years: replacing the ticket tax with user fees. Airlines want the FAA to charge fees for most planes, including private jets, that use controlled airspace.

It is not clear how broad the FAA proposal would be or how much it would rely on user fees, taxes or a combination of the two. Blakey has said only that the agency would try "to tie the actual costs of providing the services to the revenue that is coming in."

Owners of jets and small planes are lobbying against a change in the funding structure, saying it would unfairly hurt their businesses and aviation generally. They say the FAA has exaggerated its budget problems and has not explained how much the new system would cost. If the funding structure remains unchanged, they say, the trust fund would still accumulate billions of dollars to finance a new air-traffic system. They refer to estimates by the Congressional Budget Office that say the fund would have nearly $19 billion by 2016.

"I just don't understand why we need to change a system that works," said Phil Boyer, president of the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association.

Parts of the FAA proposal would be included in the agency's budget, which is to be submitted to Congress on Monday. More details are to emerge after the agency's reauthorization proposal is made public in the next few weeks.

The planned air-traffic system would be vastly different than today's network, which dates to the 1960s and relies on radar and air-traffic controllers to direct pilots. Controllers must maintain substantial distances between planes and often move aircraft along slower, indirect routes because of the imprecision of radar data.

The new system, parts of which are being tested, would rely on satellites and Global Positioning System devices, which can locate an aircraft within a few feet. That would make it easier for controllers to handle more aircraft safely and more efficiently, officials said.

Pilots also would be able to monitor the location of other planes on screens in their cockpits, giving them a far better idea of what is going on around them and how to avoid trouble.

The system would require new equipment for planes, which could cost thousands of dollars per aircraft. The government would have to ensure that other countries adopt similar systems so planes would not need additional computers or software. The new technology must be proven to be as reliable as radar.

The government probably would not get rid of all of its radar stations because it would not be able to track planes involved in terrorism incidents in which satellite positioning systems are disabled.

Crashworthy Motor Vehicles (NYT)

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

The federal government is exploring ways to strengthen its tests and its ratings system for the crashworthiness of motor vehicles. The effort is long overdue but still likely to fall short of what's needed. In far too many cases, the tests are weaker than they should be and fail to address current kinds of accidents, like what happens when one of today's larger vehicles collides with a smaller one.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration tackles vehicle crash protection in two major ways. It sets minimum crashworthiness standards and requires the manufacturers to test their vehicles and certify that they comply. And it conducts its own more rigorous tests on a number of new-model cars and then converts the results into a five-star rating system to indicate which vehicles are more crashworthy and which are less likely to roll over. The theory is that consumers will be more interested in buying the safer vehicles, thereby giving manufacturers a strong incentive to surpass the minimum requirements.

There is little doubt that these efforts have helped to prod manufacturers to design safer cars. But the ratings are a victim, in some sense, of their success. Nowadays, a vast majority of vehicles get four or five stars, providing little way for consumers to detect differences and giving manufacturers little incentive to keep improving.

Worse yet, the tests have not kept pace with the times as more sport utility vehicles, minivans and pickups have taken to the roads. Fortunately, the agency is belatedly exploring ways to upgrade its crash tests and strengthen the five-star rating system. The secretary of transportation, Mary Peters, announced last month that vehicles could be subjected to more stringent rollover, front- and side-crash tests. New ratings may also be developed for technologies that help drivers avoid crashes, like electronic stability control and lane departure warning systems.

The agency signaled that it was not yet ready to address such important issues as collisions between large and small vehicles, collisions with narrow objects like telephone poles, and the protection of occupants in rollover crashes, on the grounds that more research is needed. For everyone's safety, consumer advocates and vehicle insurers should press hard for the strongest possible tests and standards.

DOJ_NMG_0127940

OTHER NEWS:

Jobs Data Signal Growth Is Easing But Still Solid (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

U.S. employers were more cautious about taking on new workers in January, a hint that economic growth may be easing. But plenty of underlying signs suggest that a strong labor market will continue to lift wages and boost consumer spending in the months ahead.

The Labor Department Friday said nonfarm payrolls rose by 110,000 jobs last month following December's gain of 206,000 jobs. The smaller increase in January -- together with a rise in the unemployment rate to 4.6% from 4.5% in December and a tepid 0.2% gain in the typical employee's pay last month -- suggests the economy is slowing somewhat after a strong finish to 2006.

But the tone of the report wasn't entirely soft. Revised data showed that employers brought on 80,000 more workers in November and December than initially thought, which means employers have added an average of 170,000 jobs a month since November. That is more than enough to keep the economy growing at a pace that could stoke inflation, particularly if the unemployment rate stays low and wages keep rising faster than consumer prices.

The ambiguous signals from the labor market arrived as economists were trying to digest a separate report this past week that showed the economy bouncing back from a midyear slump to grow at an annualized, 3.5% inflation-adjusted rate in the fourth quarter. In leaving interest rates unchanged this past week, the Federal Reserve noted the recent signs of economic strength and said it remains concerned that inflation could flare up again.

Despite lukewarm job creation in January, a large, upward revision to last year's job estimates will likely keep those concerns alive. In its annual revision, based on a thorough count of unemployment insurance tax records, the Labor Department said the economy created more than 2.2 million jobs last year, 400,000 more than previously estimated. That helps explain why consumers seemed so resilient last year despite higher interest rates and a sharp reversal in the housing market, and it bodes well for economic growth this year.

"One reason the U.S. economy has weathered this downdraft in housing and autos is that it's been generating a lot of income" for consumers, said Robert Gay, a former senior economist at the Federal Reserve.

Indeed, the competitive labor market continues to boost wages. The average hourly wage of nonmanagerial workers in January was 4% higher than a year earlier, well above the current inflation rate of about 2.5%.

White-collar, service-sector workers like Mr. Gay, now a hedge-fund consultant in New York, have been in particular demand. Employment in the category of professional and business services, which includes accountants, consultants and lawyers, grew by 25,000 positions in January. The health-care field added 18,000 workers last month and an average 28,000 positions a month last year.

FairPoint Communications Inc., a Charlotte, N.C., telecommunications company, said it plans to add 600 jobs this year, to "support field operations" and mostly in the accounting, logistics, information-technology and human-resources departments.

Roy Krause, chief executive of Spherion, a staffing firm in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., said, "You're taking out of a lot of companies the 60-year-old middle-management professional that needs to be replaced somehow." He said Spherion's professional placements are running 8% to 10% higher than a year ago, compared with 4% to 5% growth for clerical or industrial placements.

Amid the vigorous labor market, the University of Michigan yesterday said its consumer-sentiment survey rose to 96.9 in January from 91.7 in December, hitting its highest mark in two years.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Department said factory orders surged 2.4% in December after a 1.2% gain in November, but underlying trends suggest the manufacturing sector could struggle in the months ahead as it works off stockpiles of unsold goods.

Economy Adds Fewer Jobs Than Expected (FT)

By Eoin Callan, Michael Mackenzie

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

The US unemployment rate rose this month as the economy added fewer jobs than expected, government figures showed.

DOJ_NMG_0127941

The unemployment rate hit 4.6 per cent as employers added 111,000 workers to their payrolls in January, the department of labour said.

The signs of cooling in the labour market are consistent with the Federal Reserve's view that inflation pressures are starting to moderate as the economy coasts towards a soft landing.

The increase in unemployment makes the central bank more likely to keep interest rates on hold as it waits to assess the full impact on consumer sentiment of a slowdown in the housing market.

Robert Mellman, an economist at JP Morgan, said: "The message from these figures is that the economy is not overheating. This gives the Fed less reason to be worried about inflation."

Ed Lazear, economic adviser to President George W. Bush, said: "This jobs report is just about perfect. It suggests that the economy is balanced. It suggests we can sustain this into the future."

The slower-than-expected job creation follows above trend economic growth in the last quarter, when the economy created 104,000 more jobs than previously thought, according to the latest figures.

The payroll increases were strongest in the service sector - which added 104,000 jobs, while the construction sector surprised many economists by adding 22,000 jobs, despite a housing slowdown.

Factories shed 16,000 jobs, underlining the weakness in the the manufacturing sector, according to the data on non-farm payrolls.

Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital said: "The data will leave expectations of a steady Fed through the first half of 2007 largely intact while encouraging some to flirt more actively with rate cuts toward the end of the year."

Equities rose as Treasury yields fell, with the benchmark 10-year bond yield down to 4.81 from 4.85 per cent. The dollar slipped a little against the euro and the yen.

Growth in average hourly earnings was slower than expected with an increase of 3 cents in January to $17.09. Over the year, both hourly earnings and weekly earnings rose by 4 per cent.

Employment Figures Fit "Soft Landing" Predictions (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

The nation's labor market softened slightly last month, with the unemployment rate edging up to 4.6 percent as job growth slowed, the Labor Department said yesterday.

The report fits with widespread government and private forecasts that the economy will slow to a cooler but still-solid pace of growth this year after expanding rapidly last year. That is expected to cause the drum-tight job market to ease and inflation pressures to ebb.

The Labor Department's report "paints a perfect picture of the U.S. economy and labor markets making a 'soft-landing,' " said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist at PNC Financial Services Group.

The jobless rate ticked up in January from 4.5 percent in December but remains low by historical standards. Much of the increase occurred because hundreds of thousands of workers poured into the labor force last month, likely drawn by booming job growth at the end of last year.

Employers increased their payrolls by 206,000 workers in December and by 196,000 in November, the department said, revising upward earlier estimates. That was more than the monthly number of new jobs, 100,000 to 150,000, that many economists think necessary to keep pace with growth in the labor force.

Employers turned more cautious in January, however, adding a more modest 111,000 jobs, the Labor Department said. Some of the biggest employment gains were in education, health care, finance and other services, as was the case last year.

Construction employment grew as job cuts by home builders were more than offset by hiring for nonresidential projects such as offices, hotels, factories and hospitals. Some of the gain was likely because of the unseasonably warm weather across much of the country in January, analysts said.

Manufacturing employment fell, with the losses concentrated in automaking, furniture and textiles, the Labor Department said.

"The end of the year was strong, so it was not unusual there was a little pullback" in hiring last month, said Roy G. Krause, chief executive of Spherion, a national staffing firm in Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

Many economists predict that the unemployment rate will rise this year to about 5 percent.

The unemployment rate fell last month for African American workers, to 8 percent from 8.4 percent in December. The rate was the lowest since July 2001, but was still nearly double the rate for white workers, which rose to 4.1 percent from 4 percent. Latino joblessness rose to 5.7 percent from 4.9 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0127942

Wage growth also slowed in January, which should help ease concerns at the Federal Reserve that a tight job market might drive inflation higher. Average hourly earnings for most workers rose 0.2 percent last month, the slowest pace since September, to $17.09.

Slower Job Growth, At Least For Now (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters, Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

Job growth slowed in January, the government reported yesterday, offering a tentative sign that the economy may be shifting down a notch from its unexpectedly robust pace of growth at the end of last year.

According to the Department of Labor's report, employers across the nation added 111,000 jobs last month, about half the monthly gains recorded at the end of last year and fewer than most Wall Street economists expected.

Unemployment rose a tenth of a percentage point, to 4.6 percent, the highest level since September, because of a substantial increase in the number of people entering the labor force seeking a job.

The weaker data for January soothed some investors in financial markets, who have been worrying that faster growth in jobs and wages may feed through to higher inflation. "We're looking at the ultimate rosy scenario," said Robert S. Gay, managing partner of Fenwick Advisors, a financial consulting firm. "Not too fast, not too slow."

But employers may be hiring at a faster clip than is immediately apparent. The Labor Department also acknowledged that employers added nearly one million more jobs from March 2005 through last December than it had previously estimated.

Last year, employment growth exceeded earlier estimates by more than 400,000 jobs. The magnitude of the change suggested that the Labor Department might be seriously underestimating the growth in employment.

"The size of the upward revisions was enormous," said Joshua Shapiro, chief United States economist with MFR. "You put the pieces of the puzzle together, and it sort of tells you that the 111,000 number is not something to focus on." January's number will be revised in February and March, and will be subject to an annual adjustment next year.

The reported changes to prior data were mostly because of the annual adjustment of the sample of businesses that the Labor Department surveys to put together its employment figures. The department also recalibrated its model of the birth and death of businesses — which feeds into its estimates of employment growth.

The adjustments fit an underlying picture of an economy that is somewhat stronger than previously thought, despite the continuing weakness in the housing market — which has affected employment in the housing sector. Early estimates put growth in the fourth quarter at 3.5 percent, faster than expected.

Indeed, the University of Michigan's consumer confidence gauge for January, which was released yesterday, rebounded to its highest level in two years, as cheaper energy encouraged expectations of a stronger economy, better jobs and higher wages.

Richard T. Curtin, who heads the university's surveys of consumers, noted that in January only 27 percent of consumers said they expected unemployment to rise over the next year, the lowest percentage in two years, down from 41 percent in the August survey. "Consumers expect a big increase in real incomes," Mr. Curtin added.

Wages did not grow much in January. Hourly wages increased 3 cents, or 0.2 percent, before inflation, the slowest since September. The total hours worked in the private sector declined to 33.8 a week, from 33.9 in December.

Though inflation in January has not yet been reported, it would not be surprising if it were to exceed the growth in hourly wages.

When the Federal Reserve voted on Wednesday to leave interest rates unchanged, it sounded its usual cautionary note about inflation. But this time, it was more optimistic that prices would "moderate over time," its statement said.

Still, some economists remain nervous about wage growth. "Increases in wages should not necessarily lead to wage inflation of the sort that would worry the Fed if we continue to see productivity growth, but productivity growth has been slowing," said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of the Economic Outlook Group.

Even so, Mr. Baumohl added, the Fed may find it difficult to raise interest rates just as workers are starting to see real wage gains. "It's taken so long for workers to catch up, that you really don't want to terminate that abrupt increase in income. The Fed is going to have to be very careful here."

Yet, according to some economists, the Fed will not be faced with that decision because the labor market is about to take a turn for the worse as the boost from cheaper gas and the warm winter weather starts to fade.

"I think we'll be looking at softer numbers," said Jan Hatzius, chief United States economist at Goldman Sachs, "especially to the extent that you've gotten some help from weather. And there's going to be payback for that. What it means is that seasonal layoffs in the winter weren't as significant as they have been in past winters. And there's going to be less seasonal hiring in the spring."

DOJ_NMG_0127943

The job figures, part of the Labor Department's monthly employment report, underscored how the housing slump is still putting a drag on the economy. Last month, home builders and related businesses cut 11,400 jobs.

Still, other sectors have not followed housing down, as many economists had feared. For instance, hiring in commercial construction offset many of the losses in housing, and the construction industry as a whole posted a gain of 22,000 jobs.

Some of the sectors doing the most hiring in January were health care and social assistance (24,500 new jobs), food services (21,000 jobs) and government (14,000).

Cuts to blue-collar work forces were some of the deepest last month. Manufacturing continued to drag, losing a net 16,000 jobs in the month. Those losses were concentrated in the automobile industry, where carmakers and auto parts manufacturers eliminated 23,000 jobs. In all of 2006, auto and auto parts manufacturers shed more than 83,000 jobs, the government reported.

Despite Recent Oil-Price Rally, Stock Investors Hold On (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

If stock investors could spare a blanket, they might want to throw it on crude-oil prices, which are rising again. For now, they seem to be using their blankets to keep warm.

After a selloff in crude to begin 2007, colder weather throughout much of the U.S. has sent the commodity surging anew, up nearly 17% from its mid-January lows.

But while higher oil prices usually hurt stocks because of the impact of energy costs on businesses and consumers, this oil rally hasn't sent investors into a panic. Even after a small decline Friday, the Dow Jones Industrial Average is up 1.5% for the year after closing at a record Thursday.

Investors figure at less than $60 a barrel, off 23% from the midsummer high, oil prices aren't so bad. Still, they are paying attention to oil again, wary that if crude's rise continues, it could eventually hurt corporate profits.

"More than anything else, the effect of the oil price is very psychological," for both investors and consumers, says analyst Fadel Gheit, of brokerage firm Oppenheimer & Co. He says a return to retail gasoline prices over $3 a gallon could set off more conservation by consumers and possibly a stock selloff. For now, that scenario doesn't seem much of a risk.

After a rally in oil prices Friday, prices at the service station could be on the way up. Forecasts for cold weather and buying by traders who often like to guard against adverse news over the weekend sent crude prices up $1.72, or 3%, to $59.02 a barrel -- the highest finish so far this year. That trimmed oil futures' decline for 2007 to 3.3%.

The rally helped push the Dow lower Friday, though it had its best week in more than two months. The average fell 20.19 points Friday, or 0.2%, to 12653.49, up 1.3% for the week. Higher energy prices generally concern investors because they believe that when consumers spend more at the pump, it leaves fewer dollars to spend on other products and services.

Other stock indicators rose Friday. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index edged up 0.2%, or 2.45 points, to 1448.39, a six-year high and up 2.1% on the year. It rose 1.8% for the week. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.3%, or 7.50 points, to 2475.88, up 1.7% for the week and 2.5% on the year.

Stocks were also held in check by the Labor Department's release of weaker-than-expected weekly employment data. Other economic signals were more upbeat. Measures of both consumer confidence and factory orders were up for December.

"The economy is stronger than most people think," says strategist James Paulsen of Wells Capital Management. "I don't think oil is down from [its summer highs] near $80 because the economy has slowed. If anything, it's accelerated."

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed; bonds rose. The 10-year note gained 2/32 point, or 62.50 cents per $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.828%.

The dollar strengthened, to 121.04 yen, compared with 120.71. The euro fell against it to $1.2967, from $1.3020.

Jobs Report Brings A Tepid End To A Strong Week (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

Wall Street ended a strong week narrowly mixed yesterday as the market absorbed a weaker-than-expected employment report that curbed investors' bullish sentiment after three straight days of gains.

The January jobs report, which showed the country's unemployment rate at a four-month high of 4.6 percent, came as a surprise on Wall Street. A reading of 4.5 percent had been expected. The Labor Department report signaled that employers were more cautious than expected in adding jobs in the new year. The economy added 111,000 jobs last month, below the 150,000 that had been expected.

DOJ_NMG_0127944

Investors also received word from the Commerce Department that factory orders showed their biggest gain in nine months in December, rising 2.4 percent.

"They're by no means terrible numbers here," said Andy Richman, fixed-income strategist at SunTrust Bank's personal asset management arm. He said the readings indicate that the Federal Reserve's strategy of standing pat on interest rates is working.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 20.19 points, or 0.16 percent, to 12,653.49.

Broader stock indicators were higher. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 2.45 points, or 0.17 percent, to 1,448.39, its highest level in more than six years, and the Nasdaq composite index advanced 7.50 points, or 0.30 percent, to 2,475.88.

For the week, the Dow was up 1.33 percent, while the Nasdaq gained 1.66 percent and the S.& P., 1.84 percent.

Bonds were little changed, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury note up 4/32, at 9815/32, and the yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, falling to 4.82 percent, from 4.84 percent late Thursday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices fell.

Light crude oil settled up $1.72, at $59.02 a barrel, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Crude prices have risen this week on political concerns in the Middle East, and cold weather in the northeastern United States.

In a week full of corporate profit reports, the Fed's decision on interest rates and the jobs report stood out, and, as expected, played the greatest role in shaping investor sentiment.

The central bank's decision to leave short-term interest rates unchanged and its comments that the economy remains solid and that inflation appears to be in check helped drive stocks higher.

The Dow and the Russell 2000 index of smaller companies set closing highs Thursday.

The meandering trading yesterday after three days of gains was somewhat typical of Wall Street's behavior in the new year as run-ups have often been accompanied by a session or more of contemplation in which investors try to determine whether stocks are poised to move higher.

In corporate news, the Internet retailer Amazon.com fell $1.31, or 3.4 percent, to $37.39, after the company's fourth-quarter profit fell and raised concerns about thinning profit margins.

Intuitive Surgical rose $17.45, or 17.6 percent, to $116.77 after profit at the company, which makes robotic surgical gear, fell but came in better than Wall Street expected.

The video game publisher Electronic Arts rose 59 cents, to $51.13, after the company's fourth-quarter earnings handily topped Wall Street's expectations.

Chevron fell 43 cents, to $74.04, after the company posted a decline in its fourth-quarter profit amid lower energy prices.

CA, the maker of business information software, rose $1.69, or 6.8 percent, to $26.69, after it raised its 2007 sales forecast.

The drop in gold prices pushed shares of mining companies lower. Barrick Gold fell 31 cents, to $29.98; Goldcorp fell 88 cents, or 3.1 percent, to $27.22.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average rose 0.16 percent.

The Current "Depression" (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

The good economic news keeps rolling in. Yesterday's new-jobs estimate for January, at 110,000, was below Wall Street expectations but it was accompanied by upward revisions of 81,000 jobs for the prior two months. Those revisions brought the 2006 monthly average up to 187,000 new jobs, or 2.2 million for the year.

Readers will recall that the current expansion was derided right through 2004 as a "jobless recovery." We now know the economy has created 7.4 million new jobs since mid-2003, as revisions by the Bureau of Labor Statistics have added hundreds of thousands to its original monthly estimates. Thus the hand-wringers have had no choice but to move on, turning their laments to allegedly "stagnant wages." Well, that's now vanishing too.

Let's look at the record of this expansion compared with that of the sainted 1990s. Economist Michael Darda has been looking at the numbers, and yesterday he put out a side-by-side employment comparison of the first five years of the 1991-2000 expansion with the current one that began in the fourth quarter of 2001.

Between 1991 and 1996, the unemployment rate averaged 6.4%, compared with 5.4% from 2001 to 2006. Today's jobless rate is now down to 4.6%. As for real (inflation-adjusted) wage growth, it averaged 0.6% annually for non-farm workers in the first half of the 1990s compared with 1.5% a year so far in this decade. "This cycle as a whole has witnessed twice the average real wage growth than the first 64 months of the previous expansion," Mr. Darda writes. For the last 12 months, real wages have risen even faster, at a 1.7% clip.

DOJ_NMG_0127945

Anything else to worry about? Well, there's always the "trade deficit," though exports are now booming (up 10% last year), especially to the countries with which the U.S. has signed free-trade agreements. So moving right along, this week's bad news is said to be the U.S. "savings rate," which according to the official measure was "negative" for a whole calendar year for the first time "since the Great Depression," as Martin Crutsinger of the Associated Press helpfully put it. Hooverville, here we come!

As a statistic, however, the official "savings rate" is nearly as useless a guide to prosperity as the trade deficit. In the government accounts, what is called the savings rate is literally income less consumption. But the government defines income too narrowly and consumption broadly. For example, "income" doesn't measure capital gains (whether realized or not), the rising value of your home, or even increases in your retirement accounts.

Think about how you calculate your own personal "savings rate." Do you merely add up what you make in salary in a year minus what you spend? Or do you sneak a peak at whether your IRA increased in value, or check the sale price your neighbor got on his home to figure out what you might be able to get for yours? By any normal definition, "savings" should include your increase in total assets -- in other words, your gains in overall wealth.

For our part, these columns long ago began to watch a far more instructive figure known as "household net worth." That number, released by the Federal Reserve, includes all assets (tangible and financial) held by individuals less their liabilities (mortgage and other debt). At the end of last year's third quarter, U.S. household net worth had climbed to $54.1 trillion. That was an increase of more than $3 trillion over the previous four quarters. Rest assured, that's a much higher figure than during "the Great Depression," AP notwithstanding.

None of this means we should be complacent about economic growth. There are two genuine clouds on the horizon -- namely, inflation risk and political risk. Inflation remains somewhat higher than is comfortable, and we still expect the Fed will consider further interest-rate hikes if today's weak dollar and soaring commodity prices lead to a jump in the official inflation indicators later this year. As for politics, the Democrats now running Congress explicitly reject the tax cuts and freer trade that have helped to propel the current prosperity. If history is any guide, sooner or later this is a recipe for trouble.

DNC Turns Focus To White House (WP)

By Dan Balz, Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

With Congress in their control and their eyes now on the White House, Democratic Party leaders took their first look at the party's field of presidential candidates yesterday at a forum in which the three front-runners presented their positions on Iraq and jockeyed over who can defeat the Republicans in 2008.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York presented herself as a tough, experienced pragmatist. Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois offered himself as an inspirational critic of politics as usual. And former senator John Edwards of North Carolina made himself the keeper of the Democratic flame, delivering a call for Democrats to reclaim their heritage.

Addressing the Democratic National Committee's winter meeting, Clinton put further distance between herself and President Bush on Iraq. "I want to be very clear about this," she said. "If I had been president in October of 2002, I would not have started this war. . . . If we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president, I will."

For Clinton, who supported the 2002 resolution authorizing the U.S. invasion and then defended the mission long after the initial combat phase ended, the pledge to stop the war represented another break with Bush's Iraq policies.

Edwards drew a rousing reception with a sharp attack on Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq and a populist appeal for Democrats to return to their roots as defenders of the union workers, the poor and struggling middle-class families. "Brothers and sisters, in times like these, we don't need to redefine the Democratic Party," he said. "We need to reclaim the Democratic Party."

Obama stated that he had repeatedly spoken out against the war before the invasion in 2003, but he pitched most of his message in a different direction. Warning that campaigns should be about more than skeletons in the candidates' closets and gaffes along the way, he urged Democrats to fight against the cynicism that he said has turned politics into a blood sport and has blocked consensus and cooperation on solving the country's problems.

"There are those who don't believe in talking about hope," he said. "They say, 'Well, we want specifics, we want details and we want white papers, we want plans.' We've had lots of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope. And over the next year, over the next two years, that will be my call to you."

The audience that filled the large ballroom at the Hilton Washington Hotel whooped and cheered and often rose to their feet in response to the candidates' rhetoric.

DOJ_NMG_0127946

Besides the three front-runners, three other candidates also spoke yesterday: Connecticut Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, a former general chairman of the DNC, and two veterans of the 2004 campaign, retired Army Gen. Wesley K. Clark and Ohio Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich.

Today, the Democrats will hear from Delaware Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., whose campaign began in controversy and apology this week over a comment in which he described Obama as "articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy." Others on today's schedule include New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack and former Alaska senator Mike Gravel.

Yesterday's speakers refrained from attacking each other, using the forum as a brief opportunity to sound the main themes of their campaigns and distinguish themselves from their rivals.

Clinton described herself to party leaders as the Democrat best equipped to take on the Republicans in 2008. "I know a thing or two about winning campaigns," she said. "When our party and our candidates are attacked, we have got to stand up and fight back. . . . I know how they think, how they act and how to defeat them."

The candidates agreed on expanding health care and reducing dependence on foreign oil, but at times, yesterday's event sounded like an echo of candidate forums in 2003-04, with Iraq still the dominant issue and the Democrats debating what to do next.

Dodd, the leadoff speaker, demanded that Democrats, who now control Congress, do more than pass a nonbinding resolution on Iraq that is soon to be up for debate.

"Frankly, I am disappointed that we can't find a way to do more than send a meaningless message to the White House -- a White House, I would add, that has said it will ignore anything that we have to say about the war in Iraq," Dodd said. "The American people sent us a message this past November; the voters were clear. They want a change in the policy in Iraq."

Edwards, who made no reference to his initial support for the war while he was in the Senate, called for Democrats to block the troop buildup, quoting the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.'s words during the Vietnam War that "silence is betrayal." But he said the White House is counting on Democrats not to fight the new deployments.

"They don't think we have the backbone and courage to stand up to them," he said. "They don't think we are in this to stop the escalation of this war and to bring our men and women home from Iraq. They're counting on us to be weak, to be political and to be careful. This is not the time for political calculation."

Clinton defended efforts to pass a bipartisan, nonbinding resolution putting Congress on record in opposition to the president's new plan. To scattered antiwar protests, she said, "There are many people who wish we could do more, but let me say that if we can get a large, bipartisan vote to disapprove this president's plan for escalation, that will be the first time that we will have said no to President Bush and began to reverse his policies."

Obama, who called this week for combat troops to be out of Iraq by March 31, 2008, said criticism of the president alone is no longer a sufficient strategy for Democrats. "It was enough to run against George Bush during this past congressional election," he said. "It will not be enough now. . . . Every candidate for office in the next election should put forward in clear, unambiguous, uncertain terms exactly how they plan to get out of Iraq."

Clark, who has not set up a campaign committee, offered sharp criticism of the administration for "condoning torture, using rendition and these secrete detention camps, by creating a sense of callous disregard for the innocent lives lost in that conflict and by taking us to an unnecessary war in the first place."

Kucinich, who opposed the war, said Congress now should end it by cutting off funds. "Democrats have an obligation to reclaim Congress's constitutional power to end the war," he said.

Democratic Hopefuls Split Over The Best Path To Peace (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney, Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — To shouts and cheers from thousands of Democrats assembled here, the party's leading presidential contenders condemned President Bush's war in Iraq on Friday but sharply differed over how to end it — and particularly whether Democrats should settle for a nonbinding resolution expressing the Senate's opposition to Mr. Bush's war policies.

The debate played out before an electrified audience of Democratic National Committee members who are eagerly anticipating the presidential race of 2008, and clearly cheered by the last election results. But the event spotlighted divisions among three leading contenders for the party's nomination — Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards — over how the party should seek to end the war.

It was Mrs. Clinton, the Democratic senator from New York who voted for the war and has since turned against it, who drew the most attention. Talking over a handful of hecklers, she argued that a bipartisan resolution, supported by a large number of senators and soon to be debated on the Senate floor, was the most powerful way for Congress to begin the process of blocking Mr. Bush from moving ahead with his plan to send 21,000 more troops to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0127947

To this audience of hard-core Democrats, which has been against the war since Howard Dean rocketed to fame at a similar meeting four years ago by denouncing Democratic supporters of Mr. Bush's Iraq policy, Mrs. Clinton offered her toughest language yet as she sought to distance herself from the war.

"I want to be very clear about this: If I had been president in October of 2002, I would not have started this war," Mrs. Clinton said, her voice echoing across the ballroom at the Washington Hilton as thousands of delegates watched her image on two flickering video screens that flanked her lectern.

"If we in Congress don't end this war before January of 2009, as president I will," she said.

But Mrs. Clinton faced strong opposition from the left in the form of Mr. Edwards, a former senator from North Carolina, who said that his former colleagues should not support the nonbinding resolution next week and should instead vote for measures to cut off funds for the war.

"This is not the time for political calculation," said Mr. Edwards, who voted for the war in 2002 and renounced his vote before beginning his second bid for the presidency. "This is the time for political courage."

"They're counting on us to be weak, to be political and to be careful," he said of the White House.

Mr. Obama, a senator from Illinois, said earlier this week that he was likely to support the resolution, but he made no reference to it at the meeting with Democrats. Instead, drawing clear contrasts with Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Edwards, Mr. Obama noted that he had opposed the war from the start.

"I was opposed to this invasion — publicly, frequently, before it began," Mr. Obama said to waves of cheers and applause. "I thought it was a tragic mistake. But whether you were for it or against it then, we all have a responsibility now to put forth a plan that offers the best chance of ending the bloodshed and bringing the troops home."

Over Friday and Saturday, the Democratic National Committee will hear from 10 Democrats who are — or may be — running for president. The order of the candidates was decided by a draw. To the luck of committee members, the three candidates who have drawn the most interest all spoke Friday morning, providing a revealing palette of comparisons and drawing thousands of Democrats.

The other prospective candidates who spoke were Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut. Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio and Wesley Clark, the retired Army general.

The meeting had all the energy and pizazz of a political convention: candidates had supporters (some more than others), bumper stickers, placards. Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton took the stage to the flicker of camera flashes in the audience.

"Love you!" one woman shouted out to Mr. Obama.

"I love you back," he said, flashing a grin.

Mr. Obama, Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Edwards all drew a notably warm reception. None stirred the kind of wild response that Mr. Dean did in 2003, but, as several Democrats noted, the reaction from this crowd of party insiders may be one of the most imprecise ways of measuring who is most likely to win the Democratic presidential nomination.

Mr. Obama spent little time on Iraq, instead arguing that the biggest opponent candidates face this year is not one another but cynicism.

"It's a cynicism that asks us to believe that our opponents are never just wrong, that they're bad; that our motives in politics can never be pure, that they're only driven by power and by greed; that the challenges that we face today aren't just daunting, but they're impossible," he said. "And if this is true, then politics is not a noble calling, it's a game; it's a blood sport with folks keeping score about who's up and who's down."

Mr. Obama suggested that in this environment, people should not look to campaigns for dry lists of programs. "There are those who don't believe in talking about hope. They say, 'Well, we want specifics; we want details; we want white papers; we want plans.' We've had a lot of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope."

Mrs. Clinton, speaking over isolated shouts of "cut the funding," argued that the nonbinding resolution was the most effective way to counter Mr. Bush's attempt to send more troops to Iraq. She said that as of now, war opponents did not have enough votes to override a veto on legislation to cut funds or, as she and others have proposed, to cap the number of troops.

"There are many people who wish we could do more, but let me say that if we can get a large bipartisan vote to disapprove this president's plan for escalation, that will be the first time that we will have said no to President Bush and begin to reverse his policies," she said.

Mr. Edwards called the resolution meaningless.

"It is a betrayal not to stop this president's plan to escalate the war when we have the responsibility, the power and the ability to stop it," he said. "We cannot be satisfied with passing nonbinding resolutions that we know this president will ignore."

DOJ_NMG_0127948

And Mr. Dodd echoed that position. “Frankly, I am disappointed that we can’t find a way to do more than send a meaningless message to the White House,” he said.

Edwards Continues Swipes At Senate White House Rivals (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, February 2, 2007

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards continued to move to the left of his leading presidential rivals Friday, saying Senate Democrats' efforts at passing a non-binding resolution are "not enough."

Saying repeatedly that "silence is betrayal," Edwards argued that Senate Democrats, two of whom spoke before and after him at the Democratic National Committee's Winter Meeting, are being too timid in engaging the White House on the Iraq War.

"They are counting on us to be weak, to be political, to be careful," Edwards said. "This is not the time for political calculation."

The Democratic vice presidential candidate of 2004 clearly targeted his main competitors, Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.), in his remarks. Befitting their frontrunner status, both received rousing receptions at the meeting Friday.

However, Clinton's speech was interrupted by anti-war protesters with the group Code Pink, who shouted at the former first lady to bring the troops home and get behind a binding resolution.

Clinton addressed their concerns to a point, but said though she wished she could do more, Democrats still don't have enough votes in the Senate, despite their new majority.

Clinton instead chose to focus on the past and the future of the increasingly unpopular war.

"If I had been president in October 2002, I would not have started this war," Clinton said. She later added, "If we in Congress don't end the war before January 2009, as president, I will."

Obama for the most part stayed away from the substantive points of disagreement on the war, saying only it should not have been started. He instead focused on a message of hope over cynicism and made a plea for thoughtful debate on the issues.

"It's going to be cynicism we're up against," Obama said, adding later, "The times we're in are too serious to let the cynics win this time."

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), the only sitting senator and White House candidate to speak Friday morning who declared he will not support a non-binding resolution, said he wanted Senate Democrats to go further than what is being proposed.

"A real bill with real teeth and real accountability is what is needed," Dodd said.

Dodd, who was joined by about 25 vocal supporters waving his campaign signs, asked the gathered committee members, guests and media not to overlook his campaign in the crowded field.

"I'm standing before you to ask you to give me a chance," Dodd said. "Give me a chance to be heard."

Retired Gen. Wesley Clark, the only potential 2008 candidate speaking who had not filed papers either to form an exploratory committee or declare an all-out bid, played coy after his speech, saying only, "I haven't said I won't."

The Winter Meeting is scheduled to continue Saturday morning when Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.), former Sen. Mike Gravel (D-Alaska), New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) and former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) will speak.

Hillary Vows To End War (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton said yesterday she would end the Iraq war as president if the conflict was still raging when she took office.

"If we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president, I will," the New York Democrat said at the Democratic National Committee Winter Meeting here.

Iraq and economic populism were by far the dominant issues among the half-dozen presidential contenders who sought their party leadership's support at the DNC meeting. Mrs. Clinton and her chief rivals repeatedly brought the overflow crowd at the Washington Hilton to its feet in cheering each denunciation of President Bush's war policies.

After well-received speeches by Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who called for early troop withdrawal from a war they said never should have been waged, Mrs. Clinton was under pressure to stake out an equally strong policy position before the fiercely anti-war audience.

DOJ_NMG_0127949

"I want to be very clear about this: If I had been president in October 2002, I would not have started this war," said the former first lady, who has been criticized by anti-war voices for voting to authorize the war and steadfastly refusing to support calls for a military pullout.

Mrs. Clinton has refused to say her vote for the war was a mistake and has proposed a cap on troop levels instead of troop reductions. A group of anti-war hecklers could be heard in the packed hall when she talked about her support for a Senate resolution opposing Mr. Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, a resolution some of her rivals have called weak and ineffective.

But she defended the nonbinding resolution being debated in the Senate.

"I understand there is frustration and outrage," Mrs. Clinton said, adding that "if we can pass a resolution disapproving of the troop escalation, that will be the first time we said no to President Bush." She also called for cutting funds for the Iraqi army if it does not achieve certain benchmarks.

Of the three top-tier candidates, Mr. Edwards drew the strongest responses for his emotional message of economic populism as he talked of poverty in America, "children who go to bed hungry" and do not have health care -- repeating the challenging refrain: "Will you stand up for them, will you stand up for America?"

He condemned the Senate resolution challenging the troop buildup in Iraq as meaningless, and in a pointed remark that some saw as a thinly veiled criticism of Democrats such as Mrs. Clinton, he said: "This is not a time for political calculation. This is a time for political courage. We have to stand up against George Bush's escalation of this war."

Denouncing those in the party who want to change its policies to broaden its appeal to more moderate voters, Mr. Edwards said, "We don't need to redefine the Democratic Party, we need to reclaim it."

Mr. Obama, who was received like a celebrity, also condemned the war, saying that the party's candidates had "a responsibility to put forward a plan to get us out of Iraq and [end] the bloodshed." He called for a phased withdrawal from Iraq in three to four months.

But much of his speech was a more muted, reflective critique of modern-day campaigning, which he said has turned politics "into a game, a blood sport" in which one's opponents "are not just wrong, but they are bad. This is not a game, this is not about digging up skeletons. This is not a contest for TV cameras. It's a contest for America," Mr. Obama said.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut also criticized the Democrats' compromise resolution on the war.

"Frankly, I'm disappointed," Mr. Dodd said. "It's time to get our troops out of the country and we're debating a nonbinding resolution. It's time to send a bill to the president with real teeth in it."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico and former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa are scheduled to address the DNC today.

'08 Dems Split On Iraq (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Newsday, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, facing a cascade of criticism from anti-war Democrats and party rivals, further distanced herself Friday from her pro-Iraq-war vote, vowing to end the conflict quickly if she's elected president.

Speaking at the Democrats' winter conclave with eight other presidential hopefuls, Clinton argued it would be politically impossible to defund President George W. Bush's plan to increase Iraq troop levels -- even as 2008 rival John Edwards decried her position a betrayal.

"If we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president I will," said Clinton, who supports a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops and a cap on forces at 140,000, approximately the number there now.

Addressing her October 2002 vote authorizing the invasion, Clinton said, "If I had been president in October of 2002, I would not have started the war."

A majority of Americans supported the war at the time. About half the Democrats in the Senate bucked public opinion and voted against war, including current Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin (D-Michigan).

Clinton's statements didn't impress a handful of anti-war protesters who briefly interrupted her address to the Democratic National Committee. And Edwards, who has recanted his yes vote on the war and urges a quick withdrawal, demanded that the Democrat-controlled Senate force a confrontation with Bush.

"It is a betrayal not to stop the president's escalation when we have the responsibility, the power and the actual tools to prevent it," the former vice presidential candidate said in a direct challenge to Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who haven't supported efforts to defund the 21,500-troop escalation. "Being satisfied with nonbinding resolutions we know this president will ignore is a betrayal."

DOJ_NMG_0127950

The typically sleepy DNC winter meeting took on the fervid atmosphere of an auto show three months after the party seized Congress, with no less than nine prospective presidential candidates rolling onto the stage like 2008 concept cars.

At times, Edwards and Obama seemed to play tag-team against Clinton, hinting that Clintonesque calculation and caution needed to be abandoned for a bolder, more sincere approach.

"Cynicism ... caused our politics to become small and timid, calculating and cautious," Obama said. "We spend all our time thinking about tactics and maneuvers."

Echoed Edwards: "This is not the time for political calculation, this is the time for political courage."

Clinton, who postponed this weekend's trip to New Hampshire, will travel to the state Feb. 10 to 11, in a campaign that already seems to be simmering a year before the first vote is cast.

"You know, sometimes you feel like you're part of a reality TV show," Obama quipped. "You feel like this is 'American Idol' or 'Survivor.' You're trying to figure out, are you going to go to Hollywood, are you going to be voted off the island?"

Iraq Plans Divide Democratic Hopefuls (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger, Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — The 2008 Democratic presidential candidates, who have been nearly unified in support of universal healthcare, abortion rights and alternative energy, have begun an increasingly harsh debate over an issue that will probably define the early part of the campaign: when to remove troops from Iraq.

Until recently, most Democratic presidential candidates, like the party generally, found success by bashing President Bush's Iraq strategy without offering comprehensive alternatives.

But this week, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), in a departure from his own past statements, introduced legislation that would begin a phased redeployment of troops by April and require that all combat troops leave Iraq by March 2008.

Obama's announcement set him at odds with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who has declined to specify a date for the removal of all troops from Iraq. Last week, Clinton proposed placing a cap on the number of U.S. troops and threatening Iraq's government with a withdrawal of support.

Clinton's approach, in turn, drew a caustic attack this week from Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) — a noteworthy development in a campaign that had been marked by collegiality. Biden said Clinton's proposed strategy for Iraq would "produce nothing but disaster."

Also coming in for Biden's scorn was former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), who six months ago offered a plan for withdrawal and became the favorite of many antiwar activists. Edwards called for an immediate reduction of 40,000 troops, with all forces to leave the country — though not the region — within 18 months.

"John Edwards wants you and all the Democrats to think, 'I want us out of there,' but when you come back and you say, 'OK, John, what about the chaos that will ensue? Do we have any interest, John, left in the region?,' well, John will have to answer yes or no," Biden said in an interview with the New York Observer. He added: "So all this stuff is like so much Fluffernutter out there."

The jockeying and jostling over Iraq in the primary campaign were displayed anew Friday as six candidates addressed an energized crowd at the Democratic National Committee's winter meeting in Washington. The candidates drew loud applause when they condemned the Bush administration's Iraq policy.

But Clinton was interrupted by seven antiwar protesters as she spoke. She has neither repudiated her vote in favor of the war in 2002 nor backed proposals to cut off funding for the war.

Speaking over the hecklers, Clinton said: "If I had been president in October of 2002, I would not have started this war." Then she added, "If we in Congress do not end this war before January of 2009, as president I will."

But Clinton has been reluctant to specify how she would do that. She and most other Democrats have appeared more comfortable talking about their immediate opposition to Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq by 21,500.

The raucous forum Friday showed the candidates sharpening their differences over how to respond to the planned troop escalation, adding a new element to their differences over longer-term plans for Iraq and when forces should withdraw.

Clinton defended her decision to support a nonbinding bipartisan resolution opposing the troop escalation, which is expected to be debated in the Senate next week. She told the Democratic meeting that the resolution, if approved, would mark the first time Congress had taken a stand against the president over the war.

Others in the Democratic primary field said the Senate should pass something tougher.

"I am disappointed we can't find a way to do more than send a meaningless message to the White House," said Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.). "I don't believe spending a week debating a nonbinding resolution is the change that America voted for." Dodd has not advocated a specific withdrawal date but has called for drawing down forces in Iraq and cutting off funding for expansion of the war.

DOJ_NMG_0127951

Edwards also criticized the nonbinding resolution as insufficient. Obama has not yet decided whether to support it.

Obama had previously opposed setting a date for withdrawing U.S. forces from Iraq. But as conditions deteriorated, he decided, with the advice of President Bill Clinton's former national security aide Anthony Lake, to propose his legislation this week setting a timetable for the complete withdrawal of combat troops under certain circumstances. On Friday, Obama pointedly called on all candidates to offer specifics about how they would end the war.

"It was enough to run against George Bush during this past congressional election; it will not be enough now," he said. "The American people are expecting more. They want to know what we are going to do."

Biden, who is to address the winter meeting today, has offered a multipart plan that calls for Iraq to become federated states. The states would share oil revenue, but the country effectively would be divided into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish enclaves.

Once the plan was implemented, Biden says, he would hope to get most U.S. troops out of the country in 18 months.

He, like many candidates, also calls for trying to settle the sectarian differences in Iraq by engaging Iraq's neighbors, as well as major world powers.

Like Clinton, Dodd and Edwards, Biden voted for the 2002 resolution authorizing the war but has long criticized the administration's conduct of the conflict.

Democratic presidential hopefuls Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio and former Sen. Mike Gravel of Alaska have long opposed the war. Both advocate an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces.

Two Democratic governors seeking the presidency, Bill Richardson of New Mexico and Tom Vilsack of Iowa, also oppose the war.

Richardson, who supported the war's goals initially, has called for a phased withdrawal.

Vilsack says troops should be removed from much of the country, but he advocates leaving some forces along the Iranian border.

Clinton Promises To End War If Elected (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton said Friday she would not have attacked Iraq if she were president in 2002 and would end the war if elected, as she tried to blunt rivals like John Edwards who are stoking anti-war passions in the Democratic Party.

Clinton, raising her voice at one point to be heard above anti-war hecklers, suggested that calls from Edwards and others to cut off funding for President Bush's troop increase are unlikely to win approval in a narrowly divided Senate.

"Believe me, I understand the frustration and the outrage," Clinton said in a speech to the Democratic National Committee meeting that brought the party's nine White House hopefuls together for the first time. "You have to have 60 votes to cap troops, to limit funding to do anything. If we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president, I will."

The New York senator's comments were her strongest against the war and signal an effort to confront one of the biggest threats to her front-runner status. As the conflict nears the four-year mark, she has been on the opposite side of the most outspoken anti-war activists who are a force in the Democratic primaries.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois reminded the party's rank-and-file - twice - that he was against the Iraq invasion from the beginning.

"But whether you were for it or against it then, we all have a responsibility now to put forth a plan that offers the best chance of ending the bloodshed and bringing the troops home," Obama told the audience.

Edwards voted with Clinton in 2002 to authorize Bush's war against Iraq, a vote he defended during his 2004 presidential race but has since said was a mistake. The former North Carolina senator has gone from being a war apologist to one of the most outspoken critics of the invasion in this campaign.

"Silence is a betrayal," Edwards said, one of 11 times he used the word betrayal in his 18-minute speech. "It is a betrayal not to stop this president's plan to escalate the war when we have the responsibility, the power and the ability to stop it. We cannot be satisfied with passing nonbinding resolutions that we know this president will ignore."

Edwards was referring to a measure being debated in the Senate that would say lawmakers disagree with the president's decision to increase troop levels in an effort to stabilize Baghdad. Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, another 2008 candidate, also criticized the effort as meaningless.

DOJ_NMG_0127952

"I don't believe spending a week debating a nonbinding resolution is the change that America voted for" in November when Democrats won a majority in Congress, Dodd said. "With all due respect, a real bill and real teeth and real accountability is what is needed in our country again."

Clinton said while the resolution may not be perfect, it represents the first time Congress has stood against the president on the war.

"There are many people who wish we could do more," Clinton said.

"You can!" came a call from a small gathering of activists from the peace group Code Pink. Others in their group standing along a side wall chimed in, calling for a binding resolution that would end the war immediately, while some nearby audience members asked them to quiet down.

"But let me say," Clinton said, her voice rising above the din, "that if we can get a large, bipartisan vote to disapprove this president's plan for escalation, that will be the first time that we will have said no to President Bush and began to reverse his policies. Now, I want to go further."

"Bring them home, then," said a man dressed in desert camouflage that said "Iraq Veterans Against the War." Clinton said she has proposed capping U.S. troop levels and pulling funding for Iraqi forces, but won't cut funding for U.S. troops while they are on the battlefield.

"And let me add one other thing, and I want to be very clear about this," she said. "If I had been president in October of 2002, I would not have started this war."

Former Gen. Wesley Clark, who has not indicated whether he will run, said he's the only potential candidate with the battlefield experience to succeed in Iraq.

Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich called for an immediate end to the war - the same message he ran on in 2004. But it's now is being echoed by several other candidates in a stronger position to win the nomination.

Democratic 2008 Hopefuls Put On A Show (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

Barack Obama best encapsulated what the Democratic party's increasingly feverish presidential nomination contest is becoming.

"I sometimes feel you are part of a reality TV show – like American Idol or Survivor," the African-American senator from Illinois told a packed gathering of spell-bound Democratic activists in Washington on Friday.

"You wonder: are you going to be the first person to be voted off the island?"

Judging by the rock star reception he was accorded at the beauty contest of Democratic 2008 hopefuls, Mr Obama will keep the viewer ratings high until the very last moment.

With almost two years to go before George W. Bush's successor is chosen by the US electorate, media scrutiny of the nine Democratic party aspirants already resembles the final stretch. The Democratic National Committee gave each a chance to present their wares to the nation.

Following detailed ground rules more redolent of the televised presidential debates that take place in the two months before election day, candidates were permitted a maximum 100 banners each in the conference hall, they could speak for seven minutes only and introductions were limited to one minute. At times the enthusiasm was deafening.

Each candidate sought to underline the need to face up to what they presented as the epoch-moving challenges before the US of tackling global warming, providing universal health insurance to all Americans and ending the war in Iraq.

Hillary Clinton who, alone among the candidates, has not formally renounced her 2002 vote authorising Mr Bush to go to war, was periodically interrupted by anti-war hecklers.

But the former first lady, who leads Mr Obama by more than 20 points in most polls, went further on Iraq than she had gone before: "If I had been president in October 2002 I would not have started this war," she said.

"If we do not in Congress end this war by January 2009 [when the next president is inaugurated], then I will."

In spite of the long distance before the party primaries are held next January and February, it was clear that centre-left issues would dominate the nomination contest – Iraq, the economic anxieties of the middle class, the "haemorrhaging" of manufacturing jobs to China and elsewhere, healthcare and climate change.

One of the loudest cheers came when John Edwards, who ranks third in the polls behind Mr Obama and Mrs Clinton, said that it was "time to stand with the men and women of organised labour".

Mrs Clinton also drew cheers when she said the Bush administration's growing trade deficit had turned China into America's creditor: "How do you get tough on your banker?" she asked. "It is time to start standing up for the American worker."

DOJ_NMG_0127953

By far the most emphatic ovations came in response to Mr Obama's at times electrifying oratory in which he called for an end to cynicism in politics and insisted that this presidential contest should not be a "blood sport". But to judge by the mood of the parade and the state of national opinion polls, the increasingly hated war in Iraq will dominate the campaign over the next 12 months.

"This is not a game – this is not a contest for the TV cameras: it is a serious moment in America and the American people are in a sober mood," he said. "We have 130,000 young Americans fighting a war halfway round the world in Iraq that should never have been waged. We don't have time to be cynical."

Democrats Control The Hill, But Not Themselves (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Yesterday was the first cattle call of the Democratic presidential campaign and -- holy cow! -- these candidates can moo.

"Each candidate has been given seven minutes to speak," announced Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean before the first of six Democratic candidates took the stage at the Hilton Washington. He further announced that an "official timekeeper" will hold up warning and "time's up" signs. "After 10 minutes, wild gesticulations will take place," he threatened.

This quaint exercise in Democratic Party discipline lasted about, well, seven minutes. The first candidate, Sen. Chris Dodd (Conn.), took the floor for 20 minutes and 15 seconds, ignoring Dean's hovering, the removal of Dodd's image from the projection screens, and the fact that he drew applause for saying "Let me conclude." Former senator John Edwards (17:40) wasn't far behind, trailed by Sens. Hillary Clinton (16:12) and Barack Obama (15:30).

The closest to the limit was Rep. Dennis Kucinich (12:38), but this was probably because the audience treated his appearance as a chance to start conversations or to visit the restrooms. "Can you hear me in the back?" Kucinich called above the din. "Because I can hear you."

Now in control of Congress, Democrats were eager to demonstrate that they could make the trains run on time yesterday. They started the proceedings with an ROTC color guard. And Dean sternly read out the ground rules. "Each candidate was given the opportunity to play 30 seconds of music and can have up to 100 campaign signs evenly placed around the room."

But the Democratic National Committee is not exactly a precision drill team. The first speaker, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, wasn't ready when his time came to speak. Clinton, for her part, showed flagrant disregard for Dean's sign restrictions; her supporters hoisted about 300. And although most candidates chose the usual favorites for their theme music ("Our Country," "America the Beautiful"), Dodd went with the Temptations:

If you want to play hide and seek with love let me remind you (It's all right)

The lovin' you're gonna miss in the time it takes to find you. (It's outta sight)

But even in the confusion, the candidates found ways to establish a pecking order. Obama, rock star of the pack, got nearly a minute and a half of applause, leaving Edwards in the dust with just 30 seconds. Kucinich, who unintentionally drew laughter when he referred to 2009 and "my inauguration as president," used his brief moments on the stage to mention his third wife, Elizabeth -- seven times.

Reid, though not technically under the seven-minute rule, opened the proceedings with a poor example. After a 10-minute speech, Reid said "Thank you very much" and earned a lengthy standing ovation. But to the surprise of many in the hall, Reid remained at the lectern. "I want to talk a little bit about the West," he announced, rambling on for eight more minutes.

Four years ago at another DNC winter meeting, Dean's presidential ambitions soared with his famous claim to represent the "Democratic wing of the Democratic Party." Yesterday, the remarks were more lengthy than lofty.

Dodd, in his Phil Donohue hairdo, opened by noting that "sometimes, the introductions go on longer than my remarks." Not this time. He went on about Bill Clinton, Franklin Roosevelt and his 2-year-old daughter. At 10 minutes, he offered what could have been a rousing finale: "We're not going to take fear for an answer any longer in America."

During the applause, Dean stood up and attempted to reclaim the microphone. But Dodd wouldn't budge. As the timekeeper raised the red "TIME" sign repeatedly over the next 10 minutes, Dodd quickened his pace and added phrases such as "Let me also add here quickly."

Obama, next up, was already two minutes over his time when he proclaimed, "We don't have time to be cynical." By 13 minutes, he seemed to have tired himself out, for he announced that candidates should put forward their Iraq plans in "clear, unambiguous, uncertain terms."

Retired Gen. Wes Clark, who turned in a respectable time of 13:35, gave the impression that somebody had told him he had been insufficiently emotional. "It feels great," he announced. Also: "I feel that pain." And: "Makes me sad. But also, I get impassioned. To be honest with you, I get a little bit angry." And, finally: "We must also be strong."

DOJ_NMG_0127954

Edwards must have thought he said "long." Two minutes over his time limit, Edwards stated his already-obvious view that "silence is betrayal." Four minutes over time, Edwards announced that "we cannot walk away" -- then remained planted for several more minutes.

After the Kucinich intermission, Clinton greeted the crowd with an announcement: "I'm here to start a conversation with our country." A couple of audience members took that offer seriously, and, eight minutes into Clinton's speech, began heckling her about Iraq. This made Clinton's speech louder, not shorter. "I've been fighting for more than 35 years," she said after talking for more than 13 minutes.

The timekeeper stood up and raised the red sign. Dean rose from his chair and stood at Clinton's shoulder. The candidate, having used 230 percent of her allotted time, surrendered the microphone.

DNC Backing Expected For D.C. Vote In House (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

The Democratic National Committee is expected to throw its support today behind legislation to give the District a full seat in the House of Representatives, kicking off a grass-roots lobbying effort to get it passed.

A resolution in favor of the bill will be considered today at the group's winter meeting in Washington. It has the backing of party leaders, including DNC Chairman Howard Dean.

Donna Brazile, who authored the resolution and ran Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign, said the DNC's action "will allow us to begin a 50-state campaign" in which party supporters urge their legislators to vote for the bill.

The D.C. voting rights bill, reintroduced last month, has sparked hopes among city activists and politicians that the District could get a full seat in the House after decades of seeking more representation. The measure would permanently add two seats to the House -- one for the District, which is heavily Democratic, and the other for Utah, a Republican stronghold. The District would still not have voting senators.

The District's congressional delegate, Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), can vote only in committees and on amendments to legislation. She co-sponsored the bill with Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who has been trying to line up Republican support.

Norton met Thursday with Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and other House leaders, who are grappling with Democrats' concerns about the bill. Some are concerned that the measure awards Utah an extra electoral college vote and leaves the District's electoral votes unchanged.

Party members also worry that Utah's only Democratic congressman, Rep. Jim Matheson, could be hurt politically if the state's districts are redrawn to add an extra seat. There is no set timetable for hearings on the bill.

Democrats have long supported the principle of D.C. voting rights. "What's different now is the DNC is endorsing a specific resolution of that question," said Ilir Zherka, executive director of advocacy group D.C. Vote.

Brazile, the chairwoman of the DNC Voting Rights Institute and a former Norton chief of staff, said she hoped that after the resolution passed, Dean would write to every member of Congress urging them to back the legislation.

In addition, she said, the party could "utilize not just their enormous mailing list, but their ability to help galvanize Democrats" at a grass-roots level, working with groups such as MoveOn.org.

Norman J. Ornstein, a political expert at the American Enterprise Institute, said it was unclear how effective a grass-roots campaign for the legislation would be.

"MoveOn.org is going to be, first, consumed by the war, and after that, probably by the presidential campaign," he said.

But, he added, Brazile's involvement was significant. "She's got credibility out there," he said.

Asked to comment, MoveOn.org official Noah Winer said the group "fully supports full voting representation in Congress for D.C. and what Donna Brazile is doing."

Although Democrats control both houses of Congress, the bill's passage is far from assured. It would need 60 votes to avoid a filibuster in the Senate. Republicans have been divided over the measure, with some saying that a full seat for the District would be unconstitutional.

Norton has been pressing to get the bill to the House floor by next month. Democratic congressional staffs are examining ways to fine-tune it before sending it to the Judiciary and Government Reform committees.

House leadership is leaning toward a change in the legislation to make the potential new Utah seat at-large, in order to protect Matheson, according to a Democratic aide close to the discussions. Leaders also are weighing the possibility of adding the House seats next year, to avoid special elections.

Utah has been seeking an extra seat since the 2000 Census, when it fell just short of the numbers needed to expand its delegation. State lawmakers argued that thousands of Utah's Mormon missionaries working abroad should have been counted.

DOJ_NMG_0127955

Sen. Clinton To Visit New Hampshire Next Week (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 3, 2007

MANCHESTER – Presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton will visit the state in a week, after cancelling an appearance this weekend due to a death in the family.

The announcement of a Granite State visit comes as a new poll showed Clinton remains very much in the good graces of the state's likely Democratic Presidential primary voters.

Clinton will be in the state Feb. 9 and 10 to "begin her conversation with New Hampshire residents," her Presidential exploratory committee announced.

Details of the visit were not released.

The survey this week by the Manchester-based American Research Group shows that the New York senator and former first lady widened her lead over Illinois Sen. Barack Obama in the first-in-the-nation primary state by 14 percentage points in the past month.

The same poll found Republican Arizona Sen. John McCain slightly widening the lead he had last month over Rudolph Giuliani, but it also found former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney now tied with the former New York mayor and within striking distance of McCain.

The primary campaign is quickly gearing up, but the election is many months off and Granite State voters are just beginning to take a good look.

"I fully expect these numbers to move around a lot as the year goes on," said American Research Group president Dick Bennett. But here is how the races set up:

Among Democrats, Clinton leads Obama, 39 to 19 percent, with former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards at 13 percent. No other candidate received more than 2 percent, and 21 percent of likely Democratic primary voters were undecided.

Among Republicans, McCain receives support from 27 percent of likely GOP primary voters, followed by Romney and Giuliani at 20 percent each, and former House speaker Newt Gingrich at 11 percent. No other candidate drew more than 1 percent, while 21 percent of likely Republican primary voters were undecided.

Pollster Dick Bennett said his firm surveyed 600 likely voters in each party primary between Jan. 31 and Feb. 1. The margin of error is 4 percent.

In ARG's late December poll, Clinton drew 27 percent; Obama, 21 percent; and Edwards 18 percent, while McCain received 29 percent compared to 25 percent for Giuliani - a statistical dead heat - and 9 percent for Romney.

Since the December poll, top-tier candidates Romney, Giuliani, Clinton, Obama and Edwards filed Presidential exploratory committees. McCain had filed a committee in November.

Clinton has received heavy national and New Hampshire-based media attention since she announced, "I'm in."

She cancelled this weekend's visit in order to attend the funeral of her father-in-law, Dick Kelley.

Bennett said Clinton's chief strength is women voters, who, he said, made up 57 percent of the likely Democratic primary voter sample in the random survey. He said Clinton was backed by 43 percent of the women and 33 percent of the men in the sample. Obama was supported by 15 percent of the men and 24 percent of the women polled, while Edwards was supported by 15 percent of the women and 11 percent of the men in the sample.

Bennett said 68 percent of the likely Democratic primary voters said they were registered as Democrats, while 32 percent said they were registered independents. Clinton was supported by 39 percent of the Democrats and 39 percent of the independents, while Obama was supported by 23 percent of the Democrats and 12 percent of the independents. Edwards received support from 13 percent of the Democrats and 11 percent of the independents.

Bennett said Clinton has helped herself by leaving no question that she is a candidate when she filed her exploratory committee, while Giuliani has been less certain.

"Giuliani says he is unsure, yet, and gives what voters view as an obtuse answer to the question of whether he is in," Bennett said. "That hurts him because you have McCain and Romney, who are both clear that they are in."

Bennett said Giuliani had "a perfect opportunity in front of the perfect audience" of Republican State Committee members last weekend to say with certainty that he will be a candidate.

"He didn't pull the trigger and that hurt him. People want their President to be definitive," Bennett said. "His numbers among Republicans will probably improve if and when he announces."

McCain, meanwhile, has lost much support from independents since last spring, Bennett's poll indicates.

Bennett said the drop is probably due to McCain's support of the Bush administration's position on the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0127956

Bennett said his April 2006 poll showed that 54 percent of likely New Hampshire Republican primary voters backed McCain. By December, 29 percent of independent votes backed him, and now, 25 percent support him.

Giuliani is supported by 24 percent of independent Republican primary voters in the new poll, while Romney is backed by 17 percent.

Among Republican primary voters who say they are registered Republicans, McCain received 28 percent, Romney received 21 percent, Giuliani is at 18 percent and Gingrich is at 14 percent.

Another New Hampshire poll released earlier this week showed Giuliani and McCain tied and Clinton with a substantial lead. The SurveyUSA poll, completed for WBZ-TV in Boston, was taken Jan. 26-28.

Among 582 self-identified likely Democratic primary voters, Clinton led Obama 40 to 25 percent, with Edwards at 23 percent. Among 412 likely Republican primary voters, Giuliani received 33 percent, McCain, 32 percent, and Romney, 21 percent.

What Hillary's Humor Reveals (LAT)

By Meghan Daum

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

THIS WEEK, Hillary Clinton tried out a joke in Iowa. "We face a lot of evil men," she told voters in Davenport. "People like Osama bin Laden come to mind. And what in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?" Clinton then smiled big and chortled, cueing the audience that this was not an oral presentation in a women's studies class but, indeed, a joke.

Questioned later by reporters, who weren't sure if they got it, Clinton said: "You guys keep telling me, 'Lighten up! Be funny!' I get a little funny and now I'm being psychoanalyzed."

The clip made the expected blogospheric rounds and wound up on "The Daily Show," but I think the only psychoanalysis this incident warrants is an examination of just why Clinton's search for a sense of humor has been tougher than locating a lost contact lens in the Dead Sea.

Surely it shouldn't be this hard. Just about every profile ever written about her has quoted friends and colleagues who point out her sense of humor, frequently prefaced with the word "wicked." Where's all that cutting hilarity when the world is telling her to "lighten up?"

It's possible, I suppose, that Clinton's friends' taste in humor is such that coy jabs at her husband (or could it be Newt? Or Kenneth Starr? Or President Bush himself?) passes for biting wit. But it's more likely that her flat footedness is a symptom of a double standard that rarely comes up in conversations about the challenges faced by powerful women. If there's anything that can hinder a woman's credibility faster than becoming visibly pregnant or getting caught watching Lifetime, it's revealing the ability to be genuinely funny.

Of course, in politics, men have never exactly given Oscar Wilde a run for his money either. Considering that, in 1996, Bob Dole was the wryest guy on the national campaign trail since, well, all the other times he ran for president or vice president, we should know better than to expect constant knee-slappers from these folks, at least intentional ones. But Clinton's problems have been thrown into high relief because her chief competitor for the Democratic presidential nomination, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, appears to be as charismatic as she is stiff.

Obama has yet to let his handlers drive him into poll-driven blandness; so far, he looks like a natural. And although we don't know whether he has the chops to sell himself as president, his body language suggests that he's not working quite as hard as Clinton is. Stoop-shouldered and never quite sure what to do with his hands, Obama resembles the goofy math geek whom the girls had secret crushes on in high school because he made them laugh.

Clinton, hyper-focused wonk that she is, has a personality that has long appeared to be the product of focus groups and advisors from the Professor Henry Higgins Finishing School for Formerly Radical Broads. She has been so ravaged by the media, the public and, it would seem, her own perfectionism that she comes across less as a human being than as a historical figure whose legacy depends on keeping her humanity out of the equation.

It's possible she's right about that. But the fact that we're seeing a black candidate who seems infinitely more relaxed with himself than his female competitor speaks volumes about just how much we're likely to punish women who step outside the bounds of corporate-flavored gravitas.

Part of this is Clinton's own fault — the very act of saying "you keep telling me to be funny" is depressing evidence of her burdensome self-consciousness. But then again, female humor is easily bent into the worst cliches about women. Funny men, after all, are considered smart, confident and sexy. But wisecracking chicks risk accusations of bitterness, hormonal instability and the assumption (no matter what they look like) that they're using wit to compensate for physical unattractiveness.

As a result, a lot of ambitious women have been conditioned not only to tone the comedy down (remember the old dating adage, "Laugh at his jokes, but don't be funnier than him"?) but to resist witty self-deprecation, a genre that some old-school feminists were too tin-eared to interpret as anything other than a sign of low self-esteem. What's left is stridency, earnestness and painstakingly rehearsed jokes ripe for reducing to male-bashing sound bites. The effect: the Cathy comic strip character with a campaign bus. Ouch.

DOJ_NMG_0127957

Is Clinton funny deep down? I'm willing to bet she is, only because I doubt she could have survived the last 15 years without either a sense of humor or a serious Quaalude habit. But I'd also bet most of us will never see it, no matter how hard she tries. Even if she learns how to tell a joke, the colluding forces of media savagery, Washington banality and a culture in which female power is not yet entirely compatible with having a real personality will render her something less than human. Will it cost her the nomination? Who knows. But it's already cost her much more than that.

Mobilized Online, Thousands Gather To Hear Obama (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

At his first rally since announcing his presidential exploratory committee, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) appealed yesterday for support from the young people who had mobilized for the event online.

The gathering of several thousand students at George Mason University in Fairfax underscored the potential power of online communities in the 2008 campaign. Its genesis was a group created last summer on Facebook.com, a Web site frequented by college students who post profiles and assemble virtually.

Barack Obama for President in 2008 now has more than 50,000 members, and its founders have created an offline presidential draft committee, Students for Barack Obama.

"This is a remarkable achievement, a remarkable event that speaks to what young people can do when they put their minds together," said Obama, who is scheduled to officially announce his candidacy next Saturday in Springfield, Ill.

"No one is more cynical about politics than young people," he said, adding that they would not tolerate "a politics that's all about slash and burn, nastiness and negative ads, and name-calling and gridlock."

"One thing that's been incredibly clear throughout this whole process is his commitment and dedication to students and all the young people of America. He sees our generation as a critical part of his campaign," said Meredith Seagal, a junior at Bowdoin College in Maine and executive director of the draft committee.

Another Facebook group, Barack Obama (One Million Strong for Barack), was started less than three weeks ago and has already recruited 200,000 members. "When you go on Facebook, as you always do, sign up," Farouk Olu Aregbe, who founded that group, told the crowd yesterday.

Jonathan Hicks, 19, a sophomore at American University, said he learned about the event through the Facebook group. "The majority of people to my knowledge found out through Facebook," he said. "Technology is changing. Politicians need to use it more, and more often, if they want to reach the youth of America today."

In his 25-minute speech, Obama promised that a better kind of politics -- led by young people -- is possible.

"You guys don't have much of a memory of the possibility of a politics that transcends and brings people together," he said. "[At] each and every juncture of our history, somebody has been audacious enough to say, 'We could do better.' . . . And more often than not, it's young people who've done it."

For Obama, No News Is Good News (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 2, 2007

Senator Clinton's opening slogan was, "Let the conversation begin." Senator Obama just wanted the conversation to end.

The Democratic presidential hopefuls are making appearances in Washington on Friday at the Democratic National Committee's Winter Meeting. I stopped by the hotel where they are congregating to catch a Thursday night preview with Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who is officially announcing his candidacy this week.

But it turns out that Obama, riding an astonishing wave of glowing publicity for a candidate 21 months from an election, already has a bubble around him that is tighter than the one that surrounded Texas Gov. George W. Bush, who spent long hours of the fledgling days of his candidacy in bull sessions with reporters.

A flier for DNC members said, "Senator Barack Obama Cordially invites you to an Evening Reception." It was held in a medium-sized reception room. Cocktails, sold by the hotel, were $6.75 and domestic beer was a buck less. "Space is limited, therefore this event is for DNC Members ONLY," the flier said. "Members can bring one guest to the event." The room was jammed and a line snaked onto the promenade as Obama workers checked their lists like it was a nightclub.

Reporters were barred – a somewhat unusual, although not unheard of, policy for a meet-and-greet-type event in a public place like a hotel. The White House, which keeps fairly strict control of the press, typically allows reporters into large receptions in a hotel, at least while President Bush is speaking, although it closes fund-raisers at residences. The Senator came, and an aide said he was "mostly just going to speak his mind." That included a closing line that got a good laugh from the supportive crowd.

DOJ_NMG_0127958

As Obama left the hotel reception, smiling and saying, "Thank you AGAIN," I introduced myself and said, "Good evening, Senator, may I walk with you?" He replied, "You can walk with me. That doesn't mean you can ask questions." I chuckled, thinking he was kidding. "But you can certainly walk with me," he added. The Senator then underscored, "I'm sorry. I'm not answering questions."

The encounter pointed to some of the unusual dynamics of the '08, where several of the candidates – including Obama – are celebrities who have to manage the attention being thrust on them, rather than the more usual situation where a hopeful is desperate to gin up coverage.

Hillary Clinton, eager to overcome concerns about elect ability, has taken the opposite tack and is showcasing the warm and humorous side her aides have always insisted they see, conducting town halls and Web chats and holding availability with reporters after a recent appearance in Iowa.

Obama, whose hurdles include questions about the substance that will accompany the appealing persona, is taking no chances. Wanting to assure him I wasn't going to ask him a hardball question, I said after his aides had cut off his greetings and photos with DNC fans, "Senator, I was just hoping to ask what you want to accomplish this weekend." He replied: "It wouldn't be fair to everybody else. We didn't do a press avail for everybody else. Absolutely no questions this evening."

Even President Bush, who brings discipline to his interactions with the reporters, will have an on-the-fly, unscripted conversation without calling it a "press avail." So as Hillary tries to pierce her bubble, however tentatively, Obama appears to be building one.

An aide disputed that, saying that the Senator's purpose was to meet DNC members. "I don't think he's getting into any bubbles since he walks among reporters all the time and takes questions," the aide added.

On Friday morning, with a script, Obama showed why he is known as such a riveting speaker, wowing a crowd of 900 with a 16-minute address calling for the nation "to find the will to pass health care for all by the end of the first term of the very next president of the United States." He went on: "We don't want another election where voters are simply holding their noses and feel like they're choosing from the lesser of two evils." That drew applause, and he said the candidates' real fight is not against each other but against "the cynicism that has become so pervasive."

"We have always been at our best in this country when we aim high," he said. "This is our time."

Several of the candidates, including Obama, announced their exploratory committees in the totally controlled forum of a Web video. In his remarks Friday, the senator referred to the glitzy nature of politics today. "You know, as you look at all the cameras gathered around and the click of the photographers, and the pundits – " Obama was interrupted by a shriek of "I love you," and ad-libbed, "I love you back." Then he continued: "Sometimes you feel like you're part of a reality TV show. You feel like this is 'American Idol,' or 'Survivor.' You're trying to figure out if you're going to go to Hollywood, or you're going to be voted off the island. But that's not why I'm here. That's not why YOU'RE here. The decisions that have been made by this president and the challenges that have been ignored over the last six years have brought this country to a sobering place. … It's not a game. It's not a contest, with the TV cameras. It's a serious moment for America."

The winter meeting is a chance for the candidates to mingle with activists and sign up high-powered volunteers right at the starting gate. One attendee said Democrats were "kicking the tires." One top strategist pointed out: "It's like when you're playing golf. You can't win on the first hole, but you sure can get off to a bad start."

It's an opportunity to buy a Hillary travel mug, a donkey cookie cutter, a Gore 2008 button or a bumper sticker asking, "Who's Going to Clean Up After the Elephants?" The New York delegation held a closed-door "Hillary Ambassadors" meeting, and Sen. Joseph Biden's campaign gave out free red, white and blue bumper stickers saying, "Biden President '08."

Ten Democratic hopefuls are scheduled to speak to the three-day meeting, which has the theme, "Strong Leadership for America's Future." Later, they're holding meet-the-candidate receptions. Retired Army Gen. Wes Clark got a jump on the competition by working the halls briefly on Thursday night, then leaving rapidly. Organizers of the Nevada Democratic Caucus – one of the first nominating events, to be held Jan. 19, 2008 – drew an overflow crowd with a "Winning the West" reception featuring nachos and fajitas. They gave out information kits with "Fast Facts on Nevada" ("Important: Nevada is pronounced "Nev-Atta"), with "Clark County Hot Spots" that include houses of hash, coffee and bagels, but no casinos.

Obama, whose optimistic message seems to answer the yearning for bipartisanship that voters expressed at the polls in November, revealed this week that he will make his official announcement about a Presidential campaign at the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Ill., on Feb. 10.

Democratic sources say Obama's strategists decided not to engage in the "home run derby" that the DNC Winter Meeting has become in recent years. They see the meeting as an important introductory conversation with members he hasn't met, and an opportunity to reacquaint with members he has. They promised a show of energy when he appears at a "Yes We Can!" rally that Students for Barack Obama is holding in the Johnson Center Atrium at the hoops Cinderella school George Mason University in Fairfax, Va.

DOJ_NMG_0127959

Joe Biden Courts Al Sharpton (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, February 2, 2007

"I thought you were drowning in giving me flattery," Al Sharpton told Joe Biden when the Senator paused for breath at the end of his appearance on Sharpton's radio show yesterday.

The conversation began with Biden telling Sharpton, "You're one of the most articulate people in the country," and got friendlier from there.

There was, though, one second when Biden picked a word wrong, and you sort of saw him teeter on the brink of a new flap:

"I didn't know anybody tougher or straighter than Shirley Chisholm."

Straighter, as in "clean as a whistle," of course.

Romney Says Sen. Clinton "Timid" On Iran (AP)

By Alex Dominguez

AP, February 2, 2007

BALTIMORE (AP) - Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney on Friday accused Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of "timidity" regarding the security threat posed by Iran.

In a speech to a retreat of conservative congressional Republicans, Romney lashed out at Clinton for telling a pro-Israel dinner that a dialogue with countries hostile to Israel - including Iran and Syria - is needed to promote peace in the Middle East.

"At this point, We don't need a listening tour about Iran," Romney told the Republican Study Committee. "Someone who wants to engage Iran displays a troubling timidity toward a terrible threat of a nuclear Iran."

In a speech Thursday night at a Manhattan dinner held by the nation's largest pro-Israel lobbying group, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, Clinton called Iran a danger to the U.S. and one of Israel's greatest threats.

But the New York senator also said, "We need to use every tool at our disposal, including diplomatic and economic in addition to the threat and use of military force" when dealing with Iran.

"I have advocated engagement with our enemies and Israel's enemies," Clinton said. "I believe we can gain valuable knowledge and leverage from being part of a process again that enables us to get a better idea of how to take on and defeat our adversaries.

"U.S. policy must be clear and unequivocal: We cannot, we should not, we must not permit Iran to build or acquire nuclear weapons," Clinton told the audience. "In dealing with this threat ... no option can be taken off the table."

Responding to Romney's criticism, Clinton spokesman Mo Elleithee said Friday: "Senator Clinton believes that no option should be taken off the table when it comes to preventing Iran from developing nuclear weapons. Given his record of flip flops, the only thing that's timid are Governor Romney's convictions."

Romney, who served one term as Massachusetts governor, said that rather than engagement, economic and diplomatic isolation should be the priority.

Last year, when former Iranian President Mohammad Khatami visited Harvard University, Romney criticized the visit and ordered state agencies not to cooperate if asked for assistance.

On Thursday, some 1,700 attendees applauded as Clinton cited her efforts on behalf of the Jewish state and spoke scathingly of Iran's decision to hold a conference last month that questioned whether the Holocaust took place.

"To deny the Holocaust places Iran's leadership in company with the most despicable bigots and historical revisionists," Clinton said, criticizing what she called the Iranian administration's "pro-terrorist, anti-American, anti-Israeli rhetoric."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly called the Holocaust a "myth" and said Israel should be "wiped off the map" and its Jews returned to Europe.

Iran insists its nuclear program is designed to produce energy, not weapons. Ahmadinejad said Thursday that his government is determined to continue with its nuclear program, despite U.N. Security Council sanctions imposed over its refusal to halt uranium enrichment, a process that can produce fuel to generate electricity or for the fissile core of an atomic bomb.

Romney Attacks Hillary Over Iran (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, February 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127960

BALTIMORE - Speaking to GOP lawmakers Friday, Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney criticized recent comments made by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) regarding Iran.

The frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination said during a speech at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee Thursday night that she "needs to understand Iran" and wanted to engage in conversations about the region.

Romney, in remarks to the Republican Study Committee, said if Clinton needs to "understand Iran, [she] hasn't been paying attention."

The former Massachusetts governor expressed his concern over a nuclear Iran and detailed a "five-point plan" for dealing with the country.

The plan includes imposing tough sanctions, effecting diplomatic isolation and helping the people of Iran "understand that nuclear technology is a source of peril, not a source of pride." He expressed the need to cultivate and empower moderate Muslim countries in the Middle East, especially those that surround Israel, in order to further discourage extremism.

Romney also described a "circle of suspects" - a list of countries that make fissile material in the region. These countries should also be monitored, he said, so that they do not become safe havens for religious extremists.

Romney Explains Shifts (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

The Politico, February 2, 2007

BALTIMORE – Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney laid out his conservative credentials, explained his shift on social issues and took a few shots at two potential opponents Friday.

Appearing before the conservative Republican Study Committee, Romney stuck to his usual explanation for his change of heart, but presented himself not as a convert but as a student who had received an education on key social issues.

The one-term governor said his time on Beacon Hill had "confirmed some principles and educated me on some principles." Romney told about 50 members of the GOP group that he ran as a fiscal conservative, but "learned some unexpected lessons about social conservative issues."

"Massachusetts became center stage for the most important social issues of our time," he said, detailing his efforts to limit stem cell research, thwart same-sex marriage and curb abortion rights.

At the end of his governorship, the man who ran supporting abortion rights and some gay rights said he'd undergone a transition.

"This fiscal conservative became a social conservative as well," he said.

After reporters were shooed out of the hotel ballroom, the Republicans asked Romney to elaborate on his abortion views.

According to one who remained in the room, Romney used a familiar anecdote to describe his change on the issue.

Romney, recounting a meeting with Harvard University scientists in 2004, recalled how they nonchalantly explained their cloning of embryos. That, Romney notes, was the moment when he first realized how the sanctity of life had become so cheapened.

In a brief press availability after what Romney described as a "probing follow-up" to his speech, the former governor said he felt like he had passed the examination.

In an interview, Rep. Wally Herger, R-Calif., said he was satisfied with Romney's explanation.

"I felt very comfortable," said Herger, who is so far uncommitted in the presidential contest but offered that he could "absolutely" back Romney.

Rep. Darrell Issa, another California Republican, noted that while Romney said what he needed to say to the conservative audience, his address was short on specifics.

"There wasn't a lot there," said Issa, who has also yet to weigh in on 2008. "He touched on a lot of broad themes that require a lot of money."

Asked about Romney's accounting of how he had come to oppose abortion rights, Issa acknowledged that it was "artful," but probably not quite as clear-cut as Romney tried to make it.

Unmistaken were two shots the former governor took at Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y. and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. – both presidential contenders.

Discussing his views on Iran, Romney noted that in addressing pro-Israel AIPAC Thursday night in New York, Clinton said the United States needs to "understand" Iran better. Emphasizing the quotation, Romney added that Clinton had also called for America to "engage" Tehran.

"Somebody who doesn't 'understand' Iran hasn't been paying attention," Romney said, adding that Clinton's view amounted to a "troubling timidity" toward the prospect of a nuclear Iran.

"We don't need a listening tour of Iran," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127961

Responding, Clinton campaign spokesman Mo Elleithee said the senator "believes that no option should be taken off the table when it comes to developing nuclear weapons."

"Given his record flip flops," Elleithee said, "the only thing that's timid are Governor Romney's convictions."

Romney's tweak of his GOP rival wasn't as pointed, nor as public.

A staffer in the room for Romney's private exchange with Republicans said that the former governor drew a standing ovation when he called McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform "a horrible policy."

Then, with a grin, Romney added: "I could have, of course, just called it campaign finance reform."

McCain's camp declined to comment.

Hagel For President (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

No, we don't mean this as an endorsement. The Journal doesn't endorse candidates, and on the big issues of the day we don't much agree with Chuck Hagel in any case. But with the Nebraska Republican loudly agitating for a rapid withdrawal from Iraq, we think it's time the Senator tested his ideas somewhere other than the Sunday talk shows.

If Mr. Hagel thinks his foreign-policy vision is superior to President Bush's or to Senator John McCain's, he should stop booing from the gallery and get into the fight for the Republican Presidential nomination. The primaries are only a year away, and the GOP field awaits a genuine antiwar candidate. It's one thing to win the Beltway media primary, another to prevail among actual voters, as Mr. Bush has done twice.

We'd have thought Mr. Hagel would relish such a contest, especially given his remarks last week about his colleagues. Along with Democrat Joe Biden, the Senator co-sponsored a resolution condemning Mr. Bush's "surge" strategy for Baghdad. And while debating the resolution last week, the Nebraskan said that "I think all 100 Senators ought to be on the line on this. What do you believe? What are you willing to support? What do you think? Why were you elected? If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes. This is a tough business."

That "tough" point in particular could use some fleshing out. Our guess is that only in Washington is it considered courageous for a politician to criticize a war that he voted for when it was popular but that public opinion has since turned against. And to do so by offering a "resolution" that has no force of law and is thus meaningless except for the message of American irresolution it sends to our enemies.

Somehow it seems far "tougher" to stand by one's original vote for the war even when it becomes unpopular, as Mr. McCain and Senator Joe Lieberman have done. Or, if you are truly antiwar, to have the courage of those convictions and attempt to cut off funds, as Senator Russ Feingold and Congressman Dennis Kucinich propose. The latter would at least mean taking some responsibility for what happens next.

As far as we can tell from his speeches, Mr. Hagel's larger vision for the Mideast is that the U.S. was much better off before Mr. Bush introduced all that "democracy" nonsense. He'd return to the status quo before 9/11, fighting the war on terror with the Arab dictators we have. The Senator also favors "engaging" Syria and Iran, and he says that "in the Middle East, the core of instability and conflict is the underlying Arab-Israeli problem."

Whatever one thinks of these views, they are not unique or innovative. John Kerry campaigned on them in 2004, but maybe the country has since changed its mind enough to embrace them in 2008. If Mr. Hagel believes what he says, he'll stop insulting shoe salesmen by comparing them to Senators and get into the ring himself.

Arkansas Underdog (WSJ)

By Paul Greenberg, Kane Webb

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. -- Once upon a pre-Clinton time, the announcement by the former Arkansas governor, Mike Huckabee, that he's running for president would have been stop-the-presses news in these latitudes. And while it's still front-page, above-the-fold stuff, Arkansas has been there, done that, and is doing it again. These days we seem to grow presidential candidates as bountifully as we do tomatoes and watermelons.

Hillary Clinton's in the race, right? Officially now, we mean. She's said to have been a first lady of this state way back when. Also, former NATO commander Wesley Clark, now of Little Rock, Ark., ran for president last time out and, far as we know, hasn't ruled out a reprise in '08.

Now there's Mike Huckabee of Hope, Ark. (Ring a bell?) He's just the latest to put Arkansas on the political map. Or rather to keep it there. Back when Bill Clinton was still largely an unknown -- can you imagine? -- and Arkansas Chic still all the rage, circa 1992-ish, Vernon Jordan pronounced this small, wonderful state the Political Capital of the Universe.

He had no idea.

DOJ_NMG_0127962

So does Mike Huckabee have a chance? He was a Republican governor of this largely one-party Democratic state for a decade, so he's used to battling long odds. Now he's launched a longshot presidential campaign.

It may not last till spring if his first week on the campaign trail is any indication. Instead of toughening up for the road ahead, our thin-skinned former governor peeled off yet another layer of epidermis. "The Huck" followed up his Sunday morning presidential announcement on "Meet the Press" by meeting the press back here in Arkansas. After giving a perfectly proper speech at the state's Republican Party headquarters, he immediately tore into the local press, as is his wont. This time he was sore about a series of hotly debated stories in the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette about the destruction of a computer hard drive and his depleting an emergency fund during his final days in office.

He couldn't just criticize Them Lyin' Newspapers and be done with it. He had to go on to compare a reporter for the Democrat-Gazette to Janet Cooke and Jayson Blair.

Goodness. Lend this man a little perspective; he tends to be about two quarts high on hyperbole. Ms. Cooke and Mr. Blair are the evil twins of reckless, fabricating, plagiarizing journalism, the worst of the worst. That's a pretty serious charge -- or rather, it would be if anybody around here could take it seriously.

But we weren't surprised. Any more than we would be by a splendid piece of oratory from the same source. Mike Huckabee, at times, can be the most elevating of speakers -- we still haven't come down from his speech welcoming the Little Rock Nine back to Central High on the 40th anniversary of the crisis there, or his steadfast yet gracious performance July 15, 1996. That was the long, long day when his predecessor, Jim Guy Tucker, convicted for conspiracy and mail fraud in connection with the Whitewater investigation, at first refused to be pried out of the governor's office.

But, too many other times, Brother Huckabee just likes to wallow in the old invective, and the pettier his complaint, the longer he wallows. The man spent most of a fine administration snubbing the Arkansas Times, a free weekly tabloid that, of course, just loved all the attention. (He actually had the little weekly removed from the list of publications that got his public schedule. Petty, to say the least.)

Now he launches his presidential campaign by throwing some mud at a reporter for the Democrat-Gazette. How does he suppose that kind of thing will play in Peoria? Or Poughkeepsie? And coming from a dark-horse presidential candidate out to charm the national press, how would it play along the New York-Washington media axis? If he keeps it up, how long before the cable-news promos are asking: "Mike Huckabee: Legit longshot or loose cannon?"

The Huck's tendency to go into vendetta mode violates the first rule of smart politics and public discourse in general: Never get into a fight with someone who's not as well known as you are. It bumps up their status and lowers yours. Mr. Huckabee needs to learn to cut down the big trees, not mess with the little saplings. Besides being unworthy of him personally, it wastes all his high-powered rhetoric. If this candidate isn't more careful, a nickname like Gov. Petty may stick to him the way Slick Willie did to another presidential hopeful from Arkansas.

What a pity that would be. He has a lot of potential as a presidential candidate, and a record of accomplishment here in Arkansas -- from getting health care to kids whose families couldn't afford it to fixing our interstate highways. He's been willing to take on the educational establishment in order to improve our schools, and early on he finally simplified this state's once byzantine requirements for something as basic as renewing your car tags.

Does he stand a chance nationally? Candidate Huckabee said it himself: The American people love an underdog. It's hardly an original thought, but he's spot on. We the People love the up-from-nothin' kid, the outta-nowhere man, the longshot who catches the favorite at the wire. We love the underdog, that is, right up until the moment he makes a slip and reminds everybody why he was a longshot in the first place.

One of Mike Huckabee's Republican rivals in this campaign, Mitt Romney, had a father who ran for president, too. Briefly. George Romney broke from the gate with a rush in another presidential campaign just getting under way during an increasingly unpopular war. Then he let it slip that he'd been "brainwashed" about Vietnam.

Some of us had thought George Romney might get a little credit for that kind of humility and candor. Naturally he didn't. The guy was an ex-presidential candidate as soon as he'd spit out just a couple of syllables -- brainwashed. So long, underdog.

Mike Huckabee's campaign will be history soon, too, unless he learns to cool it. Which may not be possible for the Huck, given his showman's personality and rhetorical impulses. The man is a Baptist preacher and former radio broadcaster who may secretly yearn to be a stand-up comic. He can't pass up an opportunity to say something that sounds clever at the time, but then comes back to haunt him on Tim Russert's show.

Our advice: Be careful out there, Brother Huckabee. Your presidential campaign is one careless wisecrack from being over.

Mr. Greenberg is editorial page editor of the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, where Mr. Webb is assistant editorial page editor.

DOJ_NMG_0127963

Powerful Fla. Storms Kill 19, Raze Homes (AP)

By Jim Ellis

AP, February 3, 2007

LADY LAKE, Fla. (AP) - Disaster crews with dogs went from one pile of debris to another in a search for bodies Friday after powerful storms, including at least one tornado, smashed hundreds of homes across central Florida and killed 19 people or more.

It was the second-deadliest combination of thunderstorms and tornados in Florida history, cutting a 40-mile swath of destruction across four counties just before daybreak, terrorizing residents of one of the nation's biggest retirement communities, and leaving trees and fields littered with clothes, furniture and splintered lumber.

Residents helped pull the dead from the ruins.

"It was scary, really scary," said Patrick Smith, who lives in the Paisley area, where at least 13 deaths were reported. He said he saw a weather alert on television, grabbed his wife and "went straight to the floor." After the storm passed, he pulled the bodies of a man and his 9- or 10-year-old son from a neighboring house.

(AP) Maria Helena, 34, holds her son, Diego, 2, as she walks around a tree that went through her mobile...

Full ImageFlorida's emergency management chief, Craig Fugate, said it could take several days to determine the exact number of dead, and the main priority was finding survivors who may be trapped.

Gov. Charlie Crist declared a state of emergency in four counties, but the worst damage was reported where the twister touched down in northern Lake County and eastern Volusia County. In typical tornado fashion, the storm hopscotched across the landscape, demolishing some homes and leaving others virtually untouched.

"Our priority today is search and rescue," said Crist, who toured the damaged area in his first natural disaster since taking office last month. "Everything's being done to get them the aid and assistance that they need."

Lake County spokesman Christopher Patton said there were 19 confirmed deaths, all in Lake County, about 50 miles northwest of Orlando. The dead included at least two high school students, authorities said. Numerous injuries were reported, but officials could not immediately estimate how many.

Officials in Lake and Volusia counties ordered dusk-to-dawn curfews in heavily damaged areas to prevent looting and injuries to residents trying to sift through wreckage in the dark.

(AP) Marianna Campos, 10, hugs her aunt, Maria Jasso, 47, after her aunts home was destroyed by a...

Full ImageAuthorities said hundreds of houses, mobile homes and other buildings were damaged or destroyed. Volusia County reported a preliminary estimate of $80 million in damage involving 500 properties.

The storm left yards strewn with chairs, beds and clothes, knocked tractor-trailers onto their sides as if they were toys, and tore away roofs. Debris hung from trees, and some homes were thrown off their foundations.

Bernadette Fields, 67, said two of her neighbors in mobile homes were blown through a bedroom wall into Lake Mack. Their bodies were found by their own dog, she said.

Dozens of rescue workers - many hardened by experience with Florida's multiple hurricanes - went from house to house, spray-painting big red X's to mark the husks of buildings that they had checked. Often they found people who awoke to the storm's roar and watched their homes disintegrate around them.

Lee Shaver, 54, said he and his wife, Irene, and their dog had "about 10 seconds" to take shelter in a closet before their roof was torn off.

(AP) Volusia County Sheriff Ben Johnson, left, shakes hands with Governor Charlie Crist at Volusia...

Full Image"Every muscle and bone in my body shook," said Lee Shaver outside his damaged home in The Villages, one of the nation's largest retirement communities.

"It was terrifying. You're not thinking consciously. You're just trying to save your life," added his 55-year-old wife.

Tornado watches had been posted hours before the twister struck, and warnings were issued between eight and 15 minutes before they touched down, said meteorologist Dave Sharp of the National Weather Service in Melbourne.

But few people were listening to the radio or watching television at that hour, and few communities in the region have warning sirens.

"The most dangerous tornado scenario is a threat for killer tornadoes at night, and that was the case," Sharp said.

(AP) A wooden plank sticks out of the back of a car after severe storms hit the area of northern New...

Full ImageThe weather service estimated the tornado had winds of between 136 mph and 165 mph, Sharp said. But that was based on where the twister first touched down and did not include some of the hardest-hit areas, which researchers planned to examine Saturday, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127964

Vern Huber, 87, said his weather radio alarm went off around 3:30 a.m. and he and his wife, Louedna, 81, huddled in the hall and put pillows from the couch on top of themselves.

"It was a deafening roar," Huber said.

In Lady Lake, the Church of God was demolished, its pews, altar and torn Bibles left in a jumbled mess. The 31-year-old, steel-reinforced structure was built to withstand 150-mph winds, the Rev. Larry Lynn said.

By daybreak, parishioners gathered on the lot where the church once stood, hugging each other and consoling Lynn. They planned to clear the debris and hold Sunday services on the empty lot.

"That's just the building, the people are the church. We'll be back bigger and stronger," Lynn said.

While Lake County got the worst of it, Volusia County officials reported that 69 homes were damaged in New Smyrna Beach. A county medical clinic in DeLand was severely damaged.

"We heard a big boom then we heard the freight-train noise. All five of us got in the closet," said Linda Craig, 44, who lives in Hontoon Island, a heavily damaged area of Volusia County.

The winds lifted one tractor-trailer and dropped it on another, pinning the driver in the cab of the second semi, said Kim Miller, a spokeswoman with the Florida Highway Patrol. The driver's injuries were not considered life-threatening.

About 10,000 customers were without power. Several counties opened shelters for those who lost their homes.

Friday's storms were reminiscent of past tornados during years where El Nino was a weather factor, as it was again in this case, said state meteorologist Ben Nelson.

The 19 deaths made Friday's tornado the second-deadliest in Florida history, surpassing a 1962 tornado outbreak that killed 17 in the Panhandle.

The state's deadliest tornado event on record happened in February 1998, when five twisters hit near Orlando over two days, killing 42 people and damaging or destroying about 2,600 homes and businesses.

Associated Press reporters Curt Anderson, Damian Grass, Suzette Laboy, Stephen Majors, Adrian Sainz and Ron Word contributed to this report.

Titillating Or Not, Washington Gossip Blossoms (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — Some big doings in the nation's capital this week.

Item: Dennis Hastert, the former House speaker, had his gallbladder removed.

Item: Karl Rove was spotted at a performance of "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf" at the Kennedy Center.

Item: Representative William Lacy Clay, a Missouri Democrat, got his braces taken off.

Item: A photograph of Paul Wolfowitz, president of the World Bank, revealed holes in his socks.

Item: Senator Norm Coleman, a Minnesota Republican, nearly committed the etiquette-crime of entering the Senate chamber without a tie (he found a loaner at the last minute).

As the globe warms, Iraq burns and a presidential campaign heats up, Washington finds itself red-hot in gossip, or what passes for such here. Never in memory has the political world been so awash in items about every little burp and wart and appendectomy of our nation's leaders.

Ten publications carry a total of 14 columns focusing on political tidbits that appear regularly, up from three columns a decade ago.

They include the Reliable Source and In the Loop columns, The Washington Post's entrenched offerings (the paper's Web site started a new enterprise, the Sleuth, last month); In the Know and Under the Dome, which dish in the tabloid The Hill; and Heard on the Hill, which appears in Roll Call.

The Examiner offers Yeas and Nays, while the latest entry, The Politico, nourishes its politerati with Shenanigans and the Crypt.

So what does this all mean?

"It means I have to spend a lot more of my time fielding calls and e-mails from gossip columnists," said a slightly exasperated Jim Manley, the top communications aide to Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic majority leader.

Mr. Manley had just finished responding to an e-mail message from a Roll Call reporter about whether Mr. Reid knew the date of Valentine's Day. (That day's Politico had broken the Watergate-like development that Mr. Reid had made a remark suggesting he thought it was February 12.)

As of now, Washington's gossip is tame compared to the sexier, snarkier variety from Hollywood and New York — that is, unless anyone considers it sexy that Representative Nita M. Lowey, a New York Democrat, is suffering from inflammation of the fascia (or foot problem, The Hill reported).

DOJ_NMG_0127965

The most recent salacious Washington story, the Mark Foley intern case, was more squirm-provoking than fun. It is hard to recall a good, old-fashioned, career-killing scoop in any Washington gossip page.

That will change as the "Washington gossip wars" intensify, promises Chuck Conconi, a longtime editor at Washingtonian magazine who for many years wrote a gossip column in The Post.

"If you're in Hollywood and you write something about Brad Pitt that turns out to be wrong, so what, it will probably help him," Mr. Conconi said. But in Washington, he said, "If you're wrong, it can end a senator's career. So politics is going to breed more caution." At least for now.

Chuck Todd, editor of the online political clearinghouse Hotline, calls the gossip phenomenon "pack gossip journalism," a byproduct of the celebrification of politics and the attendant proliferation of media to cover it. "Look, Washington is Hollywood for ugly people for a reason, and this reflects it," he said.

Mr. Todd said Hotline was selective in the quality of material it elected to republish from the various and multiplying outlets.

"We're only going to cover the Denny Hastert gallbladder removal story once," he vowed. "We're not going to cover every angle of the Denny Hastert gallbladder story."

And thank goodness for restraint.

Will We Lose In The Stem Cell Race? (WP)

By Joseph Fuller, Brock Reeve

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Americans take it for granted that they are the world's leaders in the life sciences. And it's true that, today, American companies account for 60 percent of global pharmaceutical sales and 75 percent of biotech sales, and that they dominate the market for medical devices. But complacency is a powerful enemy; our leadership position is not a national birthright. We could fumble it just as we fumbled leadership in the consumer electronics and automotive sectors.

In science and technology-intensive fields, fumbling is particularly easy. Less than 30 years ago, five of the world's top 10 pharmaceutical companies, including the two largest, were European. Between 1980 and 1984, Europe invented more than half of the world's new drugs. Observers assumed that Europe would lead the anticipated revolution in biotechnology.

Today, however, American companies account for more than three-quarters of worldwide biotech revenue and have almost 4,500 products in development -- 2 1/2 times as many as European companies.

How did we turn the tables?

-- Government actions and court decisions allowed the patenting of living organisms and made it possible for private researchers to commercialize discoveries funded by federal grants. Further, Stanford University, which controlled key patents, ensured their widespread and rapid adoption.

-- In Europe, the countries of the European Union had independent regulators until the 1990s. The patentability of living organisms remained uncertain until 1998. And state-funded academic institutions had little incentive to encourage academics to pursue commercially oriented research.

-- Between 1985 and 1995 the U.S. government invested more than $50 billion in the biological sciences. Federal spending during that period dwarfed the amount spent in Europe and encouraged private-sector investment.

-- With the availability of affordable, fundamental patents and a supportive public policy environment, between 1987 and 1997 investors bet some $6 billion of risk capital on the fledging sector in the United States, roughly five times as much as their European counterparts.

Can we repeat that success in new areas of science, such as stem cell research? Many Americans assume that once the current restrictions on federal funding of embryonic stem cell research have been lifted, America will surge to the forefront. A quick glance at the field seems to bear that out. The fundamental patents underlying embryonic stem cell research were developed in the United States and are held by the Wisconsin Alumni Research Foundation (WARF). Many leading scientists are based in this country. With private philanthropy supporting institutions such as the Harvard Stem Cell Institute, and public money in states including California, New Jersey, Connecticut and Maryland supporting research, history seems poised to repeat itself.

But closer examination suggests that such confidence might be misplaced. If one analyzes the state of the industry along some of the same critical dimensions that contributed to our come-from-behind win in biotechnology, unnerving patterns emerge.

-- While Stanford granted 73 nonexclusive licenses in less than a year, WARF has awarded just 13 licenses in eight years under economic terms that many believe have slowed the sector's growth.

-- The ongoing political debate over the appropriate use of embryonic stem cells and the low level of government support have denied stem cell research the catalyst provided to biotechnology -- even as other countries are investing aggressively.

-- The entry of individual states into the breach left by the federal government has helped drive research activity. But it has also created a patchwork of regulations and funding levels that constrains research collaboration.

DOJ_NMG_0127966

-- Expensive and restrictive enabling patents, political controversy and the absence of federal research money, coupled with a long time to market, have made venture capitalists reluctant to invest. In 2005, just over $100 million in venture capital went to stem cell ventures, compared with $500 million in biotech ventures at an equivalent stage.

-- Constraining federal research support to a selected area -- such as certain cell types and lines -- is not a sensible research policy. Advances with stem cells from amniotic fluid and the pulp of baby teeth have been in the news recently, but as the authors of those studies point out, such cells, while promising, cannot take the place of embryonic cells. These restrictions divert valuable time and effort in a way that is not occurring in Britain or Singapore.

In short, the stem cell sector is at risk of experiencing a failure to launch at the national level. Yes, some progress is being made: WARF has just revised some of its licensing policies; venture capital activity has picked up recently; and academic research and clinical centers, disease foundations and patient-advocacy groups are adopting a more aggressive stance in breaking down existing barriers. But will this be enough? Or will foreign governments, using America's biotech success as a model, systematically encourage the development of stem cell research and, not satisfied with emulating our competitive performance, succeed in outstripping us?

Joseph Fuller is a founder of the Monitor Group. Brock Reeve is executive director of the Harvard Stem Cell Institute.

Happy Birthday, Mr. Reagan (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

Next Tuesday would have been Ronald Reagan's 96th birthday, which is amazing when you consider he is, in a way, more with us than ever: his memory and meaning summoned in political conversation, his name evoked by candidates. I remember 10 years ago when there was controversy over the movement to name things for him -- buildings and airports. I was away from home at the time, and I realized that to talk to people in Washington about it, I'd have to land at JFK, take the FDR Drive and go through the Lincoln Tunnel.

This is America; we remember our greats. You tell yourself who you are by what you raise a statue to.

The other day a friend asked: What do you think made him so likable to many who disagreed with him and who look back with nostalgia on his White House?

It's funny that people like to talk about this even though they know the answers. There was the courage to swim against the tide, to show not a burst of bravery but guts in the long haul. The good cheer and good nature that amounted to a kind of faith. The air of pleasure Reagan emanated on meeting others, and his egalitarianism. He thought everyone, from Nobel Prize winners to doormen, equal. Not that he wasn't aware of status. When he stood behind Errol Flynn for a still photo to promote "Santa Fe Trail," he knew of Flynn's towering reputation. Between shots, Reagan kept quietly pushing little piles of dirt together. When he had a mound, he stood on it so that he was, literally, of equal stature. He told the story on himself for years because it was funny, and he believed in laughter. He was a little like Art Buchwald in this; he thought laughter was a value of its own. I think he thought that people who shared a laugh had in fact just voted for something together: something funny and human just got said or done.

Lesley Stahl of "60 Minutes" was CBS's White House correspondent during the Reagan administration, and I asked her what she remembered most. She said, "We reporters would stake out 'the driveway' to see who was going in to see the president. In the first few years there was a stream of people who came to argue against his budget-cutting proposals. They would march up that driveway in a huff, smoke coming out of their nostrils as they rehearsed their angry arguments about why he was destroying the lives of poor people, or schoolkids.

"I remember specifically a group of mayors from big cities, livid about cuts to their welfare programs, school-lunch programs, etc. They were there to give the president a scolding; they were going to tell him. And in they'd march. Two hours later, out they came. We were all ready with the cameras and the mikes to get their version of the telling off. But they were all little lambs, subdued....He had charmed them....The mayors told us Reagan agreed with them. That they had persuaded him....

"Thirty minutes later Larry Speakes was in the press room telling us the numbers would not in fact change. The mayors had 'misunderstood' the president. Still, I'll bet anything if you talked to those mayors today, they would tell you Reagan was a great guy."

She mentioned "his personal touch, his gallantry." You knew he was a good man and you knew he meant it. So you understood how he could be the biggest supporter of FDR and the New Deal in 1944, and the most persuasive voice for Barry Goldwater in 1964. He'd thought it through and changed, not overnight but in time and with effort. He could change his mind on abortion in the same way, and not because he feared the base. Reagan was the base.

Last week I was at a gathering of old Reagan hands and I asked aloud if something that I'd heard might be true. It was that Mikhail Gorbachev now lives in California and has a pool. The minute I said it, a longtime Reagan friend laughed. He knew where I was going. Reagan always said what he really wanted to do with a Russian premier was get him in a helicopter, ride over

DOJ_NMG_0127967

Southern California, point down at the million little houses and million little pools, and say "Mr. Gorbachev, that's how the proletariat lives in America."

But it wasn't true. Mr. Gorbachev lives in Moscow, where he has a think tank, a former cabinet secretary told me. Mr. Gorbachev had given the secretary a tour, and proudly noted that he paid for the building by renting out two floors. "Gorbachev has discovered the free market," the secretary said.

It was almost as good.

This led the Reagan intimate to remember being on a private plane with him one day. They had a steak and fine wine. "Reagan said to me, 'You know, I believe everyone in America can have these things.' I said, 'You really believe that?' Reagan said, 'Yes, I do.' " The intimate said to me, "See, I don't believe that, that anyone here can do it." Then he paused. "But it's good to have a president who does."

Lately we are hearing of President Reagan's famous 11th commandment: "Speak no ill of a fellow Republican." It's a good rule for both parties, but it's good also to remember how he approached it in practice. Ronald Reagan turned his own party upside down, enraged its establishment, and threatened its immediate future when, in 1976, he mounted a fierce challenge to an incumbent Republican president. He ran full and hard against Jerry Ford and it was bitter -- the stakes were high, the issue freedom at home and abroad. Reagan lost, his challenge doomed Ford in the general election, and four years later Reagan roared back. And when he won the nomination he turned around and seriously considered as his running mate...Jerry Ford.

When he ran against Ford, it wasn't personal. And when he almost picked Ford as his vice president, that wasn't personal either. It was more like this: This is America. We have been arguing about everything for 200 years. It's what we do. It's our glory.

Our politics then were grimmer yet had a lighter touch. The Soviets could nuke us tomorrow; let's have a hellacious brawl. It was a serious time, but I don't think we were in general so somber, so locked in. The 11th commandment meant the fight should never be mean, low or unnecessarily injurious to the person, or the party. But a fight could be waged -- should be waged -- over big, big things.

That he knew that is part of why we remember him as great. It's part of why when you next fly to Washington, you'll land at Reagan National Airport.

Lone Starlets (NYT)

By Mimi Swartz

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

THE last few months have provided hard times for iconic Texas women and the Texans — and others — who worshipped them. Last September, we lost both a former governor, Ann Richards, and a former state first lady, Nellie Connally. When the columnist Molly Ivins died on Wednesday, it seemed that a certain kind of Texas woman might be gone forever.

If you've read the obituaries, you know the type: the funny, brave, irreverent kind, who spoke out against a life in a (supposedly) brutal, backward state. It was Ms. Richards who insisted that the elder President Bush was born with a "silver foot in his mouth," and Ms. Ivins who insisted that the younger one had rightfully earned the nickname of "Shrub." Mrs. Connally, less well known outside the state, was almost as funny and probably more beloved here, because she delivered her barbs in private.

As befits most icons, all of these women went by their first names among people who didn't know them. They will be remembered for their strength and their wit, but what stays with me even more is their fragility and their anger. I wrote about them all over the years, and with each of their deaths I found myself thinking, amid the tributes, that being a Texas icon of the female variety probably wasn't all it was cracked up to be.

You can make the case that fury goes with the territory here. The male-dominated, rough-and-tumble Texas these women grew up in wasn't hospitable to ladies in smarty pants; all three had to come up with novel ways to satisfy their needs and ambitions in a circumscribed world.

Ms. Ivins and Ms. Richards in particular were very interested in bringing about social change; the relationship between the state as a whole and the liberal coterie of which they were an integral part is one of the great, doomed romances of Texas history. Mrs. Connally was far from a liberal Democrat — her husband, Gov. John Connally, famously jumped from the Democratic Party to the Republicans — but she, too, triumphed over a youthful shyness to serve as her spouse's most undying loyalist, whether he was pushing for school reform in Texas or, later, trying to escape scandal in Washington.

In other words, rather than flee the state for friendlier waters, all three far preferred to stay and swim upstream. All three, in fact, felt a deep obligation to their home state: it energized them as it defined them — favorably — to the outside world, which always felt better when it could look down on Texas.

Nellie Connally had little choice but to play the part of the gracious, loving wife; there wasn't much else a woman of her generation could do (she was 87 when she died). She was a former beauty queen who married a true prince of Texas and became a very popular first lady. Yet when I last interviewed her in 2003 she was living in a two-bedroom apartment overflowing with memorabilia, waiting each day to have her two allotted drinks with Dan Rather at 5:30. She had attentive children and grandchildren, but she had by then lost a daughter to suicide, struggled with breast cancer, and endured her husband's very public bankruptcy.

DOJ_NMG_0127968

And, of course, after the deaths of her husband in 1993 and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis the next year, she alone lived to tell the tale of what happened in President John F. Kennedy's car on Nov. 22, 1963. I heard her describe it three times to three different audiences during the course of a few weeks. (It was Nellie, ever smoothing things over, who said, "Mr. President, you can't say Dallas doesn't love you," just before the shots were fired.) As horrible as that memory was, it kept her tied to history, and, more important, to the love of her life — a man who suffered from such profound arrogance and vanity that his personality has come to overshadow his many accomplishments.

When you saw Ann Richards's weathered face you knew just what 73 years of life had cost her. Sure, she had given herself over to the harsh Texas sun on too many outings; but, like Nellie Connally, there had been other costs: she, too, had played geisha, not to an ambitious husband but to a group of ambitious Texas liberals. It was Ms. Richards who had planned the drunken, irreverent costume parties — memories of the time are hazy, but she once went, or dressed a friend up, as a tampon. Then she got up next morning to pack the children's lunches.

She did it all, pretty near perfectly for a while: a beautiful young woman of supreme competency with a tart tongue and ambitions far beyond the P.T.A. Triumphing over all that — as well as smoking, drinking and divorce — formed part of her campaign story when she ran for governor in 1990, and made her victory all the sweeter.

But her pain, smoothed over in folksy public speeches and slick campaign commercials, could catch you up short: when I traveled with her during her first gubernatorial campaign I marveled at how trussed up and hostile she was, how her coterie of female supporters were protective to a fault, trying to shield her from criticism. In the end, she lost her taste for the fight, and essentially ceded the 1994 gubernatorial election to George W. Bush.

Being a decade younger than her friend Ann Richards, Molly Ivins never had to serve as anyone's geisha, and she never would have. But she was a big, smart, ungainly girl in a state where a female could suffer something close to capital punishment for those crimes; in self-defense she turned the cracker vernacular on the crackers and won fame for herself in the process, playing the Professional Texan. (Those hacks in the Legislature wouldn't have given a Smith graduate from ritzy River Oaks the time of day, but a hard-drinking, foul-talking, big-boned country girl? Well, that worked.)

But in private, Ms. Ivins, too, battled alcohol, and had her coterie of human shields; they were protecting a woman whose loneliness was as incomprehensible as it was omnipresent. She was a performer who rarely allowed herself to be offstage, which, of course, ensured that the majority of us kept our distance.

There aren't so many iconic women left in Texas, now — Lady Bird Johnson and the oil baroness Lynn Wyatt come to mind — but maybe that's to the good. We don't have to fight so hard to be heard, or noticed, or to avoid being taken for a hick. It's easier for us, but for everyone who knew them, maybe, not quite as much fun.

Russia Clashes With U.S. On Mideast Policy (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

Russia urged ending the isolation of the anti-Israeli militant group Hamas and including Syria in Middle East peace talks, exposing fissures in a high-level diplomatic group that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gathered yesterday in Washington to validate her new effort to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The Russian proposals run directly counter to Rice's strategy of rallying what she calls "mainstream" Arabs to isolate what she calls "extremist" elements in the region.

"I don't think that to resolve this problem, just like any problem that exists in the world, that you could do it through boycott and isolation," Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said at a news conference after a meeting of the "Quartet," which also includes the European Union, the United Nations and the United States.

Lavrov, with Rice seated next to him, said that "Syria could play a constructive role," specifically citing a recent meeting between Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, and Khaled Mashal, the exiled leader of Hamas's political wing, that Damascus had arranged. U.S. officials were furious at Abbas for agreeing to the meeting, Palestinian officials said.

Rice shot back that the United States, "even at the highest levels," has spoken to Syrian officials and that "Syria knows what it needs to do to be a stabilizing force."

Lavrov, asserting that "it is counterproductive to isolate anybody," said Russia believes that the Syrian-brokered meeting helped facilitate a dialogue between rival Palestinian factions and "will lead to positive results."

The Russia-U.S. clash over policy in the Middle East came amid some of the worst factional fighting in months between Palestinian forces; at least 18 Palestinians, including two children, were killed yesterday in fighting between Hamas gunmen and forces loyal to Abbas's Fatah party. Rice, when asked if the violence risked making the diplomatic gathering irrelevant, said that the group expressed concern and that "obviously innocent people are being caught up in this violence, and it needs to stop."

DOJ_NMG_0127969

U.S. officials were miffed at Lavrov's intervention, which overshadowed the group's endorsement of Rice's plans to bring together Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and push them to accelerate a long-dormant peace plan.

A senior administration official, briefing reporters on the condition that his name not be disclosed, said the Russians did not suggest any of the ideas in preliminary meetings nor in yesterday's gathering of foreign ministers. "That is their view, but it isn't shared by others," he said.

During the briefing, the official pointedly -- and gleefully -- noted that the Russians contributed only $10 million of the $700 million in aid received by the Palestinians in 2006, suggesting that Moscow was at best a bit player in the region. He also dismissed the impact of the Palestinian meeting in Syria, saying it is "hard to see a positive influence was applied."

During the news conference, Lavrov said Russia supported the communique issued by the Quartet, which called for a Palestinian government "committed to nonviolence, recognition of Israel and acceptance of previous agreements and obligations."

The United States has led an international boycott of the Hamas-led government in an effort to persuade it to abandon its pledge to seek the destruction of Israel. Months of talks between Abbas and Hamas, seeking to forge a unity government that would empower him to negotiate a peace agreement, have not been successful.

The U.S. official boasted that the administration's campaign of isolating Hamas has been successful. He said the U.S. government believes that Hamas has been able to smuggle in only about $46 million in the past 10 months -- for a government that costs about $150 million a month to run. He said U.S. officials have succeeded in identifying and thwarting the delivery of about $400 million in funds that countries had planned to donate to the Hamas government. Instead, he said, the countries -- mainly Arab -- were persuaded to give the money directly to Abbas's independent presidential office.

Rice, accepting an approach long advocated by Europeans and Palestinians, plans to urge Olmert and Abbas to begin discussing the contours of a final peace deal. Previously, the administration argued that such negotiations would be premature until the Palestinians and the Israelis met the initial requirements of the stalled peace plan. Now, Rice says that sketching a "political horizon" would boost the confidence of the two sides to make those early steps.

"There is simply no reason to avoid the subject of how we get to a Palestinian state," Rice said yesterday. "I think, in fact, the political horizon of a Palestinian state can help to show the Palestinian people what is possible."

"Quartet" Backs Revived Middle East Peace Efforts (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — A group of world powers Friday blessed the latest American effort to restart the Middle East peace process, but not before signaling that divisions remained among its members.

The so-called quartet — comprising the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia — released a statement expressing support for a round of U.S.-led talks due to begin this month. It also reaffirmed its support for an economic boycott of the Palestinian government until the ruling Hamas movement agrees to foreswear violence and recognize Israel.

But in private talks, European officials signaled that they wanted to move faster than the Americans toward a deal to create a Palestinian state, diplomats said. And the Russian delegation urged the group to lift its economic boycott of the Palestinian government, saying the measure punished ordinary Palestinians without forcing Hamas to reform.

The new U.S. effort is based on the idea that progress toward peace can be accelerated by sketching the outlines of a final peace deal, the hope being that giving the Palestinians a glimpse of their "political horizon" would motivate them to make the sacrifices needed to get there.

This approach would allow the Palestinians and Israelis to temporarily bypass the initial requirements set out in the step-by-step "road map" to peace originally laid out by the quartet, conditions now seen as an impediment to progress. These steps, to which both sides agreed, include disarming Palestinian militant groups and clearing residents from illegal Jewish outposts in the West Bank.

But in recent discussions, it has become clear that some European and Arab governments want to put more emphasis on working toward a final deal, whereas the United States and Israel stress that the initial steps must not be completely neglected. Israeli officials argue that if the first-stage requirements are not met, neither the Israeli public nor the Palestinians will accept their leaders' eventual deal.

Some European and Arab officials fear that if tangible progress is not made within the next few months, the approach of the American presidential election and deepening international conflict over Iran's nuclear program could again put the talks in a deep freeze.

DOJ_NMG_0127970

"We are all happy about the opportunity we have before us, but it is important to take it," a European diplomat said.

Germany, which currently holds the rotating presidency of the European Union, has been pushing to make the quartet more influential in the peace discussions. Although the United States has been eager to win its partners' support, the quartet's meetings have been infrequent and its role secondary.

At a news conference in Washington, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said he was pleased the quartet had made plans to meet again after U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sits down with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas this month.

"We can only be credible if this becomes a long-term, sustainable process," he said.

American officials have been pushing for the new talks in part to solidify support for the United States among Sunni Arab governments in the Middle East, whose backing Washington badly needs in its efforts to stabilize Iraq and challenge Iran.

They also hope that progress in the talks will strengthen Abbas in his struggle against Hamas.

Yet most observers say the effort faces long odds, in part because of the precarious political position of Olmert and Abbas.

In their statement, the quartet members expressed "deep concern" about the latest fighting in the Palestinian territories between Hamas and Fatah, Abbas' movement.

David Makovsky, a senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said it would be tricky for the Palestinians and Israelis to rough out a peace plan with the right amount of detail.

"The question is, will this 'political horizon' be in high definition, or will it be so blurry that it's meaningless?" he said. "You want it to have enough resolution that it can give people a sense of drive and focus, but not so much that it will enable opponents of these leaders to pick it apart. It's unclear you can strike a balance like that."

U.S., Russia Clash Over Syria In Mideast (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 3, 2007

The United States and Russia clashed on Friday over Moscow's suggestion that Syria should be included in efforts to advance an Israeli-Palestinian peace settlement.

"Syria could play a constructive role," Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said after a meeting of world powers to discuss Mideast strategy.

However, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed little enthusiasm for such a prospect. "I hope that it (Syria) will in fact try and play a positive role rather than a negative one," she told reporters.

The Bush administration has resisted expanding diplomatic ties with Syria, which it blames for lending support to radical Islamic groups Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian territories.

The U.S. has also expressed reluctance to reach out to Syria and Iran in a regional effort to reduce violence in Iraq, arguing that both countries' actions show they have little interest in stabilizing the area.

Still, said Lavrov, "It is counterproductive to isolate anybody."

Rice said that dormant Mideast peace talks should resume despite an outbreak of violence among Palestinian factions.

"It doesn't help to talk about a timetable, but it does help to talk about a commitment," Rice said after her meeting at the State Department with foreign ministers from the United Nations, the European Union and Russia.

The gathering of would-be peacemakers came amid renewed fighting between Hamas militants and security forces loyal to the former ruling Fatah Party that has raised new alarm about a possible Palestinian civil war.

More than 100 Palestinians have been killed in internal violence since Hamas won parliamentary elections last year and formed a Cabinet.

Despite that violence, "there's simply no reason to avoid the subject of how we get to a Palestinian state," Rice said.

The international leaders reiterated the conditions they set for the Hamas-led Palestinian government to receive vital overseas financial aid and international political recognition.

Those include recognition of Israel, renouncing violence and embracing prior agreements between Israel and the Palestinians to work toward peace.

That statement was signed a year ago, days after Hamas won a surprise victory in Palestinian elections.

Hamas has refused to meet the terms, however, leading to a cutoff of direct international aid and a breakdown of services and order in the Palestinian territories.

World powers have largely abandoned hope that Hamas radicals will drop the anti-Israel positions and are looking for a new approach.

Rice was asked about the violence in Gaza and other Palestinian areas.

DOJ_NMG_0127971

"We expressed our concern about events on the ground in the Palestinian territories. Obviously innocent people are being caught up in this violence and it needs to stop," she said.

But, she said, "The Palestinian people have waited a long time for a state and the Israeli people have waited a long time for the peace and security that would come from having a democratic neighbor."

The four-way meeting, convened by Rice, risked appearing irrelevant in light of the internal Palestinian disarray.

Any eventual political accommodation with Israel would require a Palestinian government unified and capable enough to negotiate lasting terms.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the internal divisions are issues for the Palestinians alone to resolve.

The United States is looking for ways to revive peace efforts partly as a way to reassure Arab allies that it wants to improve the Palestinians' plight and solidify those allies against Iran.

Shiite Iran has close ties to Hamas, which the West considers a terrorist organization.

One goal of the session was to demonstrate tangible support for secular Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

"The international community is going to do everything it can to settle the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians," German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said before the meeting. He attended the session because Germany currently holds the European Union's rotating presidency.

Cease-fires between the two sides in recent weeks and months have quickly fallen apart — the most recent was announced early Tuesday.

In the latest fighting, gunmen waged battles in the streets with mortar shells, rockets and heavy machine guns.

Abbas appealed Friday for calm.

"I call on all parties in Gaza to stop these actions that harm the Palestinian people," he said.

U.S. Talks With Palestinians And Israelis Gain Support (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — Middle East peace negotiators gave broad endorsement on Friday to American designs for three-way talks led by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and involving Israeli and Palestinian leaders. But discord immediately surfaced with Russian comments that Syria, too, could play a constructive role.

After the meeting here of representatives of the so-called quartet of the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union, Ban Ki-moon, the new United Nations secretary general, read a statement from the group expressing hopes that Ms. Rice's meetings in the Middle East this month "could begin to define more clearly the political horizon for the Palestinian people, and help engender a sense of partnership."

The talks, which officials said could include discussions of such sweeping issues as the shape of a final peace treaty and the nature of a Palestinian state, would not be a substitute for the internationally agreed framework for actions required of Israelis and Palestinians, which was drawn up in 2003.

That so-called road map called for the Palestinians first to disarm militants and eliminate terrorist organizations while Israel froze the building of settlements.

The quartet, in its statement, said it "affirmed the primacy of the road map, and welcomed United States efforts to accelerate progress on the road map."

At a news conference after the meeting, though, Sergey V. Lavrov, the Russian foreign minister, expressed his country's view that "we are in favor of involving all those who can contribute to progress and to this process, and definitely in this case Syria could play a constructive role."

In looking for solutions to problems all across the Middle East, he added, "we believe that it is counterproductive to isolate anybody."

The United States maintains diplomatic relations with Syria, but State Department officials say no deeper engagement is warranted until the government in Damascus halts support for radical organizations, including Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian territories.

"I think Syria knows what it needs to do to be a stabilizing force," Ms. Rice said. "And Syria doesn't need the United States to tell it what it could do to be a stabilizing force."

Mr. Lavrov underscored another difference with American policy, saying that resolving the Israeli-Palestinian dispute requires dealing with Hamas, which swept legislative elections in the Palestinian territories about a year ago.

"I can only repeat that we are convinced that it is necessary to work with Hamas to try to influence their position so that Hamas would accept those principles that were formulated by the quartet," Mr. Lavrov said. "In order for this to happen, what is necessary is to conduct persistent work with Hamas, and Russia is doing that."

DOJ_NMG_0127972

When Ms. Rice travels to the region this month, she will meet with Ehud Olmert, the Israeli prime minister beleaguered by a clumsy war in Lebanon and financial scandal in his party, and with Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president whose Fatah movement is battling Hamas politically and on the streets.

The official statement expressed deep concern over the continued factional violence, and Ms. Rice argued that fighting on the streets — and years of political stalemate — did not render the quartet's work irrelevant.

"The Palestinian people have waited a long time for a state, and the Israeli people have waited a long time for the peace and security that would come from having a democratic neighbor that was willing to live in peace with them," Ms. Rice said. "And so I don't think we want to delay any longer the development of a political horizon for these people, and I think it would give great cause for hope in this region."

In their statements, the mediators reaffirmed that the Hamas-led government must adhere to international terms for ending violence and dealing with Israel in order to receive international financial contributions and political support.

In the absence of those actions by Hamas, the four negotiating partners reaffirmed that nations should embargo financial aid to Hamas institutions in the government.

A senior administration official, speaking anonymously under standard diplomatic rules, said after the meeting that more than $700 million in assistance flowed last year to organizations under the control of Mr. Abbas and his party, or to charitable groups in the Palestinian territories, while Hamas received about $110 million.

The official said the government in Moscow had sent only about $10 million in aid to the Palestinians last year. A proposal before Congress would send about $86 million to Mr. Abbas's security forces and other medical and humanitarian aid.

Major Powers Endorse US Initiative On Israeli-Palestinian Peace (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 3, 2007

Major powers endorsed a US plan to accelerate efforts to achieve an Arab-Iraeli peace deal and establish a Palestinian state.

But the initiative was marred by renewed Palestinian factional violence, a rift with Russia over whether to bring Syria into the process and a weary skepticism that Israeli and Palestinian leaders are strong enough to lead their people to peace.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hosted the meeting of her counterparts from Russia, the European Union and United Nations following a day of clashes in the Gaza Strip between forces loyal to the Western-backed Palestinian president, Mahmud Abbas, and the radical Islamic movement Hamas.

At least 25 people died in the fighting before the two sides agreed on a truce late Friday, but there was no certainty the ceasefire would stop the worst violence yet in a year-long power struggle between Abbas' secular Fatah party and Hamas.

In a final communique read out by UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, the so-called Mideast Quartet expressed its "deep concern" over the factional fighting and called for an end to continuing Palestinian militant attacks on Israel.

But the main purpose of the meeting, the first in five months for the largely inactive group, was to provide backing to Rice's effort to jump-start the Quartet's still-born 2003 "road map" for Israeli-Palestinian peace.

The plan envisaged a three-phase effort focused first on ending Palestinian attacks on Israel and restricting Israeli activities inside the occupied territories and then moving on to steps towards the establishment of a Palestinian state, a goal it hoped to achieve in 2005.

But the plan never moved beyond stage one, torpedoed by Palestininian attacks on Israel and harsh Israeli clampdowns on the territories.

On Friday, the group supported Rice's new approach to move forward on two fronts -- strengthening Abbas' ability to govern and ensure security while, in parallel, holding talks on critical "final status" issues like the borders of a Palestinian state and the future of Jerusalem.

"There is simply no reason to avoid the subject of how we get to a Palestinian state," Rice said at a joint press conference with Ban, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, Frank-Walter Steinmeier of Germany and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana.

Rice declined to set any new timetable for the process.

Friday's meeting was a prelude to a three-way meeting later this month between Rice, Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Washington has billed the encounter as the premiere for its new peace drive, but given the political weakness of both Abbas and Olmert, success is far from guaranteed.

Although he is the elected Palestinian president, Abbas saw his authority eclipsed when Hamas won elections a year ago and gained control of the self-rule government.

DOJ_NMG_0127973

The Quartet responded by suspending critical aid to the government, provoking an economic breakdown in the territories.

Olmert has been severely weakened by his perceived mismanagement of last year's war against the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon.

"We're doing this in an environment where, frankly, there is a lot of stress on each of the parties," a senior US official acknowledged.

"The conditions are such that expectations may outstrip the ability of the parties right now to deal with their situation," he said.

Steinmeier, participating because Germany currently holds the rotating EU presidency, was equally cautious.

"We are realistic enough to know it's not something that can be achieved overnight," he said.

Abbas has been trying for months to negotiate a unity government pact with Hamas which would meet the Quartet's conditions for lifting the aid embargo -- recognition of Israel, a renunciation of violence and compliance with past peace agreements with the Jewish state.

Hamas has refused.

The Quartet on Friday reaffirmed the boycott would remain in place until a Palestinian government that agrees to the principles is in place.

But that unity frayed when Russia argued publicly in favor of opening a dialogue with Syria -- which hosts Hamas' hardline leadership -- a stance Rice has ruled out.

"Syria could play a constructive role," Lavrov said, calling the "boycotts and isolation" backed by Washington "counterproductive."

Russia Decries Hamas Boycott (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

Russia urged the United States and Europe yesterday to end a boycott of the Palestinians' Hamas-led government, exposing divisions in the group of international mediators known as the Quartet as it met in Washington in an effort to restart Middle East peace talks.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hosted the meeting at the State Department on a day when fighting in the Gaza Strip raged between Hamas and the rival Fatah party, claiming at least 17 lives on the deadliest day thus far in a violent power struggle.

"We expressed our concern about events on the ground in the Palestinian territories," Miss Rice told reporters. "Obviously, innocent people are being caught up in this violence, and it needs to stop."

The Quartet -- consisting of the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations -- expressed support for Washington's initiative to begin talks between Israel and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who also leads Fatah.

Miss Rice, who is expected to visit the Middle East later this month, plans to convene a three-way meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Mr. Abbas, although the date and place have yet to be announced.

But at a press conference after yesterday's meeting, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said the U.S. and EU policy of boycotting Hamas is not working.

"I don't think that to resolve this problem -- just like any problem that exists in the world -- you could do it through boycott and isolation," he said. "We are convinced that it is necessary to work with Hamas to try to influence their position, so that Hamas would accept the principles formulated by the Quartet."

The United States and European Union refuse to speak directly with Hamas officials in the Palestinian government and have cut off most international aid to the Palestinians until Hamas renounces violence, recognizes Israel's right to exist and accepts previous Palestinian agreements with the Jewish state.

Russia will continue its contacts with Hamas because it "received support from the Palestinian people during the elections a year ago," Mr. Lavrov said.

A senior U.S. official, responding to Mr. Lavrov's comments, acknowledged that the Quartet does not have a "uniform contact policy" on Hamas. Asked if Russian influence has helped so far, the official said that Hamas is less comfortable saying "no," although it is not yet saying "yes."

The United States and the European Union consider Hamas a terrorist organization.

Mr. Lavrov also said that Syria can play a "constructive role" as a mediator between Fatah and Hamas, but Miss Rice countered that "there is no need for [Syria's] mediation."

DOJ_NMG_0127974

In Gaza yesterday, Fatah and Hamas gunmen attacked two universities and a radio station and each other on the streets. At least 24 persons died and about 250 were wounded in a 24-hour period since a cease-fire collapsed Thursday. Another cease-fire was arranged late yesterday.

18 Palestinians Killed In Gaza Fighting (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 2 -- At least 18 Palestinians, including two children, were killed in heavy factional fighting across the northern Gaza Strip on Friday, leaving a truce reached this week in ashes.

The street battles between gunmen from the rival Fatah and Hamas movements brought the two-day death toll among Palestinians to at least 24. The two groups have been locked for the past year in a political struggle for control of the Palestinian Authority.

More than 220 people were injured in the fighting, described by witnesses in Gaza as some of the most sustained since Hamas took day-to-day control of the Palestinian government 10 months ago. In terms of casualties, the violence ranks among the worst in a year.

"I call on all parties in Gaza to stop these actions that harm the Palestinian people," said Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a Fatah leader.

The fighting, confined largely to northern Gaza, appears increasingly resistant to efforts by party leaders to stop it. Many of Gaza's streets, lined with barricades and echoing with the crackle of gunfire, were abandoned Friday as marauding gunmen torched meeting halls, security compounds and parts of the campus of Islamic University, which is affiliated with Hamas.

Over the past year, partisan violence has flared at moments of political stress between Fatah and Hamas leaders, who met with Egyptian mediators Friday in an effort to end the current fighting. After the meeting, Hamas and Fatah officials called for an immediate cease-fire and for all armed men to leave the streets, although it was unclear whether the order would be followed.

Hamas, a radical Islamic movement that does not recognize Israel's right to exist, deposed Fatah in January 2006 parliamentary elections that were supported by Israel and the United States.

The victory gave Hamas control of the Palestinian ministries, although disagreement with Fatah leaders arose immediately over control of the 70,000-plus members of the security services. Hamas formed its own security branch in Gaza, which is now involved in the fighting against the Fatah-controlled services. The movements also have potent armed wings, which often do not respond to orders from their parties' political leaders.

About 70 Palestinians have been killed since December, when Abbas, a relative moderate, threatened to call early elections if Hamas did not agree to form a power-sharing government that included Fatah and some smaller parties.

The United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations, the group of Middle East peace intermediaries known as the Quartet, cut off most aid to the Palestinian Authority soon after Hamas's election victory. The Quartet, which met Friday in Washington, is demanding that Hamas recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by previously signed agreements with the Jewish state as conditions for renewed aid.

The embargo has impoverished the Palestinian government and much of the territories, especially Gaza, where a high proportion of the population relies on Palestinian Authority salaries. But Hamas has refused to moderate its position and characterizes Abbas's threat to call early elections, including for his own office, as an attempt to overthrow its elected government.

Abbas is scheduled to meet next week with Khaled Mashal, the exiled leader of Hamas's political wing, in the Muslim holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia. The two made little progress toward forming a unity government during a rare meeting last month in the Syrian capital of Damascus. King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia invited them to Mecca earlier this week to continue those talks in hopes of ending the factional fighting.

The rattle and bang of rifle and rocket-propelled grenade fire rang out across the northern strip throughout Friday, the Muslim day of prayer, and a column of black smoke billowed over Islamic University in the heart of Gaza City.

For the second straight day, Fatah forces stormed the campus and came under fire from the Hamas-controlled security force. After an operation there Thursday, Fatah officials said they had seized a large cache of assault rifles and captured seven Iranians, whom they described as "explosives experts."

Hamas, a Sunni Muslim movement, has accepted millions of dollars from Shiite Iran during the international aid embargo. But Hamas officials denied the presence of Iranians in Gaza, and Fatah officials presented no proof of the arrests.

Among the dead Friday was a commander of Fatah security services, who party officials said had been executed by Hamas gunmen. Health officials said two children, ages 5 and 7, also died of their wounds.

DOJ_NMG_0127975

16 Die In Gaza Factional Clashes (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood, Rushdi Abu Alouf

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

GAZA CITY — Fighting between rival Palestinian forces continued to rage across the Gaza Strip, killing at least 16 people Friday in violence that laid waste to a days-old cease-fire.

As gunmen battled in the streets, Egyptian officials sought to broker a fresh truce between the ruling Hamas movement and its main rival, Fatah. By day's end, the two sides had announced a tentative agreement to restore the cease-fire reached Tuesday, but it seemed at best a fragile deal as heavily armed men continued to stalk the streets.

Some of the most intense fighting took place when Hamas gunmen attacked bases used by security forces loyal to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who leads Fatah.

Hamas militants launched mortar rounds and crude Kassam rockets at a main base for security forces in Gaza City and at Abbas' compound nearby. Abbas was not in Gaza at the time.

Fatah forces struck back with heavy machine guns and by setting fire to a building at Islamic University, a Hamas stronghold, where more fierce exchanges took place. Hours later, attackers set fire to Al Quds University, which is affiliated with Fatah.

The dead included at least two children and three Hamas fighters. Most of those killed were Fatah members of the various security forces, including a regional commander of the national intelligence service.

More than 140 people were injured in Friday's violence, a continuation of skirmishing a night earlier that killed six people and left dozens hurt. The earlier fighting began when Hamas gunmen attacked a truck convoy that the group said was carrying arms from Egypt to Fatah's forces. Fatah and Egyptian officials denied the accusation.

For most of Friday, gunfire crackled through the largely deserted streets of Gaza City. Many people remained indoors, and even restaurants along main avenues were shuttered.

"I call on everybody, regardless of their political affiliation, to put an end to this bloodletting," Abbas said, speaking to reporters in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

Abbas is expected to travel to Saudi Arabia next week to meet with Hamas leaders for talks on a power-sharing arrangement that could end the factional tensions. Saudi officials invited the two sides for the talks in the Muslim holy city of Mecca. Abbas met last month with exiled Hamas leader Khaled Meshaal in Damascus, the Syrian capital, but they did not reach an agreement.

The groups have been locked in a power struggle since Hamas defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections in January 2006. Several cease-fire agreements have broken down as tensions between the rival militias surged and political leaders' appeals for calm went unheeded.

The violence has worsened since December, when Abbas said he would call new elections as a way to break the months-long political standoff.

Hamas leaders reject the idea of early elections, which they view as illegal and an attempt to topple them. Abbas has not formally declared elections, or set a date.

More than 70 people have died in factional clashes since mid-December.

Friday's flare-up came as Middle East peace mediators were meeting in Washington to consider how to bolster Abbas and restart the stalled diplomatic process between Israel and the Palestinians.

The Bush administration has said it will step up its involvement. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice plans to travel to the region this month for a three-way meeting with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that is meant to spur informal discussions on the outlines of a possible final agreement.

But prospects for a breakthrough appear remote given the weak political standing of both Olmert and Abbas. Olmert has been highly unpopular among Israeli voters since the war in Lebanon last year, and Abbas is hobbled by the internal turmoil with Hamas.

Months of talks between Hamas and Fatah over a power-sharing arrangement have foundered in large part because of differences over how to divide Cabinet portfolios and Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel.

Abbas has sought to persuade Hamas to accept a political plan that would satisfy the West and bring an end to an aid embargo against the radical Islamist group, which many nations consider a terrorist organization.

In An Israeli Town Prone To Attacks, New York's Mayor Denounces Terror (NYT)

By Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127976

SDEROT, Israel, Feb. 2 — Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg touched down by helicopter on a bare patch of dirt here on Friday, bringing his message against terror to a town shaken by persistent attacks from Palestinian militants firing rockets over the border from Gaza.

"I think this town, as much as any place you'll ever visit, tells you why we can never negotiate with terrorists," he said to a throng of reporters jostling on a hill overlooking Gaza, where violence between Palestinian factions has escalated in recent days. "Israel has a right to exist, and nobody should force on Israel anything."

He said that the country needed to work with its Arab neighbors, but added that if groups did not renounce terrorism, abide by their accords and recognize Israel's right to exist, "I personally think Israel shouldn't talk to them."

In a tour that lasted just under an hour, Mr. Bloomberg made the traditional stops for a visitor here, including one to examine a pile of spent and rusty rocket shells at the police station.

But what was striking in this town of roughly 23,000 was the sense of normalcy, despite the few rockets that had fallen just the night before. There were snaking rows of tidy, red-tile-topped houses, children walking through the streets and clusters of young people at sidewalk cafes. Even Mr. Bloomberg seemed to reflect that atmosphere, hauling out his well-worn joke to take credit for the morning's sunshine.

"The mayor brought good weather, that's the mayor's job," he told Eli Moyal, the mayor of Sderot, as the two walked together.

Just beneath the everyday veneer, though, lies the conflict's toll. Outside a youth center, Mr. Bloomberg met Yonatan Abukasis, whose 17-year-old daughter was killed in 2005 as she shielded her younger brother from an exploding rocket.

"I have two daughters, and I can't imagine," Mr. Bloomberg told Mr. Abukasis, who thanked the mayor for coming. "It's a reminder, all of us, how terrorists try to take away our freedoms. Sadly, some people pay with their lives, as in your case."

At the center, which is dedicated to the girl, a cluster of about three dozen small children greeted the mayor, singing songs for the festival of Tu Bishvat, which celebrates the new year of trees, and waving tiny Israeli flags.

In keeping with the traditional way of observing the holiday, the mayor planted a tree, helping hoist it up and shoveling dirt around the base.

Beside the tree, David Fendel, who is from Long Island and is head of an academy here, expressed his frustration to the mayor, saying that he could not understand how the American government could give aid to Palestinians. Mr. Bloomberg responded, "Well, it's up to the State Department to decide."

Still, Mr. Fendel told him that he appreciated Mr. Bloomberg's "whole attitude."

"You chose to come to Sderot," he said. "People living in fright and we're peace-loving."

On the hill overlooking Gaza, another man, Avi Farchan, approached Mr. Bloomberg and told him that missiles had destroyed his house. He gave the mayor a letter to give to President Bush seeking to end the aid.

Mr. Bloomberg, who traveled the town in an armored car and was accompanied by his New York police detail and a member of the Israeli secret service, told reporters that he was not fearful about visiting.

"I'm not afraid of terrorists," he said.

Yuval Donio Gideon, an official with Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said that Israelis appreciated his making the trip. "We think this is important, as the mayor of New York City that he's here and he's identifying with Israeli daily problems."

U.S. Takes China To WTO Over Subsidies (WP/AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

The Bush administration, under pressure from the Democratic-controlled Congress to do something about America's soaring trade deficit, filed a trade case yesterday against China in a dispute involving government subsidies.

The complaint, filed with the World Trade Organization in Geneva, alleges that China is using government support and tax policies to bolster local companies in competition against U.S. and other foreign firms.

"We are seeking to level the playing field to allow U.S. manufacturers to compete fairly with Chinese firms," U.S. Trade Representative Susan C. Schwab said in announcing the case.

The action will trigger a 60-day consultation during which trade negotiators will try to resolve the dispute. If that fails, a WTO hearing panel will be convened to handle it.

A victory by the administration would clear the way for the United States to impose economic sanctions against China if it refuses to change its subsidy program.

Schwab's announcement that a case was being filed came two days after Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. faced stiff questioning before a congressional panel where both Democrats and Republicans accused the administration of doing too little to deal with a swelling trade deficit with China.

DOJ_NMG_0127977

An official with China's delegation to the WTO said the Chinese would have no immediate comment on the case.

Democrats in Congress praised the administration's action, saying they hoped it signaled a more aggressive policy toward what they say are unfair Chinese trade practices.

"Forcing China to eliminate its illegal subsidies will keep world markets open to U.S. goods, keeping jobs at home," said Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont).

"This case represents a step in the right direction, but it must be part of a much more aggressive program to take actions against violations of WTO obligations," said Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich), the head of a House Ways and Means Committee trade panel.

John Engler, a former Michigan governor who heads the National Association of Manufacturers, said he was disappointed that other major trading partners, including Japan and the European Union, refused administration requests to join in filing the case. "We hope that other countries will reconsider joining the case, recognizing it is not fair to have the United States do all the heavy lifting," Engler said.

This is the second WTO case the administration has filed against China in the past year. Last March, it accused China of using a tax system deemed illegal by the WTO to block imports of American and other foreign-made auto parts into China.

Paulson told the Senate Banking Committee on Wednesday that he believed a high-level dialogue that began last December with top Chinese officials offered the best approach to dealing with trade issues.

The administration has been trying to get China to allow its currency to rise in value against the dollar. U.S. manufacturers contend that the Chinese currency, the yuan, is undervalued by as much as 40 percent, giving Chinese products a huge competitive advantage against American goods.

US-China Tensions Rise Over Subsidies (FT)

By Eoin Callan, ichard McGregor

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

The US on Friday launched a major trade dispute with China over alleged subsidies for manufacturing exports in an escalation of economic tensions with Beijing.

Susan Schwab, the US trade representative, said: “Our decision to bring this case to the World Trade Organisation comes after our efforts at dialogue failed.”

The escalation by the Bush administration follows pressure from the new Democratic majority in Congress and for tougher action over a record annual trade deficit with China of $214bn.

The US filing alleges China “uses its basic tax laws and other tools to encourage exports and to discriminate against imports of a variety of American manufactured goods”.

“The subsidies at issue are offered across the spectrum of industry sectors in China - whether in steel, wood products, information technology, or others,” said Ms Schwab.

The action by the Bush administration was viewed as part of a strategy to win Congressional approval for the renewal of the president’s fast-track trade negotiating authority when it expires on June 30.

The executive negotiating authority is viewed by White House advisers as necessary to advance their economic agenda during President George W. Bush’s last two years in office.

Edward Alden, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, said: “It’s a smart move politically, though practically it’s a far bigger and more complicated case than anything the US has attempted against China so far.”

Sander Levin, chairman of the trade subcommittee in House of Representatives, said: “This case represents a step in the right direction, but it must be part of a much more aggressive program to take actions against violations of WTO obligations.”

Max Baucus, chairman of the Senate finance committee, said: “I hope that today’s action is a signal that the US trade representative will take more vigorous action in the future when China or any other country fails to abide by trade agreements.”

Daniel Griswold, an analyst at the Cato Institute, a conservative think tank, said the case would “give the US leverage with China to compel it to change its tax laws”.

“I think this strategy does carry the risk that it will create tensions and maybe even harden the Chinese position,” he said.

The dispute process allows time for the case to be resolved through dialogue and was several steps away from a “full-blown trade war”, the analyst said.

US manufacturers welcomed the dispute and urged the White House to pursue the case to its conclusion.

John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said: “Pursuing WTO cases like this one helps respond to widespread concern that trade is unfair and that the system does not work for us.”

DOJ_NMG_0127978

The US case may target the range of export tax rebates offered by China to local firms, many of which were introduced in the late nineties in the wake of the Asian financial crisis. The rebates were aimed at shielding Chinese exporters from the impact at the time of rapidly depreciating currencies in Asia, which made the goods of their regional rivals cheaper on overseas markets.

China has cut the rebates in some sectors in the last two years, but many remain, despite booming exports and a swelling trade surplus with both the US in particular and the world as a whole.

The US action also appears to attack the range of incentives offered by the both the central and local governments in China to attract foreign investment.

U.S. Trade Effort On China Suffers 2 More Setbacks (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The Bush administration's efforts to ease economic strains with China suffered two setbacks Friday with the resignation of a top official in charge of the China dialogue and an announcement that talks on a critical trade dispute had failed to resolve differences.

The United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, said Friday that "our efforts at dialogue failed" to resolve disputes over the American charge that China had illegally subsidized several industries to promote exports. She said Washington would bring the issue to the World Trade Organization, a major escalation in American pressure.

"We would have preferred to work this out," Ms. Schwab said. "We regret that was not possible."

The dispute was over Chinese subsidies of steel, wood products, information technology and other products that compete with goods made in the United States, Ms. Schwab said. Trade officials noted, however, that going to the trade organization would simply open a new phase of talks that could take years.

Meanwhile, the resignation of Timothy D. Adams as under secretary of the Treasury for international affairs was the second departure in five months of the person at Treasury in charge of the overall dialogue with China.

The departure of Mr. Adams comes at a time of rising impatience in Congress over the "strategic economic dialogue" started by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. in September as one of his principal objectives on the international stage.

The dialogue is aimed at improving understanding and the atmosphere for resolving a range of economic disputes, particularly over the American demand that China allow its currency, the yuan, to float more freely on international exchange rates.

A higher value of the yuan would presumably affect the trade balance by making exports to America more expensive and American exports to China cheaper, economists say. The yuan has risen about 6.5 percent in the last year and a half but Mr. Paulson told a Senate committee this week that China had moved too slowly to make its exchange rate more flexible.

In his resignation letter to President Bush, whom he had served as an adviser in the 2000 presidential campaign and in Treasury posts since then, Mr. Adams said that he wanted to return to private life to spend more time with his wife and children.

"I refuse to give anything but my best as I endeavor to make a difference in public service," he said.

Family reasons were also cited last fall in the departure of Mr. Adams's predecessor in the job of overseeing the dialogue, Deborah Lehr, a China specialist with experience in government and the private sector. Ms. Lehr resigned only six weeks after her recruitment by Mr. Paulson. Treasury officials are expected to name a new envoy to handle the dialogue soon.

Mr. Paulson praised Mr. Adams for his service, especially for his work on China. As under secretary, Mr. Adams also worked on changes at the International Monetary Fund and in coordinating economic policy with American allies around the world.

There has been speculation in Washington that Mr. Adams was growing impatient with the pace of progress on the China initiative. But when Treasury officials were asked about this some weeks ago, they said there was no truth to the rumors that Mr. Adams planned to leave.

Acquaintances of Mr. Adams said that his decision to go was fueled less by policy matters than by the lack of a personal chemistry with Mr. Paulson, who came aboard the administration only last summer.

Mr. Adams was said to have chafed when Ms. Lehr was appointed as the China envoy last fall, and then again this winter as others have assumed the role of organizing the dialogue. Mr. Adams is a political insider with ties to the campaign apparatus of the Bush team, and Mr. Paulson is a former executive at Goldman Sachs who freely acknowledges his lack of interest and even distaste for politics.

Some friends said that Mr. Adams had always intended to leave the administration before the end of its second term, having served as a top official to Mr. Paulson and two predecessors, Paul H. O'Neill and John W. Snow, both of whom were ousted from the job by the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0127979

"I haven't seen any daylight between what I've heard Tim say about China and what I've heard the secretary say," said Tony Fratto, a former assistant secretary of the treasury for public affairs and now a White House spokesman. Mr. Fratto added that he would be surprised if any policy differences with Mr. Paulson led to Mr. Adams's decision to resign.

Nevertheless, Mr. Adams's departure means that yet another person will have to take over the economic talks with China only a few months before the next meeting, which is in May, at a time of mounting criticism in Congress that the dialogue has produced few results other than setting up an elaborate process to talk about the issues.

Mr. Paulson told the Senate Banking Committee that he shared the senators' "frustration" that the talks had not yet produced results. Treasury officials say he is hoping to produce tangible signs of progress on trade, commercial ties and currency before the next meeting.

But the failure of the trade talks on the decision to take the issue to the World Trade Organization suggests that the benchmarks already sought by the administration are proving difficult to meet. The move on manufactured goods announced by Ms. Schwab follows another such action last year, in which the United States took China to the World Trade Organization over what Washington regarded as China's failure to import American-made auto parts.

Currencies: G-7 May Cast A Wary Eye On Valuations Of The Yuan, Yen (WSJ)

By Joellen Perry

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

When finance ministers from the Group of Seven leading industrial nations meet in Germany next weekend, look out for a tussle over two Asian currencies.

U.S. officials will continue to focus on China's weak yuan at the talks, which take place in the former industrial powerhouse of Essen. But European policy makers have said they will push for a discussion about Japan's currency to be included in the talks, as well. They say the yen's low value gives Japanese exporters an unfair edge against competitors that have to pay for their costs in euros. After losing 10% against the euro in the past year, the yen hit record lows in January against the European Union's common currency, which is used by 13 nations, including Germany and France.

Japan is expected to fight back, and this time will find the U.S. on its side. Though Japan has often been criticized in the past for manipulating the yen's value, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said last week that the yen's value now accurately reflects Japan's economic situation. Though the yen recently hit four-year lows against the dollar, and U.S. car makers have also complained about the currency's weakness, U.S. Treasury officials are reluctant to champion any artificial adjustment in the yen at a time when they are pushing for a market-valued yuan.

Japan's timid recovery is part of the reason its currency is low. Rock-bottom interest rates, at 0.25%, have also made the currency a prime player in the global "carry trade," in which investors borrow in low-yielding currencies like the yen to invest in more lucrative currencies elsewhere. Carry trades further weaken the yen as traders sell off the currency. With domestic consumption and consumer-price data still muted, significant interest-rate rises from the Bank of Japan seem unlikely in the short term, so the yen will likely stay low.

That is a particular problem for countries that use the euro. Exports helped last year to power the euro bloc to its fastest economic growth since 2000. Policy makers worry a feeble yen, on top of the euro's recent rise against the dollar, will undercut that expansion. Manufacturing survey data for January show a stronger euro has already begun dampening export growth across the region.

A flagging yen also underscores the euro zone's widening disparities. Productivity increases and meager wage growth have helped Germany gain against reform laggards like France and Italy to become the world's largest exporter in terms of value. "We are more sensitive to the exchange rate because we are less good than Germany in terms of structural competitiveness," says Christian de Boissieu, chairman of the French Prime Minster's Council of Economic Analysis.

More fundamentally, as the euro strengthens simultaneously against the dollar and the yen, European policy makers worry the currency is unfairly bearing the burden of global imbalances. When the dollar slid last year, in part on fears of the U.S.'s huge trade deficit, Asian economies with trade surpluses and currencies pegged to the dollar helped stem the slide by buying dollars. At the same time, jittery investors world-wide switched dollar-denominated assets for euro ones, pushing up the European currency's value.

Trade Boom (WP)

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

THE STRONG growth in the U.S. economy reported this week for the last quarter of 2006, and the year as a whole, had a lot to do with burgeoning American exports. In the first 11 months of 2006, they reached $1.1 trillion, a 13 percent increase over the same period in 2005. Though the U.S. trade deficit is still huge, recent figures show exports growing at three times the rate of imports; sales to China are up by a third. Moreover, U.S. exports to the handful of countries with which there are free-trade agreements are booming disproportionately: Though Mexico, Canada, Chile and other free-trade-pact partners make up only 7 percent of the non-U.S. global economy, they are buying 42 percent of the American goods and services sold abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0127980

All this good news is one reason congressional Democrats should support President Bush's request to renew his trade promotion authority, which expires July 1. The authority allows the president to negotiate bilateral and multilateral trade agreements and submit them to a single, up-or-down vote by Congress; without it, the deals Mr. Bush has cut with Latin American, Middle Eastern and Asian countries would have been impossible. Important bilateral trade pacts with South Korea, Malaysia and Thailand, which could give another big boost to American exports, probably won't be finished by midyear, so the extra time will be needed.

Much more important, quiet talks between Bush administration and European Union officials in recent weeks have raised hopes that the global trade negotiation known as the Doha round can be raised from the grave where it was buried last summer. Doha offers the promise of enormous benefits to U.S. exporters and the world economy as a whole. The World Bank has estimated that it could lift 10 million people out of poverty in the poorest nations. But it will require big cuts by rich countries in subsidies for agricultural exports in exchange for reductions in tariffs on industrial goods and services by middle-income countries such as Brazil and India.

Mr. Bush took an important step toward reviving Doha last week by proposing a new farm bill that would reduce U.S. agricultural subsidies by $18 billion in the next five years. The average annual funding in the bill is $17 billion, the ceiling U.S. negotiators have talked about in bargaining with the European Union. In exchange, Europe would be expected to reduce its subsidies by 54 percent.

A lot of Democrats got elected in November by running against free trade; more than three dozen of them recently wrote to the new House Ways and Means Committee chairman, Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), asking for a reversal of "the troubling results of the administration's trade agreements and trade policies." Fortunately, Mr. Rangel and Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.) of the Senate Finance Committee appear to recognize the harm that would be caused if Congress torpedoed the Doha round. They have signaled a willingness to talk with the administration about the renewal of trade promotion authority; Mr. Bush, for his part, recognized in a speech last week that trade "can also lead to hardships for our workers and their families" and offered to work with Congress to improve assistance programs for those affected. With flexibility on both sides, a deal should be possible.

Chinese Official Warns Against Independence Of Courts (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 2 — “Enemy forces” are seeking to use China’s legal system to Westernize and divide the country, and the Communist Party must fend them off by maintaining its dominance over lawyers, judges and prosecutors, China’s top law and order official said in a detailed speech whose text was published Friday.

The official, Luo Gan, who is a member of the governing nine-man Politburo Standing Committee, said in an address published in the state-run magazine Seeking Truth that judicial officials had the responsibility to “prevent infiltration that might threaten national security.”

Mr. Luo said that China is now part of the global community and that it must consider “international factors” when making judicial decisions. But he drew a sharp line between such interests and allowing greater leeway for lawyers, judges and prosecutors to make decisions independently as they do in the West.

“There is no question about where legal departments should stand,” Mr. Luo said. “The correct political stand is where the party stands.”

The speech appeared to amplify President Hu Jintao’s past calls to guard against a Western-inspired “color revolution” of the kind that brought political change in Central Asia, Central Europe and Lebanon.

Lawsuits filed against party and government entities have sometimes made the courts a forum for public expressions of discontent.

Some Chinese lawyers and rights advocates have sought to use the country’s laws and courts, which on paper resemble legal and judicial structures in place in Europe and the United States, to check abuses of power and enforce individual freedoms enshrined in China’s Constitution.

China’s highest profile cases attract attention from the media and international human rights groups that follow developments in China, which is especially sensitive given its designation as host of the 2008 Olympics.

In practice, prosecutors and judges answer to Political-Legal Committees run by the Communist Party. Verdicts in cases that involve delicate issues are decided by ranking party officials, often including Mr. Luo himself, Chinese legal experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0127981

Some Chinese and Western legal scholars say the party's direct control may diminish over time, as courts handle millions of routine cases and establish legal precedents. But Mr. Luo gave no indication that party leaders are seeking to encourage a drift in that direction.

"Given the vital functions of political and legal organs, enemy forces always try to use them as the breaking point to Westernize and divide our country," Mr. Luo said. "Any mistake made by such organs may be used by enemy forces."

Despite his generally suspicious tone, Mr. Luo called on judicial authorities to be more attuned to the international impact of their decisions, while protecting foreign business and nongovernment organizations operating in China legally.

"Authorities should consider the possible international influence of and reaction to their decisions," he said.

But he listed a number of political challenges that he said would require closer integration between legal officials and other party and government units.

He said many people in China's more mobile and better educated society slipped through what he referred to as the "management net," mainly work units that once acted as the party's political eyes and ears. Officials need to restore more control over such people, he said.

"There can't be any 'free people' who are outside the management net," he said. In particular, he said, organizations that provide telecommunications and Internet services must take "full responsibility" for preventing the spread of harmful information.

Mr. Luo said the courts should play a bigger role in defusing mass incidents of social unrest by "safeguarding justice and fairness." That appeared to be a plea to resolve protest incidents through legal means rather than relying on police crackdowns.

But he echoed recent calls to punish the "tiny minority" of troublemakers who try to mobilize social discontent. And he dashed hopes that China is prepared to phase out its extrajudicial system of re-education through labor, which often singles out political activists who have not committed crimes.

He said this system, known as laojiao, should be improved, not scrapped.

Journalist Group Criticizes Press Freedoms Under Hu Jintao (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 2 — A leading media watchdog group on Friday accused President Hu Jintao of China of seeking to bring the media to heel and instigating an expanding crackdown on the press despite China's pledge to enhance media freedoms before the 2008 Olympics, which are to be held in Beijing.

Reporters Without Borders, based in Paris, said in its annual report on press freedoms that conditions for the news media and for journalists had deteriorated in China.

"The press is being forced into self-censorship, the Internet is filtered, and the foreign media very closely watched," the group said in the report, which was released Friday.

It continued, "Faced with burgeoning social unrest and journalists who are becoming much less compliant, the authorities, directed by President Hu Jintao, have been bringing the media to heel in the name of a 'harmonious society.' "

The group cited the five-year sentence given to a Hong Kong reporter, Ching Cheong, and a three-year sentence for Zhao Yan, a researcher in the Beijing bureau of The New York Times, among other efforts to intimidate journalists.

"In both cases they were convicted after shoddy trials with no defense witnesses," the group said.

In total, the group estimated that 31 journalists were serving jail terms in China and that the authorities had convicted 52 more people for posting political views on the Internet.

Other reporters have faced physical attacks by hired thugs associated with the local authorities or powerful business interests, and the police often fail to investigate the assaults, the group said.

Hu Urges Sudan To Act On Darfur Crisis (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

Hu Jintao, China's president, on Friday embarked on the most contentious leg of his African tour, visiting Sudan for the first time to buttress bilateral trade with a government accused of multiple human rights abuses in its western Darfur region.

Mr Hu's trip came amid western pressure on China to use its ties with Khartoum to influence the government to take greater steps to resolve the four-year conflict in Darfur.

The Chinese leader urged Khartoum, behind closed doors, to solve the crisis and pursue dialogue with rebel groups. But no public statement was made on the issue. Zhang Dong, China's ambassador in Khartoum, on Thursday told Xinhua news agency that China "never interferes in Sudan's internal affairs".

DOJ_NMG_0127982

The focus of the trip was on economic issues, with China signing agreements to build two schools and a presidential palace, and provide loans of more than $70m, the Sudanese news agency said.

Billions of dollars of Chinese investment, particularly in the oil sector, have provided crucial support to President Omar al-Bashir's regime, enabling it to join the ranks of oil exporters and improve decaying infrastructure. Chinese companies are involved in building bridges, roads, government offices, a hydroelectric dam and an oil refinery, which the leaders visited on Friday.

But even in Sudan – where China is the biggest bilateral trading partner – some questioning the balance of the relationship. Sayed al-Khatib, director of the government's Centre for Strategic Studies said some feel Beijing has used the west's reluctance to invest in Sudan to over-charge on infrastructure projects and has failed to meet quotas on the employment of Sudanese in the oil sector.

"Some people are not quite comfortable with the way China is holding to its end of the partnership but still people are grateful that at the time they came we didn't have anybody else," Mr Khatib said. "You could say it's not that bad but questions are being asked."

Sudan is China's third-largest trading partner in Africa, with bilateral trade exceeding $2.9bn (£1.5bn, €2.2bn) in 2006. Sudanese officials estimate Sudan's oil output is almost 500,000bpd, of which about two-thirds goes to China.

Beijing insists it has played a positive role in tackling the Darfur crisis but critics regard its relations with Sudan as an example of what they see as China's questionable role in Africa.

Trade between China and Africa reached a record $55bn last year but there are concerns that Beijing's unconditional support could help prop up rogue regimes. Others accuse China of looting Africa, while flooding the continent with cheap, low quality goods that will hamper the development of African manufacturers.

China's heavy investment in Sudan during the past decade contrasts with its treatment by the west as a pariah because of allegations it sponsored terrorism, its dire human rights record and a decades-long conflict in southern Sudan where its main oilfields are located.

Chinese President Pushes Sudan On Darfur (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

Chinese President Hu Jintao told Sudan's leader on Friday he must give the United Nations a bigger role in trying to resolve the conflict in Darfur and also said China wanted to do more business with its key African ally, Sudan state media reported.

In what appeared to be China's bluntest message to Sudan on the Darfur crisis, Hu urged President Omar al-Bashir in a face-to-face meeting to boost the U.N.'s "constructive role in realizing peace in Darfur" along with the African Union, the official Sudan news agency SUNA reported.

China buys two-thirds of Sudan's oil and is the largest investor in the country, giving it some leverage with al-Bashir's government. Sudan has defied a U.N. Security Council call for the underpowered African Union mission of 7,000 troops in the western region of Darfur to be taken over by a U.N. operation of 22,000 peacekeepers.

China usually refuses to mix human rights issues with diplomacy, but Hu has come under international pressure to use his clout with Sudan to push it to accept U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur. More than 200,000 people have been killed in four years of fighting in the region between rebels and the army, backed by the notorious janjaweed militia.

Human rights activists expressed concern ahead of Hu's eight-country tour of Africa that China is overlooking abuses to gain access to Africa's resources. Africa has become an important source of oil and other natural resources to feed China's rapid economic growth.

Sudanese officials briskly ushered journalists out of the room Friday when Hu began voicing his expectations on Darfur to al-Bashir. Later, a Sudanese official told The Associated Press that Hu had told al-Bashir his government "should work more earnestly to get the rebels who did not sign the Darfur peace agreement to join the peace process."

The government signed the peace agreement with one rebel group last May, but other rebels rejected the accord as inadequate and the conflict escalated.

This week, U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon urged Sudan to accept a compromise deal by which a U.N. force would deploy in Darfur in a "hybrid mission" with African peacekeepers. Ban has also asked China's U.N. ambassador for help in trying to persuade the Khartoum government.

U.S. Sen. Barbara Boxer urged Sudan Friday to accept a U.N.-led peacekeeping mission in Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0127983

"If the message the Chinese are bringing President Bashir is clear and is unequivocal that we need to move forward and they need to end this nightmare, it's going to be very positive," the California Democrat said of the meeting between the two leaders. Boxer was speaking at U.N. headquarters in New York.

Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol insisted that Hu's words on Darfur were not hostile.

Akol told reporters after the meeting that Sudan was willing to see the mixed U.N. and African Union force deployed in Darfur "as soon as funding and troops were secured."

Diplomats in Khartoum said Hu's position on Darfur could be linked to Chinese concerns about Sudan's stability, as well as that of neighboring Chad. The Chinese have recently improved relations with Chad, which also has important oil reserves and is fighting rebels in eastern provinces. Chad has accused Sudan of backing its rebels — a charge that Khartoum denies.

Sudan wanted to draw attention to the trade and investment side of its relationship with China.

After meeting him at the airport, al-Bashir took Hu to the Chinese-built Friendship Hall, where they signed several accords. China undertook to build schools and a new presidential palace, reduced import tariffs on some Sudanese goods, granted a loan of $77.4 million for infrastructure, and gave a grant of $40 million.

SUNA reported that China also canceled about $80 million of Sudan's debt.

"China is more fair than the West in dealing with Sudan and its policy has helped boost both business and peace in the country," said al-Bashir, who pointedly praised Beijing for not interfering politically in African countries.

The two later visited what they referred to as the finest Sino-Sudanese achievement: the Khartoum refinery where 100,000 barrels of oil — a fifth of Sudan's production — are refined each day.

Jointly owned by Sudan and the Chinese National Petroleum Company, the refinery stands near the village of Aljaili about 43 miles north of Khartoum.

Hu's trip to Cameroon, Liberia, Sudan, Zambia, Namibia, South Africa, Mozambique and Seychelles began Jan. 30 and runs until Feb. 10.

____

Associated Press reporter Mohamed Osman in Khartoum contributed to this report.

China Offers Aid For 'Peaceful Resolution' Of Darfur Conflict (AFP)

By Mohammed Ali Saeed

AFP, February 3, 2007

Chinese President Hu Jintao has offered Sudan assistance for the peaceful resolution of the Darfur conflict but ignored Western pressure to make future aid conditional on the progress made.

"The African Union and the United Nations must play a constructive role in upholding peace in Darfur, advancing regional stability and improving the living conditions of the people," Hu told Sudanese counterpart Omar al-Beshir Friday, according to the website of state-run China Radio International.

"The Chinese side appreciates the efforts by the Sudanese government, the African Union, the United Nations and other concerned nations to resolve the Darfur problem," it quoted Hu as telling Beshir in their Khartoum talks.

"In resolving the Darfur question the following principles should be adhered to -- Sudan's sovereignty and territorial integrity should be respected and dialogue and consultations on the basis of equality should be upheld to peacefully resolve the issue."

Following talks between Hu and Beshir, China agreed to offer 40 million yuan (5.2 million dollars) in unspecified aid and materials for the peaceful resolution of the the Darfur question, the radio reported.

The two leaders held "frank, in-depth and fruitful" and reached "consensus... on major regional and international issues," China's official Xinhua news agency said.

The international community, led by Washington which accuses Khartoum of genocide in Darfur, had been hoping that Beijing would use its economic muscle to press Khartoum to accept the deployment of UN peacekeepers in Darfur, where African Union troops have failed to quell the bloodshed.

But Beshir has consistently rejected such a move, accusing Western powers of seeking to use the United Nations as a cover to invade his country and plunder its resources.

Sudanese Foreign Minister Lam Akol said: "The two sides agreed to support the Addis Ababa agreement," referring to the accord calling for a hybrid UN-African Union force in the troubled western Sudanese region.

Hu said Beijing was pleased to see that Khartoum had scored "remarkable achievements in national reconciliation" and had "signed accords with several factions in the north, east and west, thus promoting social stability."

Khartoum has yet to approve the final phase of the three-stage plan for UN forces to supplement the African contingent in Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0127984

More than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million fled their homes in Darfur as a result of a four-year-old war pitting ethnic minority rebels against government troops and their Arab militia allies.

But China's mild words on Darfur seem to underscore the Asian giant's no-strings-attached stance on doing business in Sudan.

China has agreed to give Sudan an interest-free loan of 100 million yuan (12.8 million dollars), Finance Minister Al-Zubair Ahmed Hassan told reporters.

Beijing also pledged increased cooperation in telecommunications, irrigation, energy and infrastructure, and promised to explore stepping up assistance in human resources, vocational training and health, Xinhua said.

"We are now officially economic partners," Beshir said before heading into his talks with Hu.

The agreements will further boost two-way trade that reached 2.9 billion dollars in the first 11 months of 2006.

China's energy-hungry economy -- the fourth largest in the world -- is badly in need of resources from Sudan and other African countries.

No other country has more clout on the Khartoum government than China, which takes 60 percent of Sudan's total oil output and has repeatedly used its UN Security Council veto power to block further sanctions on the regime.

The China National Petroleum Corporation has huge stakes in Sudan's oil industry, producing around 500,000 barrels per day. China is also building a dam on the Nile, which is currently Africa's largest hydro-electric project.

Hu received a warm welcome Thursday in Liberia, the second leg of his African tour after Cameroon.

Emphasising its commitment to Africa, China said this week it would write off debts owed by 33 African countries as part of a multi-billion-dollar pledge made last year.

Hu is due in Zambia on Saturday.

2 Americans Held, Kenya Official Says (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

MOGADISHU, SOMALIA — Two Americans were among at least 10 foreigners detained by Kenyan police at the Somalian border after allegedly fighting on the side of Somalia's ousted Islamist movement, an official said Friday.

One of the Americans is wanted in the U.S. on suspicion of links to radical movements, the Kenyan police official said.

Kenya said it seized the foreigners after they fled from Ethiopian troops who had helped oust the Islamists. It was preparing to deport them to their home countries.

One of the Americans was arrested with his 9-year-old child, the police official said. The U.S. Embassy had no comment.

Among the foreigners in custody were four Britons and people from France, Tunisia and Syria, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information. The date of their deportation had not been determined.

Violence has been escalating in Mogadishu, the Somalian capital. A bombing at an Islamic girls school killed a student Friday, and at least eight people were killed overnight in mortar attacks.

Censorship's New Clothes (NYT)

By Laila Lalami

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WHEN I went to visit my cousin in the capital, Rabat, in December, he was preparing for his pilgrimage to Mecca. He showed me the pamphlets he was reading to learn about the rituals and talked about how much he would miss his family while he was away.

As the afternoon wore on, the mood grew lighter, and he began to tell me jokes. "Did you hear the one about the Islamist whose wife has just delivered a daughter? He picks up his baby and says, 'Come here, my little bomb.' " My cousin chuckled as he said this — and so did I. It was an otherwise unremarkable afternoon, during which we shared funny stories satirizing our society.

Yet two weeks ago, Driss Ksikes, the editor in chief of the weekly magazine Nichane, and Sanaa Al Aji, a journalist, were sentenced to three years' probation and a fine of more than $9,300 each, while Nichane was banned from publishing for two months — all for printing this joke, along with several others, in a cover article titled "Jokes: How Moroccans Make Fun of Religion, Sex and Politics."

The article, written by Ms. Al Aji, examined the role that jokes play in society and, quoting sociologists, stand-up comedians and intellectuals, concluded that "comedy is the most beautiful form of expression, inaccessible to censorship." Several insets included jokes about God, the Prophet Muhammad and the king, Mohammed VI. The magazine remained on newsstands for a week without incident.

DOJ_NMG_0127985

Some religious conservatives started a small campaign online and on satellite news channels, calling for Nichane to be punished, while others passionately defended the magazine and signed petitions of support. A few days later, Nichane was shut down and its journalists taken to court for printing material that was deemed "offensive to the Islamic religion." As outrageous as the verdict was, it was light compared with what the state prosecutor was seeking: five years' prison time and a ban from practicing journalism for 10 years.

While the Nichane case was unfolding, another news magazine found itself in trouble. On three occasions, court bailiffs visited the offices of Le Journal Hebdomadaire to demand payment of a fine of more than $350,000.

A Casablanca court had called for the magazine to pay this sum to Claude Moniquet, the director of a small institute called the European Strategic Intelligence and Security Center. At issue was an article calling into question Mr. Moniquet's impartiality in a report he conducted about Western Sahara. The report was favorable to Morocco's position that this territory is part of its southern provinces.

In the United States, Morocco is often seen as a liberal country and a bulwark against Islamic extremism. Certainly, the reforms that have taken place over the last few years, particularly in terms of women's rights, are steps in the right direction.

But while the court cases against independent news magazines like Nichane, Le Journal Hebdomadaire and several others are within the bounds of Moroccan law, they appear to single out the independent press, to the exclusion of more partisan publications. These cases highlight a particularly troubling pattern, in which the regime represses the progressive voices it claims to champion.

Meanwhile, newspapers like Attajdid, the mouthpiece for an Islamic party, go unmolested, probably because they are careful to confine their criticism to social issues and generally avoid two of the three infamous "red lines" — the king and Western Sahara — that limit press freedom in Morocco. When it comes to the third taboo, Islam, such publications often set the tone for public debate, as they did during the Danish cartoons controversy.

The government then tries to prove that it, too, can defend Islamic values; hence the case against Nichane for printing jokes deemed offensive to the religion. It is a high-stakes game between the religious right and the government, and it is unclear which will come out the winner.

In a sign of the times, Nichane has retreated. The magazine has already announced that it will not appeal the court's decision, and it is likely that it will respect the "red lines" from now on. In contrast, Aboubakr Jamaï, Le Journal Hebdomadaire's besieged editor, resigned from his post in order to save his magazine. Since any salary he makes in Morocco can legally be seized to pay his colossal fine, he argued, he has to leave the country and work elsewhere. Morocco cannot afford to lose his voice.

The Bush administration has time and again referred to Morocco as a moderate Arab state that deserves to receive millions of dollars of taxpayers' money to encourage democratic reforms. American officials point to recent elections, changes in family law and a good growth rate as indicators of Morocco's success. But they turn a blind eye to problems of press freedom. A democracy cannot be established unless independent journalists, whatever their political beliefs, are allowed to work and publish freely.

Without freedom of expression, Morocco's reforms are merely a varnish. Underneath it lies the same old country.

Blair Vows To Stay Despite Scandal (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 2 -- Prime Minister Tony Blair said Friday he will not resign because of a growing scandal concerning his party's financing and added that "I am not going to beg for my character in front of anyone."

As calls for his resignation have intensified, Blair has said little publicly about a police investigation that has led to the arrests of close aides. But in a BBC radio interview Friday, he spoke in some detail, variously asking for patience and forcefully saying he wouldn't be hounded out of office. "The sensible thing" is to wait until the police finish their investigation, he said. In the meantime, "I am not going to get into a situation where I am pleading for my integrity."

Prime minister for nearly a decade, Blair said last year that he would resign before September. But many people here want him to leave now, as members of his own party publicly admit the damage this scandal is doing to his party.

"I think inevitably when you have this kind of thing going on for months and months, it does have a corrosive effect," Hazel Blears, the Labor Party leader, said in a televised interview.

Former Labor leader Neil Kinnock told reporters it will take years for the political system to recover from the damage the scandal has caused.

"He is no longer casting about for a legacy but trying to avoid leaving under a tremendous cloud," Anthony Howard, a political commentator, said in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0127986

Police have arrested four people from Blair's party on suspicion of involvement in the offering of seats in the House of Lords and other government honors in exchange for cash.

"I totally understand why this obviously is very distracting and somewhat obsessive for the media. It's bound to be. But it isn't for me," Blair said, noting he was still able to do his job.

There has been noticeable tension between police and the prime minister's office as the case has dragged on -- the first arrest came in July. Blair supporters, for instance, have publicly asked why officers who arrested Ruth Turner, the director of government relations in Downing Street, had to do it in the early morning.

In the interview, Blair urged people not to believe everything "ricocheting around the media" because, he said, it wasn't all true.

Blair said he was determined not to leave office early because of this police inquiry. "I don't think that's the right way to do it, and I think it would be particularly wrong to do it before the inquiry has even run its course and come to any conclusions. So you'll have to put up with me for a bit longer."

No one has been charged with a crime. All four of those arrested have denied wrongdoing.

Blair also said in the interview that he has "tried to do my best over the last 10 years" but that he has made "mistakes along the way." He added: "People can make up their mind about me according to what they think about me. But I know what type of person I am."

Serbia Rejects Plan That Could Lead To Kosovo Independence (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

PRISTINA, Kosovo, Feb. 2 — Serbia rejected a United Nations proposal on Friday that paves the way for an independent Kosovo, setting up a possible showdown between its supporter, Russia, and the West over the disputed territory's final status.

Serbia's response came almost immediately after a United Nations envoy, Martti Ahtisaari, presented the complex plan to politicians here and in Belgrade.

"I told Mr. Ahtisaari that Serbia and I, as its president, will never accept Kosovo's independence," President Boris Tadic said in a statement from Belgrade. He noted that while the plan does not mention statehood for Kosovo, it "opens the possibility for Kosovo's independence."

The proposal, which is still subject to weeks of negotiation between the two sides, will require Russian acquiescence in order to win Security Council approval. Russia, a permanent member of the Security Council with veto power over the plan, has until now backed Serbia's position that Kosovo must remain an integral, even if an autonomous, part of Serbia.

A NATO bombing campaign stopped fighting between Serb and Kosovo Albanian forces in 1999 and put the disputed territory under United Nations administration. It has been in limbo since then. Mr. Ahtisaari's proposal is intended to finally fix the province's future, closing the last chapter of the 1990s Balkan wars.

While the plan does not mention independence, its provisions describe de facto statehood for Kosovo — providing for an army, constitution and flag — though it would still be protected by NATO and overseen by the international community for the indefinite future. The plan would also allow Kosovo to declare independence if the package is approved by the Security Council.

Mr. Ahtisaari avoided addressing the subject of independence on Friday at news conferences in Belgrade and Pristina, saying only that "there will be a clear definition of Kosovo's status when I submit my proposals to the Security Council."

He does not expect the provisions regarding Kosovo's status to change much before then, he said.

That shifts the onus to Russia and, to a lesser extent, China, both of which have supported Serbia's territorial claims — in part, over concerns about ethnically motivated secessionist movements in their own countries.

In Russia, officials have long said they would not back any solution that was not supported by Serbia, effectively ruling out a forced separation, even one that stopped short of outright independence.

By Friday evening, the Russian government had not responded officially, but Leonid E. Slutsky, deputy chairman of the international affairs committee of the lower house of Parliament, said that Mr. Ahtisaari's proposal was far from the last word. "It raises many questions," he said, according to Interfax, "and it appears to me that any haste in trying to implement this plan may bring negative consequences."

Mr. Ahtisaari did not give a timetable for taking the plan to the Security Council, but said he would set aside the rest of February for further negotiations with the two sides.

The proposal provides for the province's United Nations administration to be replaced by an International Civilian Representative who would have veto power over all government decisions for an indefinite period. It also foresees a multiethnic Kosovo security force of 2,500 troops and 800 reserves as well as a domestic intelligence agency to monitor threats to internal security.

DOJ_NMG_0127987

The plan calls for the disbanding of the Kosovo Protection Force, which consists primarily of former fighters from the Kosovo Liberation Army, which fought Serbia and has been charged with human rights violations against Serbs.

Kosovo Serbs in six municipalities would be granted wide autonomy powers, including the right to receive financial donations and technical assistance from Serbia. The proposal would also establish more than 40 “protected zones” limiting building and commercial activity around Serbian churches and monasteries.

A constitution, to be written by a 21-member Constitutional Commission, will need a two-thirds majority for approval by Kosovo’s Parliament. Kosovo Serbs and other minorities will be consulted on the document.

Serbs and other minorities would also be guaranteed seats in the Parliament and have the power to block legislation of “special interest” to them. But Mr. Ahtisaari said the provision could not be used to block more important measures like the constitution or a declaration of Kosovo’s independence.

In Belgrade the mood was glum. Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica, who refused to meet with Mr. Ahtisaari, called the proposal “illegitimate,” saying that it violated the United Nations Charter because it would divide Serbia and “redraw its internationally recognized borders.”

The proposal was met with only muted optimism in Pristina. “Kosovo will be sovereign like all other countries,” said Kosovo’s president, Fatmir Sejdiu, after meeting with Mr. Ahtisaari. The territory’s prime minister, Agim Ceku, said the document “is very clear for Kosovo’s future.”

Not everyone is so sure. Albin Kurti, a Kosovo Albanian whose Movement for Self-Determination has called for protests against the proposal on Feb. 10, said Mr. Ahtisaari’s slow approach would give Serbia time to strengthen its hold on Kosovo’s Serb areas and “lead to more conflicts.”

U.N. Envoy Unveils Kosovo Proposal (AP)

By Garentina Kraja, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

Kosovo took its first tentative steps on the road to becoming what would look very much like a sovereign nation Friday after a U.N. envoy unveiled a blueprint for the future of the tense, ethnically divided Balkan province.

The plan's architect, former Finnish President Martti Ahtisaari, did not explicitly mention Kosovo's independence from Serbia in the proposal he presented to Serbian and ethnic Albanian leaders.

But his 58-page roadmap spelled out conditions for internationally supervised self-rule — complete with the trappings of nationhood, including a flag, anthem, army and constitution and the right to apply for membership in international organizations. It envisions a Kosovo "governing itself democratically and with full respect for the rule of law."

Both Serbia's pro-Western president, Boris Tadic, and its nationalist prime minister, Vojislav Kostunica, immediately rejected the plan and reasserted the country's claims to Kosovo as the heart of the ancient Serb homeland.

"I told Mr. Ahtisaari that Serbia and I, as its president, will never accept Kosovo's independence," Tadic declared in a statement hours after meeting with the envoy in Belgrade. Kostunica denounced the plan as "illegitimate."

In Pristina, Kosovo's provincial capital, President Fatmir Sejdiu said he and other leaders expected Kosovo to become an independent state soon, and pledged to guarantee the rights and security of its small 100,000-member Serb minority.

Kosovo's ethnic Albanian majority has long pressed for independence and fought a bloody war with Serbia in the late 1990s. Yet the mood was muted in the province Friday.

"It's good, but we're a bit reserved," said Lutfi Maloku, 40, an ethnic Albanian technician. "It wasn't called independence and it allows for the Serb minority, which accounts for 5 percent, to hold lots of power."

Kosovo's prime minister, Agim Ceku, was also disappointed by some aspects of the plan. "What Ahtisaari described is a sovereign state, an independent state," he said. "However, this document does not entail all our expectations, all our demands, what belongs to us. We will do everything so that his final document at the Security Council reflects in its entirety the will of Kosovo's people."

Describing his proposal as a draft subject to change, Ahtisaari said he would invite the rival sides to meet again on Feb. 13 for negotiations. He said he hoped to present a package to the U.N. Security Council — which will have the final say on Kosovo's future status — by the end of March.

Approval there would set the stage for the U.S. and other countries to formally recognize Kosovo's independence. But there are concerns the plan may, instead, trigger a showdown between the United States — long an advocate of an independent Kosovo — and Russia, a traditional ally of Serbia. Russia is one of five permanent Security Council members which hold veto power.

Kostunica has threatened to cut off diplomatic ties with any country that recognizes Kosovo as an independent state.

DOJ_NMG_0127988

Ahtisaari, acknowledging that both sides remain far apart, conceded it could be difficult to come up with a settlement both sides could accept. "I think that might require so much time that I don't think I have years in my life to achieve (it)," he said.

His remark seemed to signal that the Security Council could wind up imposing some kind of settlement.

The European Union called on both the Serbs and ethnic Albanians to be ready to compromise on the issue of Kosovo's future. "Both sides must demonstrate responsibility, flexibility and a recognition of the need for realistic compromised-based solutions," the EU said in a statement.

The United States praised the plan as "fair and balanced," and also called on both sides to work toward a settlement.

Kosovo has been a U.N. protectorate since 1999, when NATO airstrikes stopped Serbia's crackdown on separatist ethnic Albanian rebels. Nearly 10,000 ethnic Albanians were killed in the Serbian onslaught, and nearly 1 million were forced to flee their homes.

Ahtisaari's plan would protect Serbian Orthodox Church sites and the Serbian language in the province. Ethnic Albanians, secular Muslims, account for 90 percent of Kosovo's 2 million population.

The plan would also grant the 200,000 Serbs who fled Kosovo after the war in the wake of revenge attacks by Albanians "the right to return and reclaim their property and personal possessions."

For Serbs, the plan outlines "a high degree of control" over their own affairs by granting them six new Serb-administered municipalities and a greater voice in the higher education and health systems. Serbs also would be granted "extensive municipal autonomy in financial matters, including the ability to accept transparent funding from Serbia."

The plan recommends the establishment of an international representative — similar to the office set up in Bosnia after that country's bloody 1992-95 war — to oversee day-to-day affairs.

It also includes provisions for a 2,500-member Kosovo security force which would be overseen by NATO, which now maintains 16,500 peacekeepers in the province.

___

Associated Press writers Dusan Stojanovic, Jovana Gec and Misha Savic in Belgrade and William J. Kole in Vienna contributed to this story.

___

On the Net:

U.N. envoy for Kosovo, http://www.unosek.org

U.N. Kosovo Proposal Tries To Appease All Sides (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

Serbia, backed by Russia and China, says it won't accept independence.

UNITED NATIONS — A U.N. envoy unveiled a blueprint for Kosovo's future Friday that gives the province de facto independence without formal sovereignty, a compromise between the Serbian government's demand for control and the majority Albanians' wish for nationhood.

The road map for Kosovo's future does not mention independence from Serbia but provides the outlines of internationally supervised self-rule.

The ethnically divided province, where nine out of 10 people are ethnic Albanian, will have its own flag, anthem, army, constitution and membership in international organizations.

The 58-page plan provides for a NATO-led peacekeeping force to help ensure "a safe and secure environment … as long as necessary," plus an appointed international representative who would supervise the transition and have veto power over the Kosovo government.

It would allow Kosovo to declare independence with Security Council approval, but Russia — a veto-holding member — opposes statehood.

Though nominally a province of Serbia, Kosovo has been administered by the United Nations since U.S.-led NATO forces drove out the Serbian military in 1999 to protect Albanian residents from "ethnic cleansing" at the hands of the Belgrade government.

The architect of the U.N. plan, former Finnish President Martti Ahtisaari, presented the proposal Friday to Serbian and Kosovo Albanian leaders, after months of negotiations, saying it was as close as the two sides could get.

The positions of the opposing parties are "extremely fixed," Ahtisaari said. He invited both sides to meet again Feb. 13 in Vienna for final negotiations on a settlement that would be acceptable to all, but he hinted that the talks had reached their limit.

"I think that might require so much time that I don't think I have years in my life to achieve" it, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127989

Serbia's pro-Western president, Boris Tadic, and its nationalist prime minister, Vojislav Kostunica, rejected the plan Friday and vowed that Kosovo would never be independent.

"I told Mr. Ahtisaari that Serbia and I, as its president, will never accept Kosovo's independence," Tadic said in a statement after meeting with the U.N. envoy in Belgrade.

Kostunica refused to meet Ahtisaari, whom he accused of being biased against Serbia, and declared the plan "illegitimate."

The prime minister threatened to cut off diplomatic ties with any country that recognizes Kosovo as an independent state.

In Kosovo's capital, Pristina, President Fatmir Sejdiu said the plan set Kosovo on the path to independence and pledged to protect the rights of the minority Serbs if it did become a nation.

"Kosovo will be sovereign like all other countries," he said after meeting with Ahtisaari.

The Security Council will have the final say on Kosovo's status, but Russia has said it will not support the plan if Serbia, a traditional ally, opposes it. China also has sided with Serbia, out of fear that Kosovo's secession could encourage its own minorities in Xinjiang and Tibet.

That foreshadows a stalemate on the council, with the U.S. and Europe supporting independence for the province.

U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack praised the plan as "fair and balanced," and called on both sides to work toward an agreement.

The European Union said that resolving the status of Kosovo would be crucial to securing the region's stability and urged Pristina and Belgrade to be serious about reaching a settlement. "Both sides must demonstrate responsibility, flexibility and a recognition of the need for realistic compromise-based solutions," said a statement from the EU presidency, held by Germany.

The Security Council will meet with Ahtisaari this month after the Vienna meeting but will not formally take up the issue until March, said Slovakian Ambassador Peter Burian, the council's president for February.

Debt Is Key To Kosovo's Status (FT)

By Neil MacDonald

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

The future status of Kosovo must open the way for international financing to repair its fragile economy, Martti Ahtisaari, the United Nations envoy for the province, said on Friday.

Although he avoided mentioning "independence", his settlement, to be put before the UN Security Council, would bestow most of the attributes of independent statehood on the territory, which is 90 per cent ethnic Albanian.

While UN membership might be hard to achieve, Kosovo would be able to join institutions such as the International Monetary Fund, opening the way for credit and possibly foreign investment.

The UN has governed Kosovo since Nato aerial bombing forced out Serb forces in 1999.

"Everyone in Kosovo agrees that the dire economic situation needs most urgent attention," Mr Ahtisaari told reporters after presenting his draft status plan in Belgrade. "The settlement outlines provisions designed to promote sustainable economic development, including Kosovo's ability to apply for membership in international financial institutions," he said.

As expected, the plan mostly outlines protections for ethnic minorities, particularly Kosovo Serbs, who account for about 5 per cent of the population. However, roughly a quarter of the document deals with unresolved economic questions – including what to do about debt inherited from the former Yugoslavia, amounting to nearly €1bn ($1.3bn, £660m).

The European Union wants to see the debt question cleared up before taking charge of a new supervisory mission to monitor the local authorities after the close-down of the UN Interim Mission in Kosovo.

The question of ex-Yugoslav debt could flare up if Kosovo's parliament follows up the UN status resolution by declaring independence. The seceding province's debt servicing to international financial institutions and Paris and London club creditors would cost it between €50m and €100m per year, UN officials say.

Serbia currently foots most of these bills and might continue doing so to shore up its sovereignty claims.

Until the end of the 1980s, Yugoslavia drew heavily on loans from multilateral institutions to pay for industrial expansion and comparatively high living standards for a socialist country. Kosovo's inherited share is about 7 per cent of Serbia's current total external debt, according to the Serbian central bank.

But negotiators for the losing side of the war still view the ex-Yugoslav debt as a bargaining chip to block independence. Nenad Popovic, chief economist on the Serbian negotiating team, has said servicing the Kosovo debt costs Serbia nearly $100,000 per day.

The lack of a debt agreement drains Serbia and also hinders restructuring for Kosovo's underdeveloped economy, say IMF officials.

Mr Ahitsaari's plan follows the formula established for debt settlement after the earlier secessions of ex-Yugoslav republics – Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia – in the early 1990s.

DOJ_NMG_0127990

“Once Serbia agrees to the principle, it’s easy,” said Joachim Ruecker, head of the United Nations interim mission in Kosovo.

Bay Of Pigs Vets Fight To Outlast An Ailing Castro (WSJ)

By Lucette Lagnado

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

MIAMI -- Last December, a group of veterans of the 1961 Bay of Pigs invasion gathered for a board meeting at their small museum in Little Havana memorializing the event, and heard a bombshell announcement.

The Brigadistas, as veterans of the failed attempt to topple Fidel Castro are known, had just observed a minute of silence in memory of comrades killed in the failed attack when their president delivered the news they had been waiting to hear for 48 years.

"Fidel Castro esta muerto," -- Fidel Castro is dead, said Felix Rodriguez. Mr. Rodriguez, a retired CIA officer, said his sources had informed him that the Cuban dictator had passed away on Dec. 3, at 4 a.m.

The men were jubilant.

The report, of course, was false, and the Brigadistas' elation reverted to the melancholy they have felt for so many years as they have waited for their old nemesis to be gone.

Since July, when Mr. Castro, who has ruled the island since 1959, fell ill and ceded power to his younger brother, these unrepentant Cold Warriors have been in suspense, waiting.

The Brigadistas have long lived with the hope of resuming their lives in a free Cuba. But today, many surviving members are just hoping to be buried there. The 80-year-old Mr. Castro's illness has given them a new lease on life.

Jorge Marquet, who is 76, has been saving a bottle of Dewar's 12-year-old Scotch for the occasion of Mr. Castro's death. When the time comes, Nilo Messer, a devout Catholic, is planning to go to church and pray.

William Muir-Celorio, 62, a Brigadista who hasn't smoked in 25 years, says he has put aside an expensive, "non-Cuban" cigar to light up at an appropriate moment.

"Jews say, 'Next year in Jerusalem.' " We say, 'Next year in Havana,' " says Mr. Muir-Celorio, a software developer.

Some say they are planning to be on the first plane to Cuba, to fight if they have to. Mr. Rodriguez says that, at about 250 pounds, he is out of shape and currently on a diet. "We can hold a rifle, but we can't run up a hill," Mr. Rodriguez says.

Rodolfo Llorente, 68, who has scars on his chest from heart surgery, is prepared to do what he can to bring about a regime change. "I would go to the Brigada and say, "Let us go and help the Cuban people," he says.

The museum, which opened in 1986, has become a social club, a brotherhood, a charity, and a senior center for the lonely veterans of Brigade 2506, as the force is known. These days, it is also a makeshift mausoleum for those too poor to afford a proper burial.

The original U.S.-trained force that entered Cuba in the spring of 1961 was about 1,500 strong, according to Esteban Bovo, the Brigade's historian, though many more, he says, were associated with the battle. Mr. Castro was ready for them and waged a fierce fight even as promised U.S. air cover failed to materialize. Stranded, members of the Brigade were taken prisoner and held for 20 months.

When they returned to the U.S., many were tormented -- and remained so. Some committed suicide; others fell into alcoholism or homelessness. Several joined the armed forces, or pursued the American Dream by becoming professionals. But others took whatever menial jobs they could find -- waiter, busboy, porter. In 1972, a few of the men became Watergate burglars.

The small ranch house that is home to the museum, donated by a wealthy Brigade member, is their hangout. They don't get many visitors, just a few stray tourists who wander in to look at the photos of the dead and an assortment of articles and artifacts chronicling the invasion. On display is the Brigade 2506 flag members gave to President John F. Kennedy when he visited them in Florida upon their release.

Now in their 60s, 70s and 80s, some Brigadistas are barely scraping by.

Because they were part of a covert army recruited and trained by the CIA, they were never entitled to the benefits veterans of the armed services enjoy -- from health care to burial.

"I never thought I was going to stay in this country for so long. I lived day by day," says Mr. Marquet. As treasurer of the Bay of Pigs Museum, he earns a salary of $16,800 a year. His only other income is his Social Security check.

Over the years, the Brigadistas have longed for respectability in the form of U.S. veterans' status. Miami Congresswoman Ileana Ros-Lehtinen tried years ago to obtain limited federal benefits for Brigadistas, such as access to Veterans Administration hospitals, but to no avail. She says she is getting ready to try again.

Because of their age, many now qualify for Medicare. Carlos Garrido, a Brigade member and a doctor, set up a practice in Miami. He welcomed ailing Brigadistas, treating them at little or no cost to them.

DOJ_NMG_0127991

"Most of the Brigade is poor," says Dr. Garrido, 67, "I tried to help as much as I can."

Some groups, such as Filipinos who fought alongside U.S. forces in the Philippines in World War II have received veteran's status. But major veterans groups are skeptical. "It boils down to are you or aren't you a member of the five armed services -- and they are not," says Joe Davis, a spokesman for the Veterans of Foreign Wars service organization.

The CIA is more friendly. "As a general rule, retirement benefits are paid only to those individuals with an established status as employees of the Central Intelligence Agency. Members of Brigade 2506 don't qualify. That is a point of law and is no way a reflection of their courage," a CIA spokeswoman said.

Death is always on the Brigadistas' minds, not just Mr. Castro's but their own.

As caretaker of the Bay of Pigs Museum, 72-year-old Juan Torres-Mena answers the phones, cleans the toilets and dusts the rows of faded pictures that line the walls of this one-room shrine to one of the great fiascos in U.S. military history.

And when remains of Brigadistas arrive from the local cremation service, it is also Mr. Torres-Mena's job to pour the ashes into one of the new wooden "urns" stacked neatly on the floor in an office.

The containers are kept out of sight from visitors, on a desk in the president's office, even as the Brigadistas try to raise money to build a real mausoleum. "Maybe we take them to Cuba," Mr. Torres-Mena adds.

These days, Mr. Rodriguez is part fund-raiser, part museum administrator, part funeral director. The Brigade owns a parcel of land in a Miami cemetery, where members are buried two by two, one on top of the other. But traditional funerals are costly, so he has negotiated a price on cremations, he says, pointing to the prepaid cremation certificates he keeps in his desk.

"I bought another 20 in advance," he says.

He doesn't mind having the ashes around, he says. "They don't make any noise; they are friends of ours."

Waiting, And Waiting, For Fidel (LAT)

By Tim Cavanaugh

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

HERE'S A prediction you can take straight to the bank: One day, Fidel Castro will die. Until that time, the watch over the Cuban dictator's long-expiring body continues.

This week, it heated up, even without new evidence from el jefe's doctors. On Monday, Miami City Commissioner Tomas Regalado suggested that the Orange Bowl be made available, on Castro's death, as a venue for "helping a community celebrate." Meanwhile, a news conference about security at the Super Bowl in Miami got hung up on how the Magic City might react if Castro died during the big game.

Together, these stories produced the singular notion that the Super Bowl would be doubling as a venue for a celebration of the old revolutionary's death. By Tuesday, the proposed fiesta was talk-show fodder, and the city began downsizing, or at least re-characterizing, its Castro death contingency plan.

Inevitably, Castro got the last laugh. Late Tuesday, Cuban state television released footage of the president-for-life looking slightly stronger than he had during his last appearance.

Two things are notable in this hiccup of Castro eschatology: It was not motivated by any actual news, and this is not unusual. So flammable is the Duraflame of the Castro deathwatch that it can ignite spontaneously, at any time. A rumor circulating in late December, for example, held that the ailing leader was already dead and that the Cuban government was merely waiting to make the announcement on New Year's Day as a tie-in with the anniversary of the revolution (which we know from our readings in Cuban history — or from "The Godfather II" — occurred Jan. 1, 1959). Google "Castro is dead" and you'll get more than 62,000 results, going back many years. And whatever you do, don't open the "Castro is dead" spam; it contains a nasty virus.

"Growing up in Miami, you would always hear these rumors that Fidel had died," said Juan Carlos Saizarbitoria, co-producer of "East of Havana," a documentary about the Rap Cubano festival. "I always thought it was going to end with a whimper, and it looks like that's what's happening."

Prominent members of the Cuban exile community are in fact opposing the Orange Bowl celebration plan and the deathwatch in general because they focus too much attention on Castro, who has already devolved his responsibilities onto his brother, Raul. "That he looked healthy in the latest footage has no bearing on the fact that he can't command the country anymore, and probably won't be able to come back to full power," said Ramon Saul Sanchez, leader of the Miami-based Movimiento Democracia. "The focus now should be on Raul and what he's going to do."

That's unlikely to stop wave after wave of rumors about a frozen corpse, "Weekend at Bernie's"-style trick photography and state secrets that have bypassed the mainstream media and gone straight to a friend of your friend in Union City, N.J. "Listening to Spanish-language radio in town, people call in with all kinds of theories," said Frank Calderon, a Miami-based blogger who runs castrodeathwatch.com.

DOJ_NMG_0127992

Such speculating in a news vacuum has a long pedigree. A.J. Liebling's 1953 column, "Death on the One Hand," details the way U.S. media filled thousands of column inches with skylarking over a single datum — that Josef Stalin had suffered a stroke — and no further information. (Stalin subsequently died, or so the official record would have us believe.) Liebling's conclusion — "no-news is more voluminous than news" — applies in any situation in which information is both finite and unknown.

To this ancient game, Castro and his watchers bring generations of built-up agon and emotional commitment. The dictator's death will almost certainly occasion a mass public outpouring in Miami, where residents (and their elected officials) are in the position of people crouched and waiting at a surprise party: Every floor creak sounds like the arrival of the guest of honor.

And the guest will retain, probably until his last breath, a genius for working the media and humiliating his enemies. This week's uptick in the deathwatch leaves just one question: Did Fidel, maybe, plan it this way?

"He wouldn't mind causing a little chaos here in Miami, letting people think he died just to cause trouble," Calderon said. "I have my own theory about why he was out of sight for so long before this new footage. Perhaps there was some kind of loyalty test, to see who would make a move when they thought he was dead."

Tim Cavanaugh is assistant editor of the editorial pages.

Bomb Resonates With Diplomats, Not With The Bomber (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

THERE are not many places where a man convicted in the bombing of a commercial airliner that killed 73 people can be found roaming the streets. This city, home to Freddy Lugo, is one of them.

Mr. Lugo, like an uneasy memory from the cold war, is tucked away here, obscure to most of his countrymen but not completely forgotten. He was one of two men sentenced to 20 years in prison for placing explosives on a DC-8 jetliner flown by Cubana Airlines in 1976.

The plane blew up in the sky above Barbados, killing everyone on board, including two dozen members of Cuba's national fencing team and a 9-year-old Guyanese girl. That explosion, considered the first act of midair terrorism in the Americas, poisons relations between Havana and Washington to this day.

Mr. Lugo, 65, who was released in 1993 after 17 years in prison, has tried to put the past behind him. "I have a tranquil life now," he said in a rare 90-minute interview, his eyes darting around him, at a bakery cafe near his home. "I have a clean conscience."

But the past has a way of catching up with him. There is the occasional journalist to contend with, and glimmers of recognition from among the many Cubans who live here. As many Americans would recognize Mohamed Atta if he were alive and walking the streets of New York, to Venezuelans, Mr. Lugo's face is haunting.

A new book on the Cubana bombing, called "Terrorist of the Bush Family," by two Venezuelan journalists, Alexis Rosas and Ernesto Villegas, has not helped either. The book has become a best seller since its release here last November. It has focused new attention on the bombing and the request by Venezuela for Washington to extradite the Cuban exile accused of masterminding the bombing, Luis Posada Carriles, to face terrorism charges here.

So far the Bush administration has refused, and Mr. Posada Carriles, 78, a naturalized Venezuelan citizen who sneaked into the United States in 2005, currently sits in a jail in southern New Mexico on immigration charges.

PRESIDENT HUGO CHÁVEZ'S government, a staunch Cuban ally these days, says the difficulty in extraditing Mr. Posada Carriles illustrates American hypocrisy in battling terrorists. Likewise, Cuba's government points to documents that show the C.I.A. had knowledge that such an attack was being plotted in Caracas.

Since the book's publication, academic researchers and reporters have tried more than ever to track down Mr. Lugo for interviews, but he has almost always turned them away, preferring the banality of an anonymous life.

Mr. Lugo, who drives a gypsy cab to make ends meet, has tried his best to remain in the shadows of the diplomatic uproar surrounding Mr. Posada Carriles, whom he described simply as "an adventurer, capable of anything."

Despite his conviction, Mr. Lugo said he considered himself a pawn in the machinations of Cuban exiles to topple Fidel Castro. Along with many of those Cubans, Mr. Lugo, a Venezuelan, found himself in Caracas in the 1970s.

Ann Louise Bardach, a journalist and authority on Cuban politics, called the Caracas of that era the Casablanca of the Caribbean, as the city attracted a sordid collection of spies, guerrillas and drug traffickers.

It was here that Mr. Lugo, then a news photographer, met the man who recruited him for the bomb plot, a fellow Venezuelan journalist named Hernán Ricardo Lozano, according to police records.

DOJ_NMG_0127993

Mr. Ricardo, it turned out, had been working on the side for Mr. Posada Carriles, doing photography and surveillance. Mr. Posada Carriles had a long history as a C.I.A. operative in the 1960s before moving to Caracas, where he became chief of operations at Venezuela's secret intelligence police, Disip, in the 1970s.

"My life would have taken a completely different path if I had never met Hernán Ricardo," Mr. Lugo said.

The two men boarded Cubana Airlines Flight 455 on Oct. 6, 1976, in Port-of-Spain, the capital of Trinidad and Tobago. They got off in Barbados, where the plane stopped en route to Havana. Before leaving the plane, they left C-4 plastic explosive in a camera bag and a tube of Colgate toothpaste on board, according to statements obtained by the police in Trinidad after the two men were arrested there in the days after the attack.

"We have an explosion," the Cubana pilot said with fear in his voice in a recording of the plane's last frantic moments before it crashed into the Caribbean. The recording, broadcast repeatedly here and in Havana last October in remembrances of the 30th anniversary of the episode, continued: "We are descending immediately. We have fire on board."

Documents recently obtained by the National Security Archive in Washington describe some of the mundane organizational details involved in the bombing. In questioning by Trinidadian police officials, Mr. Lugo said Mr. Ricardo had "told him he was going to blow up a Cubana airplane." He said he saw Mr. Ricardo "kneading a handful of something looking like dough" before boarding the flight.

Mr. Ricardo, after slitting his left wrist in a suicide attempt while in police custody in Port-of-Spain, said that he had been paid $16,000 for the job and that Mr. Lugo had received $8,000.

AN intelligence report prepared by Clarence Kelly, the F.B.I. director at the time, suggested that Mr. Posada Carriles had attended meetings in Caracas where the bombing was planned.

The report, quoting an informant in Caracas, said Mr. Ricardo had called Orlando Bosch, another Cuban exile in Caracas charged with planning the bombing, saying, "A bus with 73 dogs went off a cliff and all got killed."

Mr. Bosch was eventually cleared by Venezuelan courts and lives quietly in Miami, having been spared from deportation in 1990 by the administration of President George H. W. Bush, who was the C.I.A. director at the time of the bombing.

Mr. Posada Carriles escaped from prison here in 1985 and made his way to Central America, and from there entered the United States in 2005 and was caught.

Mr. Ricardo served 17 years along with Mr. Lugo. Today his whereabouts are hard to ascertain, though Mr. Lugo said he believed he had left Venezuela.

FOR his part, Mr. Lugo divides his time now between an apartment where he lives with his wife, in an elegant if decaying building on a quiet, tree-lined street, and his son's home in a poor district. He says he avoids any involvement in politics.

He says his taxi, an aging beige sedan, is his only source of income. His journalist friends still greet him and shake his hand, he said, even though they know of his history. He is missing a few teeth, but otherwise appears younger than his 65 years. A recently discovered heart ailment, he said, had made him a teetotaler.

Asked if he felt remorse over the deaths of 73 people, including many teenagers on the Cuban fencing team, Mr. Lugo said he did not. He explained somewhat cryptically that he considered himself manipulated in an act beyond his control. "I am a normal man," he said. "I am innocent."

Others disagree. "Freddy Lugo may not want to admit it, but he's a mass murderer," said José Pertierra, a lawyer in Washington representing Venezuela's government in its attempt to extradite Mr. Posada Carriles. "He can claim he wasn't the mastermind; maybe he can claim he was duped. But he participated in a terrorist act that killed 73 people."

DOJ_NMG_0127994

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, February 6, 2007 8:30 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, February 06, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070206.pdf; agnb070206.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Proposed Budget Includes $7.2 Million More For Guantanamo Cases 4
Acquitted "Virginia Jihad" Defendant Convicted Of Perjury, Obstruction 4
LATimes Says More Details About NSA Wiretapping Needed ..5

Homeland Response:

Turner Broadcasting To Pay Boston $2 Million Over Cartoon Terror Scare 5
Tennessee Man Pleads Guilty To Possession Of Ricin 5
Louisiana Official Says Some Katrina Evacuee Children Not In School 5

War News:

Vote On Warner Resolution Falls Eleven Votes Short 6
Waxman Panel To Grill Bremer On Iraq Contracts 8
US, Iraqi Forces Prepare To Launch New Baghdad Security Plan 9
Iraqi Troops Kill Al-Sadr Aide 10
Administration Officials Playing Down Evidence On Iran's Role In Iraq 10
Assad Urges US-Syrian Cooperation On Iraq 11
Allies "Dawdle" On Aiding Iraq 11
Rice Announces Task Force On Iraqi Refugees 12
100th British Soldier Killed In Iraq 12
Watada Court Martial Opens 12
Afghan Ambassador Denounces Pakistani Haven For Taliban 12

DOJ:

Senate Hearing To Examine US Attorney Departures 12
DOJ Budget Includes Flat Funding For Several Flagship Programs 13
Gonzales Addresses SMU Law Students 13

Corporate Scandals:

Budget Includes Increase For SEC 14
Banks Appeal Ruling On Enron Investor Class Action 14
SEC Examines Front-Running Trading 15
Hyundai Chairman Sentenced To Three Years By South Korean Court 15
Former Fannie Mae Head Seeks Earlier Hearing Date 15
Donohue Says SEC Investigation Into Sunrise Lacks Merit 15

Criminal Law:

FBI Agent Acknowledges Errors In Earlier Libby Trial Testimony 16
California Agency Fined Councilman For Accepting Funds From Miller In 1992 17
Fumo Lashes Out At Expected Indictment, Vows To "Stand Up And Fight." 18
Florida Development Bribery Scheme Trial Begins Today 18
Man Sentenced To 8½ Years In Prison For FEMA Relief Fraud 19
Suspect In Boys' Abduction Charged With Molestation 19
States Consider Changes To Police Lineups 19
Videographer Nears Jail Record For Resisting Grant Jury 19
New Jersey Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Distribution 20
FBI Child Sex Sting Snares New York Elementary School Teacher 20
Study Finds Identity Fraud Down Since 2003 20
New DC Police Chief Challenged By Rise In Homicides 21
Barry Faces Possible Revocation Of Probation 21

Civil Law:

Jury Finds FBI Retaliated Against Whistle-blowing Agent 22
Trial Begins Over Fatal Crash Of Small Aircraft 22

Civil Rights:

Expert Will Not Testify At Mississippi Voting Rights Trial 22
FBI To Give Update On Civil Rights Cold Case Initiative 23
Rights Groups Warn Of Increase In White Supremacist Activity 23

NAACP Calls For Limits On "No-Knock" Warrants After Atlanta Shooting 23
WPost Columnist Decries Anti-Semitism Charge 24

Antitrust:

Smithfield Complies With DOJ Request For Information On Premium Deal 24
Firms Trying To Beat Antitrust Clock Find Mixed Results 24
FTC Reaffirms Antitrust Ruling Against Rambus 25
Beatles, Apple Near Settlement Of iTunes Dispute 25
State Street To Purchase Investors Financial 26
Mills Corp. Receives Another Buyout Offer 26
Icahn Seeks Takeover Of Lear 27
EU Judge To Make Microsoft Ruling By September 27

Environment:

Pelosi, Dingell Reach Agreement On Global Warming Committee 27
Energy Department Considers Ethanol Reserve 28
Asarco Claims Mexican Owners Illegally Stripped Company's Assets 29
Extremely Cold Weather Makes News 29

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Visits El Salvador To Coordinate Anti-Gang Activities 29
New Jersey Man Accused Of Leading Multimillion-Dollar Drug Network 30
Authorities Say California Man Attempted To Smuggle Meth Aboard Hawaiian Airlines Flight 30
In New Jersey, Sentencing Of "Drug Kingpin" Expected Tomorrow 30
South Carolina Judge Refuses To Suppress Evidence In Drug Conspiracy Case 30
Attorneys For Accused Mexican Drug Kingpin May Try To Blame Brother 30
Convicted Officer Testifies In Former ATF Agent's Suit Against Chicago 31
ATF Agent Tells Of Life Undercover Infiltrating Motorcycle Gang 31
California Officials Offer Reward For Illegal Guns 31
US Will Not Charge ATF Agents In Arlington Shooting 32

Immigration:

Report Highlights Role Of Immigrant Entrepreneurs 32
LATimes Urges Deportation For Convicted Illegal Immigrants 32

Congress-Administration:

Bush Presents Budget Plan As Blueprint To Balance Budget Without Raising Taxes 33
Administration Plans To Cut "Tax Gap" By $29.5 Billion 38
Bush Proposal Would Revamp FAA Funding 38
McConnell To Pressure Democrats On Judicial Nominations 38
9th Circuit Increases En Banc Reviews 38
Former Treasury Chief Criticitzes Bush's Insistence On Private Social Security Accounts 39
"Winners Could Turn Into Losers" Under Bush Healthcare Plan 39
Senate Proposal Authorizes Space Intelligence Office 39
Pelosi Gets Use Of Larger Plane Than Hastert 39
Evan Thomas Says Reporters' Job Is To "Bash" Bush 40
Parties Seen As Reversing Roles In Senate 40
Roberts Offers Advice To Law Students 40

Other News:

Service Sector Continues Expansion 40
ABA Panel Recommends Diluting Code Of Judicial Conduct 41
Giuliani Files "Statement Of Candidacy" With FEC 41
More House Republicans Set To Announce Support for Romney 43
Obama, Clinton Could Be No-Shows At Early Debates 43
Edwards Outlines Healthcare Plan, Says Tax Hike Will Be Needed To Fund Proposal 44
Edwards, Richardson Wow Democrats At Winter Meeting 45
Biden's "Backpedaling" Examined 45
Labor Groups Hopeful For Measure To Ease Union Membership 45
Texas Plan For HPV Vaccination For School Girls Generates Controversy 46
Studies Showing Wealth Concentration Critiqued 46
Mecca Talks Seen As "Last Chance" To Avoid Palestinian Civil War 46
US Officials Says Pyongyang Prepared To Negotiate 47
US Embassy Warns Of Terrorist Threat In Sudan 47
US, Malaysia Resume Trade Talks 47
Indonesia Withholding Bird Flu Data 48
India Walks "Tightrope" In Washington Talks 48
US Firms Push For End To Cuban Embargo 48
US Urges Nicaragua To Destroy Missiles 48
Ban Faces Criticism Over Appointments, Slow Pace 48
China Cracks Down On Corruption In Shanghai 49
Russia Brings New Charges Against Khodorkovsky 49
LATimes Welcomes Mexico's Lifting Of Avocado Tariff 49

DOJ_NMG_0127997

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 50

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 51

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0127998

TERRORISM NEWS:

Proposed Budget Includes $7.2 Million More For Guantanamo Cases. The Miami Herald (2/6, Rosenberg) reports, "President Bush's budget request published today includes plans to spend $7.2 million on salaries and expenses for civilian lawyers -- to both fend off legal challenges at home and help prosecute terrorist suspects at the war-crimes court at Guantánamo." The Herald continues, "Until release of the budget, the military commissions had been described as a military function -- handled by the Defense Department and soon to be supervised by a former Pentagon inspector general. … But an annex of the budget released by the White House today lists a supplemental request of $1,736,000 for the government's National Security Division, part of the Justice Department run by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … 'This request would provide the National Security Division $2 million to support the Department of Defense's prosecution of high-value detainees at Guantánamo via the process established by the military commission,' the 2007 supplemental request released today says." The Herald adds, "Bush announced in September that he had ordered the CIA to transfer 14 so-called high-value captives to the U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba, effectively putting them under Pentagon control. … They include Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, and a captive known as Hambali, who was allegedly an Islamic militant in Indonesia. … The budget request said the Justice Department's National Security Division 'will support the [Pentagon] effort by providing experienced assistant United States attorneys and paralegals.' … A Justice Department fact sheet explaining the supplemental budget request said the federal prosecutors, who are civilian lawyers, will get their assignments 'as soon as possible.' … The assignments, it said, 'will last a year or longer.' High-value prosecutions are expected to be more complex. The captives were held at so-called CIA 'black sites,' out of reach of the International Committee of the Red Cross." The Herald notes, "Separately, the Justice Department is seeking an additional $5.5 million for its civil division to fend off lawsuits filed by Guantánamo captives in the federal courts. … Civilian lawyers have filed habeas corpus petitions in U.S. District Court in Washington on behalf of several hundred captives -- and the Justice Department has been challenging them for years."

Budget Would Boost Funding For FISA Court. U.S. News and World Report (2/6) reports, "With the Bush administration's revelation that it will replace the controversial warrantless surveillance program conducted by the National Security Agency with a plan approved by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, the fiscal 2007 budget includes a $3.1 million increase to address what is expected to be a spike in FISA applications." US News continues, "FISA, the secret court that issues wiretap orders from Justice Department requests to conduct electronic surveillance and physical searches of suspected international terrorists or spies, already has had an increased workload since 9/11. … A senior justice official told U.S. News that the department's newly retooled National Security Division has streamlined the FISA application process dramatically, and the increased funds along with the quicker processing will allow the department to handle the new surveillance workload. … But 'it will mean more work for our office,' the official said."

CNET News (2/6, Broache) reports, "President Bush's proposed $2.9 trillion budget for next year calls for increases in some scientific research funding, along with boosts for counterterrorism surveillance and screening programs." CNET continues, "The overall budgets for the U.S. Departments of Justice and Homeland Security… saw slight boosts, with an emphasis on government screening and surveillance programs." CNET adds, "Within the Homeland Security department, the president proposed $1 billion for the so-called Secure Border Initiative, which includes plans for a 'virtual fence' composed of motion sensors, infrared cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles, or UAVs, that the administration hopes will help keep better tabs on illicit entrants. … Homeland Security also would receive a $21.9 million increase in funding for its Science and Technology Office of Innovation, which hopes to develop technologies that would create a more resilient electric grid and detect tunnels along the border, among other things. Overall funding levels for the Science and Technology directorate under Bush's proposal, however, would drop from $848 million for fiscal year 2007 to $799 million for the upcoming year."

Acquitted "Virginia Jihad" Defendant Convicted Of Perjury, Obstruction. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/6, Barakat) reports, "A Virginia man

DOJ_NMG_0127999

was convicted Monday of lying to a federal grand jury about his training with a Pakistani militant group, three years after he was acquitted of giving aid to the Taliban as part of a group that trained with paintball games. A jury in U.S. District Court convicted Sabri Benkahla, 31, of four felony counts including perjury and obstruction of justice." The AP adds, "An FBI agent testified that Benkahla's testimony was important needed because the bureau was investigating his links to suspected terrorists including Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, another U.S. citizen from Falls Church who was subsequently convicted of joining al-Qaida and plotting to assassinate President Bush." The Washington Post (2/6, B2, Markon, 690K) notes in "Virginia Briefing" that Benkahla "had been acquitted in 2004 of being a member of a 'Virginia jihad network' but appeared before the grand jury later that year," when he made the statements which led to the perjury and obstruction case.

LATimes Says More Details About NSA Wiretapping Needed. The Los Angeles Times says in an editorial (2/6), "Slowly but surely, the National Security Agency's eavesdropping on Americans suspected of ties with foreign terrorists is being brought under the rule of law. But the Bush administration still owes not just Congress but the country some straight answers about the program." Last week, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales "agreed to provide Congress details of the program's new arrangement for being monitored by a special court set up by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Gonzales' latest concession comes a few weeks after the administration abruptly reversed itself and said that it could, after all, conduct surveillance of international calls and e-mails under the court's supervision." But the administration "has still refused to spell out whether the court will approve individual requests for wiretapping authority -- as it traditionally has done -- or just sign off on more general requests. This is the crucial question."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Turner Broadcasting To Pay Boston $2 Million Over Cartoon Terror Scare. USA Today (2/6, 2A, Koch, 2.27M) reports, "Boston won an apology and a $2 million settlement Monday from Turner Broadcasting and a marketing company for a campaign that caused a terrorism scare last week. The city, however, has lost ground on the comedy front. Cartoonists, comedians and entrepreneurs are poking fun at Boston officials for dispatching bomb squads and shutting down bridges and highways Wednesday in reaction to blinking electronic devices left on bridges and subway stations." USA notes, "The devices caused no stir in nine other cities where they were posted in recent weeks."

Tennessee Man Pleads Guilty To Possession Of Ricin. The AP (2/6, Rucker) reports from Nashville, TN, "A man pleaded guilty Monday to federal charges of possessing the potentially deadly poison ricin, firearms silencers and explosives." The AP continues, "William Matthews entered his plea in a deal with prosecutors that calls for a prison term of 7 years and 3 months when he is sentenced April 27. … The ricin charge could have been punished by up to life in prison, and the weapons charges each carried a maximum sentence of 10 years. … 'Mr. Matthews, I think, chose this (deal) as the best of the available options,' his lawyer, public defender Sumter Camp, said after court." The AP adds, "Neither the defendant nor the authorities explained why Matthews had the ricin, which is illegal to possess except for research, and the silencers and explosives, which are legal but were not properly registered. … Matthews was charged after a tip from his estranged wife led police and federal agents to search his property May 31. They found the ricin in a sealed baby jar, two functional pipe bombs, five gun silencers, three blasting caps and bomb-making materials."

Louisiana Official Says Some Katrina Evacuee Children Not In School. USA Today (2/6, Johnson, 2.27M) reports the leader "of Louisiana's largest school system says she believes that up to 200 children in the state's biggest hurricane evacuee camp are not registered in local schools. And she says the U.S. government — citing privacy laws — is doing little to help officials identify the youths." East Baton Rouge Parish School Superintendent Charlotte Placide "says the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) has refused to give school officials direct access to information about youths in Renaissance Village, a trailer park for families where 1,200-2,000 people live." Placide said, "The law requires students to be in school. We have families in the FEMA trailer park who concern me greatly."

Slow Pace Of New Orleans Reconstruction Criticized. In his Washington Post column (2/5, A17), Eugene Robinson says, "It's beyond frustrating to hear well-meaning bureaucrats cite all the reasons that so little has been done to rebuild this ruined city and the rest of the Gulf Coast -- why, for example, out of more than 100,000 Louisiana households that have applied to the state government for their share of $7 billion in federal reconstruction funds, fewer than 400 have received their money." The three senators "who flew down to conduct" the Senate Homeland Security Committee field hearing in New Orleans, Chairman Joseph Lieberman (I-Conn.), home-state champion Mary Landrieu (D-La.) and presidential hopeful Barack Obama (D-Ill.) – "were remarkably focused and patient, given the circumstances. I got so exasperated that I had to let my mind wander, and it settled on Brownian motion." That's "where the recovery of New Orleans stands, or floats. Factors such as subparagraph-level provisions of federal programs, fine-print details of a contract signed by the state government and shifting alliances in municipal politics -- minuscule things, compared with the size of the job that must be done -- push from all sides, and the result is a frenzied stasis."

DOJ_NMG_0128000

WAR NEWS:

Vote On Warner Resolution Falls Eleven Votes Short. ABC World News (2/5, story 3, 1:55, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Senate Republicans filibustered the anti-surge resolution, preventing it from being formally debated or coming to a vote." Republicans "are doing this, they say, because Democrats won't let them introduce, under the same rules, a different resolution opposing any cuts in funding for troops in Iraq." Sen. Mitch McConnell: "We are, in effect, being denied, a fair process for this extremely important debate."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Levey, 850K) reports Republicans "complained that Reid was giving preferential treatment to a resolution by Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) to require benchmarks for Iraqi progress. The GOP asked for similar consideration for a measure by Sen. Judd Gregg." The AP (2/6, Espo) notes "the 49-47 vote was 11 short of the 60 needed to go ahead with debate, and left the fate of the measure uncertain." The resolution Republicans want to vote on, by Sen. Gregg, "says Congress should neither cut nor eliminate funding for troops in the field. That measure takes no position on the war or the president's decision to deploy additional forces."

USA Today (2/6, Kiely, 2.27M) notes "all three Republican co-sponsors of the resolution opposed it in the 49-47 vote. The only Republicans voting for that resolution were Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Susan Collins of Maine, both of whom face potentially difficult re-election bids next year. … Sens. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., Mary Landrieu, D-La., Mel Martinez, R-Fla., and John McCain, R-Ariz., did not vote."

The New York Times (2/6, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.16M) says the Republican "show of unity, with war critics including Mr. Warner of Virginia and Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, siding with the leadership, lent some credibility to Republican claims that Democrats were being unfair." The Times adds, "In addition to the resolution introduced by Mr. Gregg, declaring that Congress should not cut off financing for forces in Iraq, Republican leaders had sought a Democratic commitment for a vote on another alternative, one introduced by Senator…McCain." That measure "would set 11 conditions for the Iraqi government if it wanted to retain American support. The Republican approach would need 60 votes for passage."

The Washington Post (2/6, A1, Weisman, Murray, 690K) reports, "The Democratic leadership gave Republicans a choice: Allow all…versions to come to a vote, with a simple majority needed for passing any of them, or debate and vote on the Warner and McCain resolutions, with both needing 60 votes to pass." McConnell "wanted all four resolutions to meet a 60-vote threshold, for a simple reason: Both Democrats and Republicans think the only measure that could attract 60 votes is Gregg's, because Democrats would be concerned about the political ramifications of appearing to take action that might harm troops in battle." The Washington Times (2/6, Hurt, 88K) says GOP Sen. Arlen Specter "called Mr. Reid's squelching of resolutions 'an effort to short-circuit debate.'"

McClatchy (2/6, Talev) also notes that after the vote, which "fell well short of the 60…that the Democrats needed to move to debate under Senate rules," Democrats "shot back that they'll go beyond nonbinding resolutions against the troop buildup in the months ahead, including efforts to attach strings to war appropriations. 'You can run but you can't hide,' said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev."

NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 3, 2:00, Harwood, 9.87M) reported, "We are learning that President Bush may have more ability to hold Republicans together on Iraq than many assumed after the 2006 elections." And the CBS Evening

DOJ_NMG_0128001

News (2/5, story 4, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) said the Senate debate "doesn't seem to be going according to the Democrats' plan." CBS (Attkisson) added, "Not at all." The President "has been warning Congress against passing critical resolutions and today also cautioned against setting timetables for withdrawing troops. … That argument has been hitting home even with some Republicans who are against sending more troops -- and there are quite a few of them. But privately expressing doubt is very different from casting a vote against a President's war plan."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (2/5, Hume), Fred Barnes of the Weekly Standard said Sen. McConnell "is fantastic on this maneuvering and the procedural stuff. He knows that the minority has the advantage. He once blocked a campaign finance reform bill by filibustering sending the Senate conferees to the conference to decide on the bill -- very brilliant."

Roll Call (2/6, Stanton) reports, "Following Republicans' successful filibuster…Senate Democrats are launching a national public relations campaign aimed at tying GOP moderates and incumbents facing difficult 2008 re-election races to Bush in the public's mind, Democratic leadership aides said Monday." The "final vote was something of a surprise, with 49 Members voting to begin debate. Sen. Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) joined 46 Republicans in filibustering the bill." Although "neither Reid's operation nor the DSCC is planning to delve into the paid media world at this point, one source noted that the activist group VoteVets ran an ad opposing the war during the Super Bowl and that MoveOn.org also is expected to play a role in the debate."

In his "Washington Sketch" column, Dana Milbank writes in the Washington Post (2/6, A2, 690K), "Those waiting for the much-anticipated Iraq debate in the Senate will have to wait a while longer." Republicans, "eager to avoid a public airing of views on the unpopular war, raised procedural objections. Democratic leaders, figuring that public pressure would force Republicans to capitulate, refused to meet their demand that all resolutions on the Iraq war get 60 votes to pass." And "each side got tangled up in talking points as it tried to blame the other for preventing a discussion."

On Fox News' Special Report (2/5, Garrett) reported said yesterday's events change "the onus, the political pressure on who is trying to put themselves in the most advantageous political situation on this debate. Two weeks ago Democrats thought that a vote opposing the troops surge would be the most advantageous, they'd split Republicans. Now Democrats are moving more towards a debate about cutting off funds. Republicans want to accelerate that, but Democrats are not organized. So in the end, Democrats feel more political pressure on this question of future funding than they do on opposing the troop surge."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (2/5, Hume), Morton Kondracke of Roll Call said, "If things go badly, we will revisit, I predict, the issue of funding." Brit Hume responded, "I know, but wouldn't it be easier for the White House if a whole bunch of Democratic senators, who are already on record, even on a non-biding resolution, saying that they don't want to cut funds?" Kondracke added, "Yeah, it'll help."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/5, Matthews), GOP Sen. David Vitter outlined the Republican line on the Iraq resolution standoff, saying, "I support multiple votes on the Senate floor to give senators every opportunity to clearly articulate where they're coming from. The obstacle…isn't having a vote. It's how many different resolutions and votes we're going to be able to have. For some reason, Sen. Reid is adamant at holding it to just two. And there is a great diversity of opinion, perhaps particularly on the Republican side." Also on MSNBC's Hardball (2/5, Matthews), Sen. Jack Reed explained the Democratic position, saying Republicans "should get a chance to put up their option. What they want to do is put up two options and attempt to confuse what is very straightforward and simple. … This is a vote of whether you support or you don't support the President's proposed increase in forces in Iraq."

On CNN's "The Situation Room" (2/5, Blitzer), Sen. Trent Lott said, "We have to change the status quo in Iraq. We can't just summarily pull out. Nobody wants that. We have to support our troops that are there or are headed there. I think, broadly, people support that. Then, the question is: What do we do? You know, the President has a proposal, a plan. Maybe it's not, you know, a perfect plan. I don't deny that. But he -- he has made some recommendations. And we should look at that. I think we should give it a chance."

The Financial Times (2/6, Daniel) says the Senate debate is "the most significant sign of Congress reasserting itself against a powerful executive since the start of the war. … The debate forms part of an intensifying battle over Mr Bush's exercise of executive power. Congressional concern has prompted a White House compromise over its terrorist surveillance programme. But when it comes to the conduct of the war and a more direct challenge to the commander-inchief's power, this debate goes to the heart of the administration's philosophical view of its authority."

DOJ_NMG_0128002

Half Of Democratic Senators Who Backed War In 2002 Regret Vote. The Politico (2/5, Lowe, Reilly, Budoff) reported, "Half of the current Democratic senators who backed President Bush's call to war in 2002 say they now regret authorizing the invasion of Iraq, according to a Politico survey." But "while nine of 18 Democrats who backed Bush now wish they had not, Republicans had fewer misgivings -- only three voiced regret. The lack of a similar GOP groundswell highlights the dilemma that some senators from the president's party face as they seek re-election amid sagging voter support for the war -- and, specifically, the president's plan to send 21,000 additional troops to Iraq."

Powell's UN Speech On Iraqi WMD Remembered. The CBS Evening News (2/5, story 5, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "And how is this for irony? Today's Capitol Hill confrontation began four years to the day after then-Secretary of State Colin Powell made a dramatic speech at the UN to make the case that Iraq was hiding weapons of mass destruction. It was a brilliant performance, enough to sell the Congress and the nation on going to war. But before long, it became an embarrassment." Secretary Colin Powell (February 5, 2003): "What we're giving you are facts and conclusions based on solid intelligence." CBS (Martin) added, "That statement about the evidence Saddam Hussein was hiding weapons of mass destruction was made by one of the most trusted men in America. Weapons inspector David Kay remembers being impressed." But "after the invasion, Kay was put in charge of finding the WMD and he found out where those diagrams came from." Kay: "It was a single source. A source that the US intelligence had never at that point talked to, didn't know his name. In fact, he was a fabricator." Martin: "The intelligence about Iraq was not all wrong. On the eve of the invasion, CIA analysts, including Paul Pilar warned the aftermath could get ugly. … But, says former CIA officer, and now CBS consultant, John Brennan, the Administration passed over that intelligence." Brennan: "I don't think there was enough attention paid to those assessments that said after the war, after the invasion, there's going to be difficulty in the streets of Iraq and in Baghdad."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (2/6, A16, 690K) editorializes, "Most senators seem to be aiming to position themselves against their domestic competitors -- in the case of Democrats such as Barack Obama or Joseph R. Biden Jr. -- or cover themselves with voters who are angry about the reverses in the war, in the case of Republicans such as Gordon Smith or Susan Collins. The most overtly political posture may be that of Hillary Rodham Clinton, who petulantly called on President Bush and Congress to 'end this war' -- whatever that means -- before the next president takes office, presumably so that it will not trouble the administration she hopes to lead." The war "will not end before the next president takes office. Mr. Bush's surge is unlikely to produce a breakthrough toward peace; in fact the violence may continue to worsen. All the same, the United States may not be able to withdraw from Iraq without triggering worse consequences than those that might arise from remaining. In short, the country needs a strategy for defending its interests in Iraq for years to come. That perspective, and not the American political calendar, is what Congress ought to be focused on."

Edward N. Luttwak, a fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, writes in the New York Times (2/6, 1.16M), "The sooner President Bush can get his extra troops for a 'surge' in Iraq, the sooner he will be able to announce that all American troops are coming home because of the inevitable failure of the Iraqi government to 'live up to its side of the bargain.'" Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "was induced to issue promises -- particularly in terms of government troops taking on Shiite militias -- that he cannot possibly fulfill. Mr. Maliki, it seems, simply agreed to whatever was asked of him, to humor the White House and retain American support for a little while longer." Luttwak concludes that "in any case, it is time for the Iraqis to make their own history."

E.J. Dionne, in the Washington Post (2/6, A17, 690K), writes that Bush supporters are "saying that the resolution is meaningless and that true opponents of the war should prove their sincerity by cutting off funding altogether. But they are doing all they can to keep the Senate from even voting on a bipartisan anti-surge resolution that would send a powerful message to Bush that most Americans have lost faith in his bungled war policy. … The anti-surge resolution is a necessary first step, which is why those who are against a genuine change in our Iraq policy are fighting so hard to stop it."

Waxman Panel To Grill Bremer On Iraq Contracts. USA Today (2/6, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "Democrats begin their scrutiny of contracts in Iraq today by grilling the top civilian official in Iraq after the 2003 invasion."

DOJ_NMG_0128003

Paul Bremer, the former head of the Coalition Provisional Authority, "testifies today before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee about the billions of dollars his agency spent in Iraq. It will be his first appearance on Capitol Hill since he left office more than two years ago. It's all part of the examination of the Bush administration's conduct in Iraq that Democrats promised after regaining control of Congress." The committee's chairman, Rep. Henry Waxman, "is a longtime critic of the administration's handling of the Iraq war and reconstruction contracts. As head of the committee, Waxman has the power to force officials to testify and hand over documents, as well as to decide what the panel will investigate."

The Washington Times (2/6, Miller, 88K) notes "Waxman last week conducted a hearing on charges of White House meddling in the work of government climate-change scientists. He vowed more hearings into what he described as the abuses of power and taxpayer money by the Bush administration."

The New York Times (2/6, Shenon, 1.16M) profiles Waxman, in a largely positive story titled "As New 'Cop On The Beat,' Congressman Starts Patrol." Says the Times, "Halliburton? Tobacco executives? Vice President Dick Cheney? You've been warned." Waxman "is promising the sort of oversight that the Bush administration has not experienced before. … The congressman, a 67-year-old grandfather of four, would strike no one -- at least no one meeting him for the first time -- as a candidate for the role of Congress's most aggressive muckraker. But the liberal Nation magazine has called him the Democrats' Eliot Ness, and Republicans who have tangled with him say the description is apt."

Bremer Insists He Always Thought US Didn't Have Enough Troops In Iraq. The Politico (2/5, Allen) interviewed Bremer, who said, "I felt right from the start that we were the government of Iraq and the most fundamental response of any government is to provide security for its people. We, in my view, did not have sufficient troops to do that. It was protecting the people. It was guarding pipelines and electrical power lines and patrolling the border. All of the things that needed to be done, I thought we were stretched too thin." Speaking of Bush, Bremer said, "There probably were times when he was very direct and said: If you need more troops, I'll send them to you. I remember many times when they simply said: We have enough troops to accomplish our mission."

The Washington Post (2/6, A9, Chandrasekaran, 690K) reports, "While deep divisions remain about Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq, there is near-unanimity among Democrats and Republicans that the United States needs to roll back key political and economic decisions that Bremer's Coalition Provisional Authority made." Bremer "has become something of a bipartisan-consensus candidate among those looking for officials to hold responsible for what has occurred in Iraq, eliciting that sort of opprobrium once reserved for Donald H. Rumsfeld." However, "some who worked for Bremer in Baghdad contend that he is a scapegoat for Bush administration decisions that were out of his control."

US, Iraqi Forces Prepare To Launch New Baghdad Security Plan. Coverage of the new security crackdown in Baghdad noted its backdrop of continuing violence and doubts about the selection of a little-known Iraqi general to command his country's side of the effort. The AP (2/5, Reid) reports, "Iraqi troops set up new checkpoints and an Iraqi general took command — indications that the much-awaited operation to restore peace to the capital is gearing up nearly a month after it was announced. With little sign of an end to the carnage, many Iraqis have begun complaining that the security drive has been too slow in starting, allowing extremists free rein to launch spectacular attacks that have killed nearly 1,000 in the past week. ... With so much at stake, U.S. commanders have moved methodically to plan the operation and assemble the force, eager to avoid the mistakes that accompanied two failed crackdowns last year."

NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 5, 1:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "In Iraq today, at least 25 people are dead after several car bombs in Baghdad as Iraqi and US forces start to accept up their newest plan for securing the capital city." NBC (Engel) added, "Today US and Iraqi forces launch what they are describing as the biggest, most comprehensive offensive yet here in Baghdad. What is different about the plan this time is that American forces are establishing small, forward operating bases…across the city." US and Iraqi forces "not only go out from here on patrols during the day but then return and live together on the same base at night."

On its front page, the Washington Post (2/6, A1, Partlow, 690K) says the new plan "rests on the assumption that US troops can win the trust of a wary population by protecting civilians trapped amid sectarian warfare." In addition, the plan also offers "a chance to cultivate Iraqis as sources of information about the violence entangling their neighborhoods," but soldiers "in a task force from the 1st Battalion, 26th Infantry Regiment, who have patrolled Baghdad for months, say that trying to gain cooperation from Iraqi civilians is a thankless struggle." The Post adds, "The selection of [Lt. Gen. Abboud] Gambar, a relatively unknown officer, was greeted with skepticism by some Iraqi and U.S. officials. But an aide to Maliki said the prime minister remains confident in his choice and that Gambar has the support of coalition commanders. During a meeting last month between Maliki and Lt. Gen. Graeme Lamb, the senior British general in Iraq, Lamb pronounced Gambar a 'good man,' the aide said." The Washington Times/AP (2/6, Yacoub) says Gambar "was named to the top position under pressure from the United States after it rejected Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's first choice, Lt. Gen. Mohan al-Freiji."

DOJ_NMG_0128004

In addition, the Financial Times (2/6, Negus) says "a weekend of violence" in Baghdad "may undercut Shia support for the operations, particularly as many believe the US is focusing too heavily in its new offensive on Shia militias."

Report Says Iraqi Forces Lack Training, Equipment To Replace US Troops. USA Today (2/6, 1A, Michaels, 2.27M) reports in a front page article that "getting Iraqi forces trained, motivated and taking the lead in the fight against insurgents and illegal militias has been a struggle for the US military." Meanwhile, a "major US intelligence report released last Friday said that Iraqi security forces lack the training, equipment and skills necessary to replace US troops." The National Intelligence Estimate warned that, if US troops were withdrawn in the next 12 to 18 months, "this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq."

Iraqi Troops Kill Al-Sadr Aide. The New York Times (2/6, Oppel, 1.16M) reports, following AP coverage by one day, "The director of the political office in Diyala Province for the powerful anti-American Shiite militia leader Moktada al-Sadr [Ali Khazim al-Hamdani] was shot and killed by troops during a raid on Sunday, a Sadr political spokesman said Monday." A US military statement "said Iraqi troops had killed a leader of 'rogue' and criminal elements of Mr. Sadr's Mahdi Army in Diyala who had directed attacks on American forces as well as "kidnappings, assassinations and other violence targeting Iraqi civilians and Iraqi police." Other sources differ on the nationality of those who killed Al-Hamdani: the previous day's AP coverage quoted an Al-Sadr spokesman who identified Al-Hamdani's killers as "U.S. forces." The Washington Post (2/6, A13, Partlow, 690K) reports the killers as "Iraqi soldiers, backed by U.S. advisers." The Times implicitly questions the US military statement's allegation of Al-Hamdani's "rogue" status, saying, "Some American officials familiar with Diyala, a volatile province north of Baghdad, have said that [he] provided intelligence to the American military, beginning last summer."

Administration Officials Playing Down Evidence On Iran's Role In Iraq. The Christian Science Monitor (2/6, LaFranchi, 59K) reports, "In an atmosphere of sharp skepticism about intelligence and heightened sensitivity to saber rattling since the Iraq invasion," the Bush administration is "signaling a more cautious tone toward Iran." Senior officials from the White House, State Department, and Pentagon are now "playing down" the evidence the US possesses of "nefarious" Iranian involvement in Iraq. They are "also insisting the US wants to work out problems with Tehran diplomatically." A "repeated delay" in a "promised" presentation of evidence against Iran "reflects the administration's desire to get things right, and to neither overplay nor underestimate involvement," officials say. National security adviser Stephen Hadley, Friday told reporters that "the truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts." But the "moderated tone" also "suggests an administration still smarting over memories of the earlier botched campaign to justify taking on Saddam Hussein, some experts say."

Iraqi Officials Linked To Kidnapping Of Iranian Diplomat. The New York Times (2/6, A8, Glanz, 1.16M) reports an Iranian diplomat was "abducted Sunday evening when his convoy was stopped by men with official Defense Ministry identification" in Baghdad, senior Iraqi and American officials said Monday, "raising serious questions about whether government forces themselves were involved in the abduction." A senior Iraqi official "said that the credentials initially appeared to be genuine but that investigators later received conflicting information about whether the men had been dismissed from the ministry but somehow kept their identification." When asked about indications that an Iranian diplomat had been abducted in Baghdad, Mohammad al Hosseini, an Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman in Tehran, said he could not confirm the reports. However, the Times says "if the kidnappers' credentials turn out to be genuine, there will be enormous pressure on the Iraqi government to recover the diplomat and capture all of those involved."

DOJ_NMG_0128005

US May Seek Additional Sanctions Against Iran. The AP (2/6) reports the Bush administration "will push for more U.N. Security Council sanctions against Iran if Tehran continues to ignore council demands for suspension of the country's uranium enrichment program," the State Department said Monday. Assistant Secretary McCormack Iran appears to be continuing "down the path of isolation" by its recent announcement of stepped up installation of centrifuges. McCormack said the US would seek "incremental" sanctions at the U.N. "should the standoff continue, though he did not specify what they might be or the exact timing of any action."

Iran Installs 300 Centrifuges At Natanz Site. The Washington Post/AP (2/6, A12) reports, "Shrugging off the threat of tougher U.N. sanctions, Iran has set up more than 300 centrifuges in two uranium enrichment units at its underground Natanz complex," diplomats and officials said Monday. The move "potentially opens the way for larger-scale enrichment that could be used to build nuclear warheads." It also "poses a direct challenge to the U.N. Security Council."

Opinion On Engaging Iran Divided. Retired Air Force captain and former counterintelligence consultant in Iraq, Dr. Richard Saccone, writes in USA Today (2/6, 10A, 2.27M) that "an objective look at the ominous threat from Iran provides a clear solution to the policy the United States must pursue." Iran, he says, is "easily the most significant source of terror worldwide, providing financing, training, advice, support and supplies to its proxy Hezbollah as well as other groups as far away as Asia," which makes it "a major opponent in the war on terror." In addition, Iran "has increased efforts to undermine the US mission in Iraq through operations in the south as well as in Baghdad." Therefore, Saccone concludes, "The stakes are far too high to allow Iran to buy any more time through feigned receptivity to diplomacy" and "must be confronted quickly and persistently."

Meanwhile, in an editorial, USA Today (2/6, 10A, 2.27M) says the United States "needs a fresh approach" on Iran. An emerging US strategy in the Middle East "looks a lot like containment. Rather than direct military confrontation or outright appeasement, the Administration has been building up points of leverage to isolate and pressure the Iranian regime." President Bush "has been talking tough," while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "has been lining up Sunni allies." While "all are reasonable steps," the newspaper says "a vital part is missing: dialogue."

Assad Urges US-Syrian Cooperation On Iraq.

ABC World News (2/5, story 4, 3:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Tonight, we have a rare and exclusive interview with a man the Bush administration says is part of the problem in Iraq, Syria's President, Bashar Assad." ABC's Diane Sawyer, who spoke with Assad in Damascus, added, "There are a chorus of voices in the United States saying that talking to Syria is the way to end the war in Iraq." Assad told ABC, "The problem in Iraq is political, and talking to Syria…means talking to all the other parties inside Iraq and outside Iraq… It's not only about Syria. So, stopping the violence should be related to the political dialogue." However, Assad also said Syria doesn't "expect that [the US is] going to, after nearly four years of occupation, they haven't learned their lesson. They've stopped the dialogue. I think it's too late for them to move toward that." Asked about reports that insurgents are entering Iraq through Syria, Assad said the US needs "to stop looking for scapegoats and whipping boys." When asked what steps Syria can take to tightened control of the border, he responded, "You are the greatest power in the world and you can't control your border with Mexico. How do you want Syria to control its border with Iraq?"

The Washington Times/AP (2/6, Keath) reports briefly on Assad's interview with ABC News.

Iraqi Shiite Leader Says US Urged To Hold Talks With Iran. The New York Times (2/6, A8, Fathi, 1.16M) reports a senior Iraqi Shiite leader "said Monday that his country had urged Iran to hold talks with the United States and that such talks were important for the security of the region." Speaking to reporters in Tehran after meeting with Iranian national security chief, Ali Larijani, Abdel Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite leaders, said, "Given the special conditions in the region, talks between the United States and Iran are of the utmost importance" and that negotiations between Iran and the United States "are useful for the whole region."

Allies "Dawdle" On Aiding Iraq. The Washington Times (2/6, Dinan, 88K) reports, "Foreign countries are billions of dollars delinquent on their pledges to help Iraq rebuild, and four years after the war began, the international reconstruction effort is still mostly funded by the United States. Some of the biggest deadbeats are Iraq's oil-rich neighbors, such as Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, which are both about a half-billion dollars in arrears, and the United Arab Emirates, which has failed to make good on one penny of a $215 million promise, according to Iraqi government statistics. ... Of $15 billion in initial pledges at the Madrid donors' conference in 2003 and in follow-up conferences, foreign donors have made good on about $4 billion." Even the US "is the most delinquent of any nation in nominal terms, with $6.4 billion still outstanding on the U.S. pledge of $18.4 billion, although the $12 billion the United States has sent is far and away the most of any country. ... The Defense Department's Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, Stuart W. Bowen Jr., in a new report last week, said international funding is reaching a turning point where those bilateral foreign donations will become more critical as the existing funds managed by the World Bank and United Nations become exhausted."

DOJ_NMG_0128006

Rice Announces Task Force On Iraqi Refugees. AFP (2/6) reports Secretary of State Rice Monday announced the creation of a task force "to tackle the mounting Iraq refugee crisis, after Washington came under criticism for not doing enough to help millions of people displaced by the war it unleashed nearly four years ago." The task force, which will be headed by Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky, will "coordinate US assistance for Iraqi refugees and internally displaced persons and "devise strategies for Iraqis at risk because of their work with the US government," Assistant Secretary of State McCormack said. After coming under "growing criticism for taking in fewer than 500 Iraqi refugees since leading the 2003 invasion," McCormack last week said Washington was prepared to take in "a fairly significant number" of Iraqi refugees, but he declined to provide figures.

100th British Soldier Killed In Iraq. AFP (2/5) reports, "A British soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in southern Iraq, the 100th to die in military action in the violence-scarred country, the Ministry of Defence said. The bomb exploded near the US consulate in the main city of Basra ... There has been criticism in the past that British troops deployed in both Iraq and Afghanistan have not been sufficiently protected by their existing armoured vehicles."

Watada Court Martial Opens. The New York Times (2/6, Yardley, 1.16M) reports, "A court-martial started here on Monday against an Army officer who refused to serve in Iraq last summer because, he has said, the war is illegal. ... Many enlisted soldiers have faced discipline for refusing to serve in Iraq. Lieutenant Watada is the first officer to refuse to do so publicly. He could face up to four years in prison and be dishonorably discharged if convicted on all counts. The case has become a rallying point for antiwar groups, and scores of Lieutenant Watada's supporters waved signs on Monday at a highway overpass outside Fort Lewis. ... His prospects appear uncertain. The judge, Lt. Col. John Head, reinforced on Monday an earlier ruling that Lieutenant Watada could not base his defense on his contention that the war is illegal."

Afghan Ambassador Denounces Pakistani Haven For Taliban. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/6, A16, 2.04M), Afghan Ambassador to the US Said Jawad writes, "Pakistan's recent proposal to fence and lay landmines along its 1,500-mile Afghanistan border is impractical, ineffective and irrelevant to the problem of terrorism and the Taliban. Terrorism will be contained only if we end the institutional support for extremism and strengthen traditional leadership in our region. ... the border is not where the problem lies. Terrorist sanctuaries in Pakistan are the real threat to regional stability and global security. Such sanctuaries are breeding grounds for extremism and violence."

DOJ:

Senate Hearing To Examine US Attorney Departures. The Financial Times (2/6, Masters) reports, "The current mid-term turn-over in US attorneys is unprecedented and could seriously disrupt pending investigations, witnesses plan to testify at today's Senate judiciary committee hearing on whether the Bush administration is politicising the appointment process for top prosecutors." The Times continues, "Traditionally, US attorneys are named by the president and confirmed by the Senate, although 'interim' appointees could serve for 120 days without confirmation. … Last year a little noticed amendment to the Patriot Act reauthorisation allowed the president to make 'interim' appointments that lasted indefinitely. … Since then, 13 of the 93 US attorneys have left and at least seven of them were asked to leave by officials in Washington. The departures include the top lawyers in New Mexico, San Diego, Arkansas, Nevada, Washington state and Arizona, according to senators and Justice Department sources." The Times adds, "Democrats have described most of them as respected prosecutors who enjoyed the esteem of their subordinates and were reportedly asked to leave to make room for politically connected insiders. … Senator Chuck Schumer, the New York Democrat, will chair a hearing this morning on the issue. He said: 'The highly unusual recent flurry of firings of many well-respected US attorneys not only raises some flags, but also requires some explanations.' … Mark Pryor, Democratic senator from Arkansas, planned to testify about the recent appointment of a protege of Karl Rove as interim US attorney in his state. Several other witnesses gave advance copies of their written testimony to the Financial Times. … 'We have never seen the type of turnover now in progress, where the attorney-general, not the president, is asking mid-term that demonstrably capable US attorneys submit their resignations so that Washington insiders may be appointed in their place,' Laurie Levenson, a Loyola law professor, planned to say." The Times notes, "Mary Jo White, a former US attorney from New York, wrote that turnover has a price. 'Changing a United States attorney invariably causes disruption and loss of traction in cases and investigations,' she planned to testify. … Justice Department officials declined to make deputy attorney-general Paul McNulty's testimony available. But they have said the Bush administration is not trying to circumvent the traditional appointment process and will seek Senate confirmation for all replacement US attorneys."

DOJ_NMG_0128007

DOJ Budget Includes Flat Funding For Several Flagship Programs. Government Computer News (2/6, Dizard) reports, "The draft Justice Department IT spending plan calls for increases in various FBI and department technology projects seeded throughout the department's overall discretionary funding request of $21.8 billion, according to the department's press release. … Detailed funding proposals point to flat or declining funding levels for several flagship programs, such as the Justice Information Sharing Technology program. That project, which covers IT investments across the department, is set to see its total new budget authority dwindle from $103 million in fiscal 2007 to $101 million next year." GCN adds, "The JIST account covers signature programs like the Joint Automated Booking System, the Justice Consolidated Office Network, the Litigation Case Management System, the Law Enforcement Information Sharing Program and the Unified Financial Management System that help hold the department's largely independent bureaus together. … Justice's CIO, Vance Hitch, controls the JIST account and is in position to use it to harmonize the various bureaus' operations. … But Justice's press release touted a $514 million boost to Interpol's links with state and local agencies. Using different yardsticks for the department's IT spending, Justice claimed that the draft budget, when taken as a whole, included $74.5 million in funds for new IT projects. … Justice claims a total IT program increase figure of $133.2 million for new IT projects including projects affecting several department components. That statement in the department's press materials was not reflected in detailed budget documents."

Government Executive (2/6, Pulliam) reports that "the budget identified agencies that will provide information security services to others as part of the Office of Management and Budget's 'lines of business' effort to consolidate back-end IT systems across government. The Office of Personnel Management, U.S. Agency for International Development and the Defense Department will provide shared service centers for security awareness training, and the Environmental Protection Agency and the Justice Department will offer centers for meeting the reporting requirements in a federal law -- the Federal Information Security Management Act."

DOJ Programs Included Among Budget "Losers." An analysis of the proposed budget by the Fresno Bee (2/6, Doyle) includes a list of budget winners and losers. Among the budget losers, the Bee includes several DOJ programs. The Bee reports, "The Community Oriented Policing Services grant program would be slashed to $32 million, down from the current level of $500 million. … The Justice Department would eliminate a number of other programs, including ones to assist Southwest border prosecutors, stop prison rape and protect Alzheimer's patients."

Budget Includes Increases To Fight Child Porn, Obscenity. CNET News (2/6, Broache) reports, "The Justice Department's budget also includes more than $25 million in program increases--up from $93.7 million last year--for investigations involving child pornography and obscenity, particularly tracking convicted sex offenders and apprehending 'online child pornographers and molesters.'"

Gonzales Addresses SMU Law Students. The SMU Daily Campus (2/6, Jukam) reports, "Law students flocked to the Underwood Law Library Friday at noon, and not just for the free lunch. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who was in town this weekend to receive a distinguished alumni award, spoke to a lecture hall filled with students to discuss the responsibilities of the judicial branch and other topics related to law." The DC continues, "Although Gonzales initially emphasized that each of the three branches of government would affect law students' lives, his speech focused primarily on the role of the judicial branch and the characteristics of good judges. According to Gonzales, judges need to understand their role in the government. … 'I am concerned that some judges have lost sight of the goal of the judicial branch,' Gonzales said. 'It is not the role of judicial branch to make policy.'" The DC adds, "Gonzales said that judges could maintain the judiciary's independence by making decisions based on neutral policies and respecting precedent. He also believes that the Constitution wasn't intended to address every legal and policy issue, and that by making certain issues constitutional, decisions are then taken out of the hands of the people. … 'I'm concerned about judges who think they see a constitutional solution to every societal ill,' Gonzales said." The DC notes, "During a question-and-answer session, Gonzales spoke extensively about the USA Patriot Act. The Patriot Act, passed after the attacks of Sept. 11, gave law enforcement more authority to fight terrorism. … 'Shortly after the attacks of 9/11, we were looking for additional tools to protect the country,' Gonzales said. 'The Patriot Act has been extremely helpful in allowing the U.S. government [to] collect information about threats to the government.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Budget Includes Increase For SEC. The AP (2/6) reports, "The SEC's budget, after nearly doubling in 2003 under anti-fraud legislation enacted amid the wave of corporate scandals early in the decade, is roughly flat for the third straight year under President Bush's 2007 proposal. … In fact, the administration asked for nearly the same amount last year, $904.8 million. But the agency has been operating at an estimated level of $877.1 million for the budget year ending Oct. 1 because, as is the case for most federal agencies, Congress hasn't yet approved 2007 spending levels." The AP continues, "The budget proposal doesn't call for any new programs at the market watchdog agency. But it is 'sufficient for the (SEC) to do its job and do it well,' agency Executive Director Diego Ruiz told reporters in a conference call Monday." The AP adds, "It is the second budget under Chairman Christopher Cox, who became head of the agency in August 2005 after 16 years in the House as a Republican from California. Reflecting Cox's interest in technology, the spending plan provides $130 million for information technology, up from $118 million, including improvements in the SEC's online corporate disclosure system. … The budget also includes $321.2 million for investigations and enforcement actions, higher than estimated 2007 spending of $310.1 million but slightly below last year's original request of $328.1 million. The SEC plans to open 925 new investigations, compared with 960 the previous year. … The SEC and the Justice Department are investigating suspicious timing of stock options grants at more than 100 public companies -- with backdating of options awarded to executives having become corporate America's biggest scandal last year. SEC officials say the agency is focusing on cases of serious fraud -- with elements such as deliberately lying, forging documents or deceiving directors or investors."

Banks Appeal Ruling On Enron Investor Class Action. The New York Times/Bloomberg (2/6) reports from New Orleans, "Two investment banks, Merrill Lynch and Credit Suisse, asked a federal appeals court yesterday to end a class-action lawsuit by Enron investors seeking $40 billion that they lost when the energy trader collapsed in 2001." Bloomberg continues, "The banks argued that a Houston judge was wrong to allow Enron investors to sue as a group and contended that they could not be sued because they did not participate directly in the accounting fraud that led to Enron's bankruptcy." Bloomberg adds, "The investors argued the court could address only whether the plaintiffs could sue as a group. Trial is set for April in Houston. … 'This class certification is putting enormous coercive impact on my client, facing a possible $40 billion exposure,' a lawyer for Merrill, Stuart Baskin, argued yesterday before the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans. … A ruling that invalidates class status may reduce any liability the banks might face for Enron losses. In June, Judge Melinda Harmon of Federal District in Houston said investors who bought Enron securities could combine their claims. The decision gave investors, who would otherwise be forced to sue individually, the possibility of a much higher recovery and more leverage in negotiating any settlement." Bloomberg notes, "Other former Enron lenders, like Citigroup, JPMorgan Chase and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, have settled with investors for more than $7 billion. … Merrill and Credit Suisse argued that Judge Harmon's ruling was based on the mistaken theory that the banks were individually responsible for investor losses because they took part in a scheme run by Enron."

DOJ_NMG_0128009

SEC Examines Front-Running Trading. The New York Times (2/6, Anderson) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a broad examination into whether Wall Street bank employees are leaking information about big trades to favored clients, like hedge funds, in an effort to curry favor with those clients, executives at Wall Street banks said." The Times continues, "The inquiry, these people said, seems aimed at determining how pervasive insider trading, or the illegal use of market-moving nonpublic information, may be on Wall Street. Knowledge about a large trade, like the sale of a big block of stock by the mutual fund giant Fidelity, would tell a trader which way the stock would move." The Times adds, "Trading ahead of client orders, or front-running, has long been an issue on Wall Street. Large mutual fund companies have often complained in the past that Wall Street brokerage firms were front-running their trades, using information about the funds' plans to buy or sell to make a risk-free bet on a stock's direction. … But the latest S.E.C. investigation appears to have a new twist: Rather than examine whether a bank is trading ahead of its own client by using knowledge of the customer's trade, the scope of the investigation will allow regulators to see if banks tip their valued customers who then go trade at another bank, making the paper trail harder to detect."

Hyundai Chairman Sentenced To Three Years By South Korean Court. The Financial Times (2/6, Jung-a) reports, "Hyundai Motor was thrown into disarray on Monday when Chung Mong-koo, its chairman, was sentenced to three years in prison for embezzlement and breach of trust, raising the possibility of a management vacuum at South Korea's largest carmaker." The Times continues, "The punishment was harsher than expected and compounded the woes at Hyundai, which was already grappling with the strong local currency, flagging profits and a disruptive labour union. … But the sentence was welcomed by corporate governance campaigners, who said it showed Korea would no longer tolerate chaebol owners using their companies to pursue their personal interest." The Times adds, "The court found Mr Chung guilty of embezzling about $100m of company funds and inflicting about $224m of damage on group affiliates during rights issues. … He was also convicted of using deals to boost his financial gains and those of his son, Eui-sun, who runs affiliate Kia Motors. … 'The defendant's act of secretively setting up massive slush funds and using them wilfully, using his status as the Hyundai Motor group's chairman, undermines the soundness and the autonomy of corporate management,' said Kim Dong-oh, the Seoul central district court judge. … The 68-year-old hairman was freed on bail to 'guarantee his defending rights and to minimise its impact on the economy' while he appeals the conviction, the court said."

Former Fannie Mae Head Seeks Earlier Hearing Date. The Washington Post (2/6, D01, Hilzenrath) reports, "Former Fannie Mae chairman and chief executive Franklin D. Raines, accused of manipulating the housing finance company's earnings, is challenging regulators to make their case against him beginning Feb. 16 instead of waiting until the end of the year." The Post continues, "Attorneys for Raines have argued that the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which issued administrative charges in December, is required by law to begin a hearing on the evidence within 60 days of that event. … The agency, however, has proposed a schedule that would have the two sides file pretrial statements in December. The agency's proposal did not say when the hearing should begin. … 'It's a fundamental issue of fairness,' said Mark Fabiani, a spokesman for Raines. 'Frank Raines is ready to disprove OFHEO's allegations starting this month, and OFHEO is seeking to delay the proceedings until 2008.'" The Post notes, "The agency previously expressed concern about being overwhelmed by litigation related to Raines and the accounting scandal. In a lawsuit shareholders brought over Fannie Mae's accounting, the agency stated that complying with Raines's document requests could pose such a burden that it could divert regulators from their mission. … Raines's trial before an administrative law judge would be the culmination of a process regulators set in motion more than two years ago. In fall 2004, after an extended probe, OFHEO issued a report alleging that Fannie Mae used improper accounting. The Securities and Exchange Commission later agreed."

Donohue Says SEC Investigation Into Sunrise Lacks Merit. The Washington Post (2/6, A15, Birnbaum) reports that as president of the US Chamber of Commerce, Thomas J. Donohue "has long been obliged to talk tough against federal regulation, especially by the Securities and Exchange Commission. But now, it's personal." For 12 years, Donohue "has been a board member (including serving on the audit committee) of Sunrise Senior Living, a publicly traded company being probed by the SEC." Recently, the SEC "opened an inquiry into allegations that" Sunrise founder Paul Klaassen and "other insiders, including Donohue, may have improperly cashed $32 million in stock options before Sunrise in May announced an accounting problem that caused its stock to drop. Donohue calls the allegations meritless and says they were drummed up by labor unions that want to organize the company. He said that he has not been contacted by the SEC and that its inquiry will amount to nothing." But the "controversy adds fuel to complaints that investor activists have leveled at Donohue ever since he took over and revived the Chamber, the nation's largest business lobby, in 1997."

DOJ_NMG_0128010

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Agent Acknowledges Errors In Earlier Libby Trial Testimony. Fox News' Special Report With Brit Hume (2/5, Angle) reported, "Scooter Libby's defense got an unexpected break today when FBI agent Debra Bond was forced to reverse testimony she gave just last week. Bond had testified that when she first questioned Libby, he said he had learned from Karl Rove that Rove had informed columnist Robert Novak that Valerie Plame worked at the CIA. But today FBI agent Bond said her testimony last week was exactly backwards. As defense attorney Ted Wells asked pointedly, 'So when you said last week that Novak learned from Rove, that testimony was incorrect?' Bond, 'That's what I said. When I read that, it's like, I can't believe I said that.' Wells, 'Sometimes people make mistakes, right?' Bond, 'Yes.'" Fox added, "So yet another witness who told one story, then changed it; a perfect example of what the defense is arguing, that Libby also testified in good faith, but simply got it wrong."

MSNBC's Countdown (2/5, Shuster) reported that "Bond testified last week, on direct, that Libby, quote, 'adamantly denied telling White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer anything about Valerie Wilson before Valerie Wilson was outed.' But under cross-examination today…Bond acknowledged that the words 'adamantly denied' were her characterization, and that Libby never used those words, but rather that Libby actually said he couldn't recall discussing Valerie Wilson with Ari Fleischer. It is a difference, so give the defense some credit, but again these are differences over shades of gray. This is not a blockbuster contradiction perhaps that the defense had been hoping for."

Under the headline "FBI Acknowledges Gaps In Notes On Libby," USA Today (2/6, Willing, 2.27M) reports both on Bond's testimony about Libby not "adamantly" denying the conversation with Fleischer, as well as her misstatement about Rove, and the New York Times (2/6, Lewis, 1.16M), at the end of its story focusing on the grand jury tapes played at trial yesterday, notes Bond's cross-examination and adds, "It was a reminder to the jury that one of the pillars of Mr. Libby's defense was that if he spoke inaccurately to the grand jury and investigators, it was only a case of faulty memory."

Jurors Hear Libby Tapes Of Libby's Grand Jury Testimony. The Washington Post (2/6, A3, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) reports, "I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby told a grand jury in 2004 that Vice President Cheney did not encourage him to provide information about an undercover CIA officer to the media, but Libby also said he did not believe that the information was secret and had to be safeguarded, according to audiotapes of Libby's testimony played in court yesterday. … The eight hours of audiotapes, most of which are to be played today, are intended to back up the government's assertion that Libby lied to investigators about his role in disclosing the identity" of Valerie Plame Wilson. "On the tapes, Libby said that Cheney did not tell him Plame's CIA identity was 'super-super-secret' and that he used a 'curious' tone unlike his regular voice, which 'was much more matter-of-fact and straight.' Libby said he did not remember Cheney speaking harshly of Wilson or suggesting nepotism was the reason for his mission."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Schmitt, 850K) adds, "The transcript of Libby's two grand jury appearances in March 2004 also shows that special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald explored early on whether President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney were involved in the circumstances leading to the disclosure of Plame's identity as a CIA employee. … Libby said he did not believe that Cheney wanted him to leak word about Wilson's wife to the press." The New York Times (2/6, Lewis, 1.16M) notes, "On the tape, Mr. Libby was heard saying repeatedly that he could not recall any conversation he ever had with Marc Grossman, a State Department official, about Ms. Wilson. Mr. Grossman, who was then the under secretary of state, has already testified about two such conversations."

DOJ_NMG_0128011

Media Praise Judge's Decision To Release Tapes Publicly. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/6, Yen) reports, "News organizations praised a judge's decision Monday to release tapes of former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby's grand jury testimony, saying it would open a window into court proceedings. U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton said he would make the eight-hour recordings public even though he was worried that jurors could be influenced by outside media buzz." The AP notes that Libby's lawyers had fought the release, however, "Nathan Siegel, an attorney representing The Associated Press and more than a dozen other news organizations, contended that Libby's own words were far less prejudicial than evidence released in other cases, including 911 calls from inside the World Trade Center, FBI tapes in the Abscam investigation and mob wiretap tapes."

Kristof Calls For Cheney To Answer Questions About Libby, Or Resign. Under the headline "Mr. Cheney, Tear Down This Wall," Nicholas Kristof writes in his New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) column, "Mr. Cheney, now that the Scooter Libby trial is raising doubts about your own integrity, you owe the nation an explanation." Kristof poses a series of questions for Cheney, including, "did you push Mr. Libby to dig into Joe Wilson's background and discredit him?" and "What did you mean when you wrote, in a note to Scott McClellan…'not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy the Pres. that was asked to stick his head in the meat grinder because of incompetence of others.'" Kristof notes Nixon's Checkers speech and Agnew's public comments about the corruption allegations he faced in 1973, adding, "I'm not accusing you of committing a crime. But there are serious questions here," and if "you continue to stonewall, then you don't belong in office and you should resign."

Trial Highlights Difference Between "Classified" And "Secret" Material. ABC News (2/5, Coulter) reports, "In government, there's often a conflict between what can be aired publicly and what should be kept under wraps. There is no doubt about the value of keeping secret the movement of military forces in wartime. There is plenty of information that should be released, yet is jealously guarded by government officials. Sunshine laws and the Freedom of Information Act are designed to counter too much secrecy. … Secrecy and the lack of it are at the heart of the perjury and obstruction trial of former White House aide Lewis 'Scooter' Libby. The case has its origins in allegations that the Bush Administration twisted intelligence data to justify a pre-emptive war with Iraq. The prosecution believes there was a concerted effort to discredit the war critic by unmasking his CIA wife." ABC News continues, "There is no dispute at the Libby trial that Valerie Plame's CIA identity was CLASSIFIED information. It was the CIA that officially requested a Justice Department investigation of who leaked her name to reporters, a possible violation of the Intelligence Identities Protection Act of 1982. But no one has been charged with violating that law, which carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a 50-thousand dollar fine." ABC News adds, "Documents in the case and testimony at the trial show a number of top administration officials discussed Valerie Plame with reporters. Former State Department official Richard Armitage, former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer, Karl Rove, and Scooter Libby, among them. An FBI agent also testified that Libby said it's possible he and Vice President Dick Cheney discussed leaking Plame's name to journalists. It was such an incendiary topic, former Time Magazine reporter Matthew Cooper told his bureau chief the information should be considered 'double super secret background.' … Simply discussing an undercover operative is not enough to violate the law. You have to know the agent in question is covert and the government is taking steps to conceal the person's identity, and the disclosure must be intentional. So after a more than three year long investigation, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has only charged Scooter Libby with lying and trying to obstruct his leak investigation. When he announced the indictment, Fitzgerald compared the offense to someone kicking sand into an umpire's eyes."

California Agency Fined Councilman For Accepting Funds From Miller In 1992. The Hill (2/6, Crabtree) reports Rep. Gary Miller "last week blamed an FBI review of his land deals on a media smear campaign. But this is not the first time government agencies have scrutinized his real estate transactions. In 1992, the California Fair Political Practices Commission (FPPC), a state government entity that regulates political activity and investigates conflict-of-interest allegations, levied a $1,750 fine against Covina City Councilman Christopher Lancaster for accepting $8,000 from Miller before voting in favor of a resolution Miller sponsored. The payment occurred when Lancaster was mayor of Covina and Miller was a member of the Diamond Bar City Council and running for state Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0128012

The Hill notes, "Shaun Martin, a law and ethics professor at the University of San Diego, said annexation of the land benefited Miller. 'The lingering question is whether the $8,000 he gave to the mayor had anything to do with the mayor's vote in favor' of the annexation tax deal, Martin said."

Fumo Lashes Out At Expected Indictment, Vows To "Stand Up And Fight." The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/6, Cattabiani, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "In a preemptive strike on the eve of his likely indictment, a defiant State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo took the fight to federal prosecutors yesterday, vowing to contest charges he called 'falsities and half-truths.' 'I know in my heart that I have not done anything illegal,' the Philadelphia Democrat said during a 12-minute speech on the Senate floor, his voice at times somber, at times bitter. 'Sometimes in life the only choice we have when we face blatant injustice is to have the courage to stand up and fight.' … Fumo stepped down from a powerful committee post yesterday…but will remain in the Senate." The Inquirer notes that Fumo "predicted the indictment would focus on two basic allegations: that he exploited a South Philadelphia charity and misused his Senate staff for personal and political purposes. … 'The indictment will not allege that I ever accepted a bribe,' Fumo said. 'And, as the government knows, I never did.'"

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/6, Jackson) reports that Fumo, "who has been under FBI scrutiny for four years, announced on the Senate floor today that he expects to be indicted this week. … Fumo would have been required to give up his leadership post as soon as he was indicted. He portrayed his resignation as minority party chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee as a temporary measure 'until I am vindicated.' Fumo charged that the investigation 'has been marked by threats, intimidations and frequent leaks to the media intended to embarrass me' and vowed to fight the allegations."

Speech Called "Terrific Public-Relations Maneuver." The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/6, McCoy, Lounsberry, 385K) reports in a separate story, "It was vintage Senator Fumo – smart, heartfelt, combative, eloquent and shrewd. … He offered a counter-narrative: Fumo, the people's champion, fighting the good fight in the face of threats, leaks and intimidation. 'A terrific public-relations maneuver to get ahead of the indictment,' said lawyer John P. Pucci, a former federal prosecutor." The Inquirer notes Fumo "said the government was about to accuse him of misusing a South Philadelphia charity. To rebut that, he extolled the nonprofit's work on 'countless' community projects, from supporting charter schools to cleaning up 'trash-strewn, rat-infested, vacant lots.' … With members of his Senate staff standing behind him, he said prosecutors were about to paint them as his taxpayer-paid campaign workers and personal servants. To the contrary, he said, they work tirelessly for the public, without bonuses or overtime."

Indictment Expected To Have Mixed Effect On Fumo-Linked Politicians. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/6, Davies, 106K) reports, "When something as earth-shattering as a federal corruption indictment hits a politician as influential as Vince Fumo, his friends and allies feel the shock waves, too. … Fumo worked hard to get U.S. Rep. Bob Brady into the mayor's race, and longtime Fumocrats Jim Kenney and Frank DiCicco are running for re-election to their seats on City Council. Kenney and DiCicco, by now multi-term incumbents with their own legislative records, political relationships and fundraising capacity seem well-positioned to thrive on their own. It's harder to predict the impact on Brady, a longtime friend and associate of Fumo's who must fight the notion that he's a machine politician." The Daily News adds, "St. Joseph's University historian and analyst Randall Miller said the Fumo scandal could raise the profile of the issue of public corruption and help mayoral candidates Michael Nutter and Tom Knox, who are fighting 'pay-to-play' politics."

Florida Development Bribery Scheme Trial Begins Today. The Miami Herald (2/6, Clark, 286K) reports, "A decade after the late Monroe County Mayor John L. 'Jack' London was paid $29,000 as part of an alleged development bribery scheme, a former county attorney goes on trial today for his suspected role in the public corruption case. James Hendrick, who served as Monroe County attorney from 1995-2002, faces federal charges of conspiracy to obstruct justice, witness tampering and obstruction of justice. A 12-member jury was seated Monday." The Herald notes, "The case stems from a lengthy FBI investigation into alleged public corruption in the Keys. Prosecutors say Hendrick was the center of a ''secret deal' in which he, London and Miami-Dade political consultant Randy Hilliard conspired to get Marathon businessman Marvin Rappaport to pay $75,000 in exchange for building and zoning approval of his stymied redevelopment project."

DOJ_NMG_0128013

Man Sentenced To 8½ Years In Prison For FEMA Relief Fraud. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/6, Sanner) reports, "A 59-year-old man was sentenced Monday to 8 1/2 years in prison on charges stemming from his use of stolen identities in an attempt to acquire more than $100,000 in payments intended for victims of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Jeffrey Alan Rothschild, who's also known as Jeffrey Zahler, pleaded guilty in August to bank fraud, mail fraud and money laundering in late 2005. He was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly in Washington. U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor said Rothschild abused a system set up by the Federal Emergency Management Agency to allow hurricane victims to receive $2,000 in emergency funds after providing their names, Social Security numbers and other information." The AP notes, "Rothschild has no fixed address."

Mississippi Woman Pleads Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud. The AP (2/6) reports, "A Gulfport woman pleaded guilty to hurricane disaster-relief fraud and faces five years in prison, the U.S. attorney's office said Monday. Amanda Rettig will be sentenced April 25 and could also be fined up to $250,000. She pleaded guilty to filing a false claim with the Federal Emergency Management Agency saying her property was damaged by Hurricane Katrina." The AP notes, "She received $22,253.23, a statement from U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said."

Suspect In Boys' Abduction Charged With Molestation. USA Today (2/6, Keen) reports from Clayton, MO, "Michael Devlin, who has been accused of kidnapping two Missouri boys who were found last month, was charged Monday with molesting the teenagers." USA continues, "St. Louis County prosecutor Robert McCulloch charged Devlin, 41, with 71 counts: two kidnapping charges and the rest for forcible sodomy. Each charge is a felony punishable by up to life in prison. He said Devlin was charged with 17 counts of forcible sodomy relating to an abduction last month and 52 more in a 2002 kidnapping. 'Devlin acknowledged committing these acts,' McCulloch said." USA adds, "Following his department's policy of not naming victims of sexual abuse, McCulloch did not name the teens. He noted that their identities 'are not a national secret.' … Ben Ownby, 13, of Beaufort, Mo., was kidnapped on Jan. 8. Shawn Hornbeck, 15, disappeared in 2002 in Richwoods, Mo. Both were found inside Devlin's apartment in Kirkwood, Mo., on Jan. 12. Devlin was charged last month with kidnapping in each boy's home county and pleaded not guilty. Monday's charges were filed in the county where Devlin lived."

States Consider Changes To Police Lineups. The Christian Science Monitor (2/6, Jonsson) reports from Atlanta, "More than two decades ago, a sexual-assault victim from Sandy Springs, Ga., pointed to a picture of her attacker in a photo lineup. … 'From zero to 100 percent, how sure are you?' a detective asked. … 'I'm 120 percent sure,' the woman said, as stated in court testimony. … It now appears that she was 100 percent wrong, according to the Fulton County district attorney. The result of DNA testing led to the release of Willie 'Pete' Williams on Jan. 23 after nearly 22 years in a south Georgia prison for a crime he did not commit. Her mistake and his exoneration have revived a debate about the accuracy of eyewitness identifications – and their central role in persuading juries to convict. … But even as a handful of police departments from Boston to Minneapolis have voluntarily changed lineup procedures to help reduce such tragic errors, resistance to top-down reform from the majority of American police chiefs and prosecutors is pushing the debate into the legislative chamber. Last week, Georgia introduced a bill that would scrap the side-by-side police lineup, and would instead require police departments to present suspects one by one – either in person or by photo. Georgia joins Texas, New Mexico, West Virginia, and Vermont, which have similar bills pending." The Monitor adds, "Some experts argue that the new procedure limits inaccurate 'relative judgments' that victims can make during a lineup. But police counter that they do not want to be forced to use a specific procedure that they say would undermine proven techniques detectives use. … Since 1992, 194 people have been exonerated on the basis of DNA evidence, and some 75 percent of the convictions involved at least one faulty eyewitness identification, according to the Innocence Project, which works to clear those who are falsely imprisoned. A separate study published by the University of Michigan in 2004 found that 90 percent of mistakes that led to false convictions in rape cases were caused by eyewitness errors."

Videographer Nears Jail Record For Resisting Grant Jury. The New York Times (2/6, McKinley) reports from San Francisco, "A freelance videographer who refused to cooperate with a grand jury investigation will become the longest incarcerated journalist in modern American history on Tuesday. The freelancer, Josh Wolf, will pass Vanessa Leggett, an investigator and a journalist who served 168 days in 2001 and 2002 for refusing to surrender information in a murder case." The Times continues, "Mr. Wolf, 24, has been in prison since August, with a brief break in September related to his appeal, after refusing to cooperate with a grand jury investigation of an anticapitalist protest in 2005 in which a police officer here was injured and a squad car was slightly damaged by a small explosive device. … Prosecutors have demanded that Mr. Wolf give them his raw video, some of which he has posted on his Web site, www.joshwolf.net, as well as testify about the protesters seen on the tape for an investigation into possible charges, including arson. … 'Wolf videotaped a public demonstration where there may have been an attempt to set a police car ablaze and where a San Francisco police officer's skull was fractured when he was hit from behind by a demonstrator,' said Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the United States attorney for the Northern District of California." The Times notes, "Mr. Macaulay cited six federal decisions in the government's favor, including one last week that denied a request for a new hearing. … 'This office has issued a lawful subpoena for legitimate investigative purposes,' he said. … Mr. Wolf says he is protecting his sources. He remains behind bars even as the United States attorney who had him held, Kevin V. Ryan, has said he is stepping down and the San Francisco district attorney has dismissed the lone remaining criminal case involving the protest. … Mr. Wolf could stay jailed until the term of the grand jury ends in July. … The jailing has prompted outcries by advocates for freedom of the press who say it seems out of proportion to the scale of the investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0128014

New Jersey Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Distribution. The Trenton Times (2/6, Shea) reports, "A former West Windsor man pleaded guilty in federal court yesterday to one count of receiving and distributing child pornography on the Internet. Mark Wasco, 46, was charged in March 2006 with possessing child pornography after an FBI agent and a New Jersey State Police investigator searched his home and computers and found numerous images of children engaged in sex." The Times notes, "The complaint also alleges that Wasco, at one point, posed as a teenage boy to solicit images of children using the Web site MySpace.com, and admitted to the ploy."

FBI Child Sex Sting Snares New York Elementary School Teacher. The Buffalo News (2/3, Herbeck, Pasciak) reported, "An elementary school teacher from Frontier School District is accused of using the Internet to arrange a sexual liaison with a 14-year-old boy." Kollin Roy King "is also a longtime Boy Scout volunteer who was scheduled to become director of Camp Scouthaven this summer, overseeing a program for boys in first to fifth grades who attend camp with their parents. The 'boy' who led to King's arrest was actually an undercover FBI agent, who arranged a meeting at a Cheektowaga restaurant. A team of agents arrested King when he showed up." The News noted FBI spokesman Paul M. Moskal said on Friday, "We see these sting operations on television all the time. The public is well aware that we have undercover agents on the Internet. And yet, people keep doing it. This kind of criminal activity seems to get more and more prevalent."

The AP (2/3, Thompson) reported, "When authorities asked King what he would have done had two boys arrived at the restaurant, King replied, 'I hope nothing would have happened,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Allison Gioia said. But King later acknowledged that it was not the first such meeting he had arranged, and that he had engaged in sexual activity with a 16-year-old boy he met on the Internet in a park and in his apartment, Gioia said. Other scheduled meetings never came to fruition, King told authorities, because the minors did not show up or the meeting location was fictitious."

Study Finds Identity Fraud Down Since 2003. The New York Times (2/6, Leland) reports, "The number of Americans who are victims of identity fraud has declined steadily since 2003, according to a new survey sponsored by credit-card and financial services companies. Last year, 3.7 percent of people surveyed said someone had stolen their identity in the previous 12 months, down from 4.7 percent in 2003, according to the report." The Times continues, "The study found that the total losses from the crime fell last year to $49 billion from the 2005 level of $56 billion. The thieves either used the victims' existing bank or credit card accounts or opened new ones. … The survey, based on telephone interviews with 5,000 adults, was conducted by Javelin Strategy & Research, a data research firm, and was sponsored by Visa, Wells Fargo and CheckFree. The margin of sampling error is below plus or minus one percentage point for the crimes' prevalence." The Times adds, "The findings contradict public perceptions that identity fraud is proliferating out of control, said James Van Dyke, president and founder of Javelin. 'For years identity fraud has been reported as the nation's fastest growing crime, with the assumption that the numbers would keep going up,' Mr. Van Dyke said. 'We find it's not the case. The trend is going down.'" The Times notes, "Because the survey relied on people's accounts of whether they had been victims, it does not measure 'synthetic identity theft,' in which criminals fabricate identities using names, addresses, Social Security numbers and other information that may or may or may not correspond to real people. A 2005 analysis by ID Analytics, a financial industry security firm, found that synthetic identity theft was more common than 'true-name' identity theft. … As in past years, the Javelin survey found that individuals whose identities were stolen bore less than 10 percent of the loss from the crimes."

DOJ_NMG_0128015

New DC Police Chief Challenged By Rise In Homicides. The Washington Times (2/6, Taylor) reports, :A recent series of homicides will provide an early test for acting Metropolitan Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier as she faces D.C. Council confirmation hearings scheduled for next month, say some residents and council members. … 'I certainly think the way a city responds to a spike in homicides is an important indicator,' said council member Phil Mendelson, at-large Democrat and chairman of the Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary, which will hold the hearing. 'It gives important insight into how the new administration will deal with violent crimes.'" The Times continues, "The number of homicides this year in the District as of yesterday was 17, the same as last year at this time. Among them was the series of four killings in less than five hours the weekend of Jan. 27-28. Police have made an arrest in one of the cases, and Chief Lanier announced initiatives to aggressively canvass neighborhoods in the 48 hours after a homicide and to target violent criminals wanted on fugitive warrants." The Times adds, "Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, a Democrat, replaced Chief Charles H. Ramsey shortly after being elected in November, in part to implement more community policing in the department, which has 3,800 officers and a budget of about $430 million. Chief Lanier officially took over Jan. 2. … Mary Cheh, Ward 3 Democrat, said she was 'excited' about Chief Lanier's appointment, but added she has some issues that need to be addressed."

Barry Faces Possible Revocation Of Probation. The Washington Post (2/6, Cauvin) reports, "Nearly a year after he agreed to follow the law and pay overdue taxes dating back several years, the former four-term mayor has not only flouted a plea agreement but has failed to file tax returns for 2005, prosecutors say." The Post continues, "Now, the U.S. attorney's office, which did not oppose probation for Barry when he was sentenced in March, wants the federal judge in the case to put him in prison. … 'The Court's patience should be at an end,' Assistant U.S. Attorneys James W. Cooper and Thomas E. Zeno wrote in a motion to Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson, adding that Barry 'continues to flout' city and federal tax laws." The Post adds, "Under sentencing guidelines, Barry could have faced 12 to 18 months in prison for failure to file a federal income tax return and failure to make a District of Columbia return. Now that prison time could be back on the table if the judge decides that Barry isn't living up to his agreement with prosecutors and his promises to the court. … And that may only be the beginning of his problems in the case. In November, the Internal Revenue Service began garnishing Barry's city council salary because he failed to follow through with a payment plan for the taxes he owed for years 1999 through 2004. … Frederick D. Cooke Jr., Barry's attorney, said that he has not talked to his client about the problem with his 2005 taxes. But Cooke said he expects to file court papers challenging the prosecutors' bid to revoke Barry's probation. Cooke said he expected a hearing in the next month."

The Washington Times (2/6, Mcelhatton) reports, "The defense attorney for D.C. Council member Marion Barry said yesterday that he is meeting with the former mayor this week to decide how best to respond to a recent request by federal prosecutors to revoke Mr. Barry's probation in a criminal tax case. … If the motion is granted, the revocation could put Mr. Barry back behind bars more than 15 years after he served six months on drug charges. … 'Just because they write it doesn't mean it's true,' attorney Frederick D. Cooke Jr. said of the court filing last week in which prosecutors stated that Mr. Barry had failed to pay his 2005 taxes." The Times continues, "Mr. Barry received three years of probation last year after pleading guilty to failing to file returns on more than $500,000 in income from 1999 to 2004. … 'I haven't had a chance to draft a response because I have to talk to my client and gather information,' Mr. Cooke said. … In exchange for the guilty plea, prosecutors last year agreed to take no position on Mr. Barry's request for probation at his sentencing last year. …

DOJ_NMG_0128016

Now, prosecutors say, Mr. Barry hasn't lived up to his end of the deal."

CIVIL LAW:

Jury Finds FBI Retaliated Against Whistle-blowing Agent. The AP (2/6) reports from Minneapolis, "A jury awarded $565,000 in damages on Monday to a former FBI agent, agreeing that Jane Turner's superiors retaliated against her for filing a sex-discrimination complaint against her supervisor. … 'Today is a true vindication for whistleblowers in the FBI,' Turner said after the jury returned its verdict in federal court." The AP continues, "Turner retired in 2003, amid the pressure of both her discrimination case and a separate dispute that arose after she accused colleagues of stealing a Tiffany crystal globe from the World Trade Center ruins. … The jury awarded her $60,000 in damages for lost wages and $505,000 for emotional distress. One of her attorneys, Robert Hill, said the judge will have to reduce the $505,000 to $300,000 because of a statutory cap on nonmonetary damages, so she'll get $360,000. … Still, Hill said, it's believed to be the largest jury verdict for retaliation in the history of the FBI." The AP adds, "The defense team's jury consultant, Nikki Carlson, said it was clear that the jury didn't buy the government's defense, which attacked Turner's credibility and job performance. She said one juror told her that the two jurors seated either side of her wrote 'LIAR' on their notepads and stopped taking notes when one of Turner's superiors was testifying."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/6, Browning, 395K) reports, "Federal jurors hugged former FBI agent Jane Turner on Monday after awarding her $565,000 in damages and finding that the agency had retaliated against her for filing a 1998 sex-discrimination complaint. 'I think you were the very best FBI agent,' juror Mashima Dickens told Turner, who investigated child sex-abuse crimes. 'Looking at the way you were treated, I just said you were screwed left and right,' Dickens said, tears rolling down her cheeks. … But Turner said she could never repair the damage done to her by her colleagues in the FBI, an organization she had dreamed of joining since she read Nancy Drew detective novels at age 12. 'I'm dead in their eyes because I betrayed them. And that's what's so sad,' Turner said." The Star Tribune notes, "Records show that she received superior or exceptional job ratings until after her supervisor, Craig Welken, was interviewed in 1999 about a sex-discrimination complaint she had filed the previous year."

Trial Begins Over Fatal Crash Of Small Aircraft. The Chicago Tribune (2/6, O'Connor) reports, "Nearly seven years to the day after a midair collision killed WGN radio personality Bob Collins and two others, a trial opened in federal court Monday to decide who was at fault for the crash of the two small aircraft." The Tribune continues, "Government lawyers laid the blame on Collins, while attorneys for the three victims said the collision was caused by an air traffic controller and was ultimately the responsibility of the Federal Aviation Administration." The Tribune adds, "Collins, 57, had been Chicago's top-ranked morning-radio personality for 14 years when his Moravan Z242L struck a Cessna 172P as the two aircraft approached the Waukegan Regional Airport on the hazy afternoon of Feb. 8, 2000. … Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of the Midwestern Regional Medical Center, killing him and passenger Herman Luscher, 58. The Cessna's pilot, Sharon Hock, 31, a flight attendant who was on her second solo flight, died when her plane crashed on a Zion street. … No one on the ground was injured, but the hospital sustained $28 million in property damage and lost business." The Tribune notes, "The bench trial before U.S. District Judge John Darrah, expected to last about two weeks, opened with the federal government as the lone defendant after Midwest Air Traffic Control Inc., which operates the Waukegan airport's tower, admitted liability Monday. … But lawyers for survivors of the three victims, including Collins' widow, Christine, contend the FAA controlled the Waukegan airport's operations and bears the responsibility for the collision. … Jill Dahlmann Rosa, a Justice Department lawyer, said Collins set up the collision by misreporting his location to the tower, misleading Hock and the air traffic controller. … Collins' conduct 'fell below the standard of care of a reasonable pilot,' she said."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Expert Will Not Testify At Mississippi Voting Rights Trial. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (2/6, Gates) reports, "The Noxubee County case has apparently ended without court resuming after the defense decided against calling an expert witness to testify. … An out-of-state voting rights expert had been scheduled to testify Feb. 15." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "The lawsuit, the first of its kind in the United States filed by the U.S. Department of Justice, accuses black political leaders in Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters. … The three-week trial in U.S. District Court concluded last Wednesday, with the exception of the expert coming to Jackson to testify." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "The Justice Department's lawsuit mostly accuses Noxubee County Democratic Committee Chairman Ike Brown and people working in concert with him of discriminating against white voters. … U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee set March 26 as the deadline for both sides to submit final written briefs in the case. He will then make a ruling after that time."

DOJ_NMG_0128017

FBI To Give Update On Civil Rights Cold Case Initiative. The Athens Banner-Herald (2/6, Quigley) reports, "FBI officials will hold a news conference later this month to give an update on the bureau's so-called 'cold case initiative' in the Moore's Ford lynching and 51 other unsolved race-related murders, said Nancy Nelson, section chief of the public corruption/civil rights section of the FBI's Criminal Investigation Division. The bureau has been reviewing the cold cases to see if new technology…and a new willingness by witnesses to come forward, will allow federal and state agents to give some conclusion to the decades-old and often forgotten murders, Nelson said. 'If we can get prosecutions out of it, terrific,' but agents mostly are seeking resolution for the victims' families, she said." The Banner-Herald notes, "In 2005, the Moore's Ford Memorial Committee sent letters to several members of Congress…urging them to ask the FBI to 'assign two agents to (the Moore's Ford) case," and the "committee also sent a letter to FBI officials asking agents to reopen the case. 'The letter certainly proved useful in bringing the case to the forefront,' said Stephen Emmett, spokesman for the FBI office in Atlanta."

Rights Groups Warn Of Increase In White Supremacist Activity. The AP (2/6, Texeira) reports, "Huge street protests against tougher immigration laws made millions of immigrants more visible and powerful in the United States last year, but, according to some rights groups, they seem to have revived a hateful counter force: white supremacists." The AP continues, "Groups linked to the Ku Klux Klan, skinheads and neo-Nazis grew significantly more active, holding more rallies, distributing leaflets and increasing their presence on the Internet - much of it focused on stirring anti-immigrant sentiment, a new report released by the Anti-Defamation League says. … 'Extremist groups are good at seizing on whatever the hot button is of the day and twisting the message to get new members,' Deborah M. Lauter, ADL Civil Rights director, said Monday. 'This one seems to be taking hold with more of mainstream America than we'd like to see.'" The AP adds, "Old Klan chapters have been revived and new ones started throughout the South, historically the heart of the group, and in other places such as Michigan, Iowa and New Jersey, says the report, which was scheduled for official release Tuesday. … Last May in Alabama, an anti-immigration rally included slogans such as, 'Let's get rid of the Mexicans!' according to the document, titled 'Ku Klux Klan Rebounds.' … 'The Klan is increasingly cooperating with other extremist groups and Neo-Nazi groups,' Lauter said. 'That's a new phenomenon.'" The AP notes, "Between 2000 and 2005, hate groups mushroomed 33 percent and Klan chapters by 63 percent, according to Mark Potok, director of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks hate crimes. … Precise data are difficult to pin down, but Potok's group counts as many as 150 Klan chapters with up to 8,000 members across the United States, still well below a peak of 4 million in the 1920s. More than 800 hate groups exist around the country, Southern Poverty research shows."

NAACP Calls For Limits On "No-Knock" Warrants After Atlanta Shooting. The AP (2/6, Gross) reports from Atlanta, "A local chapter of a U.S. civil rights group on Monday called on police and politicians to limit the use of 'no-knock' warrants in the wake of the death of an elderly woman shot by police during such a search." The AP continues, "The Rev. R.L. White, Jr., chapter president for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, unveiled a list of recommendations the group compiled after a December community forum prompted by the shooting. … 'This is of utmost urgency,' said White, speaking at the chapter's Atlanta headquarters. 'The situation that happened last year was only the tip of the iceberg.'" The AP adds, "The NAACP chapter also called on police to require officers to receive sensitivity training, for the Atlanta Police Department to launch a goodwill initiative in the city's low-income, high-crime neighborhoods and for a citizens review board to be created to review incidents like the Nov. 21 shooting. … Kathryn Johnston died and three officers were wounded in the shootout during a no-knock search for drugs in Johnston's northwest Atlanta home. Family members say Johnston was 92 years old; authorities said she was 88. … When officers raided her home without first announcing their presence, police say Johnston fired a handgun before officers returned fire, killing her. … Narcotics officers said they were told by a paid informant that cocaine was being sold from Johnston's home. … No cocaine was found in the home, and a man who claims he was the paid informant later said he was told by officers to lie about buying drugs at the home." The AP notes, "The FBI and Georgia Bureau of investigation are investigating the incident at the request of Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington."

DOJ_NMG_0128018

WPost Columnist Decries Anti-Semitism Charge. In a column for the Washington Post (2/6, A17), Richard Cohen writes that "it comes as a surprise that has the force of a mugging to be accused of aiding the very people I so hate -- of being an abettor of something called 'The New Anti-Semitism.' … The accusation comes from the pen of Indiana University's Alvin H. Rosenfeld, whose report ' "Progressive" Jewish Thought and the New Anti-Semitism' was published by the prestigious American Jewish Committee and given great play in the New York Times. Certain prominent American Jews -- the historian Tony Judt, the playwright Tony Kushner, the poet Adrienne Rich and I, among others -- were charged with aiding anti-Semitism with our writings. We were, in other words, enablers. As if that was not bad enough, Shulamit Reinharz, a Brandeis University professor and a columnist for a Jewish weekly, dispensed totally with Rosenfeld's qualification. She told the Boston Globe that all of us mentioned in the AJC report are just plain anti-Semites." Cohen continues, "At times, I have written coldly and provocatively about Israel, maybe once or twice in anger. This, in turn, has angered some readers who knew what I was thinking but not what I was feeling -- that, at bottom, I had a strong emotional attachment to Israel. … But having said that, let me wonder about those American Jews who interpret criticism of Israel as anti-Semitism or something that abets it. The charge has been leveled at Jimmy Carter over his recent book, 'Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid.' I, too, didn't like the book. I, too, found the book hostile, oddly unbalanced and chillingly lacking in historical context -- not just a near-total neglect of the Holocaust but also no mention of pre-1948 Arab pogroms, such as the 1929 murder of 67 Jews in Hebron. Still, Carter's overall point about Israeli occupation of the West Bank is apt, and calling him all sorts of names does not change that. The former president has in effect embraced the current, ahistorical context for Israel. For many, it is no longer the orphaned waif of the Holocaust but the bastard child of Western colonialism." Cohen concludes, "It's sad that the American Jewish Committee commissioned and published Rosenfeld's report. I can't imagine what good will come out of it. Instead, it has given license to the most intolerant and narrow-minded of Israel's defenders so that, as the AJC concedes in my case, any veering from orthodoxy is met with censure or, from someone like Reinharz, the most powerful of all post-Holocaust condemnations -- anti-Semite -- is diluted beyond recognition. The offense here is not just to a handful of relatively unimportant writers, but to memory itself. .. Shame."

ANTITRUST:

Smithfield Complies With DOJ Request For Information On Premium Deal. The AP (2/6) reports, "Smithfield Foods Inc. said Monday it has complied with a Department of Justice antitrust division request for information related to the pork processor's acquisition of rival Premium Standard Farms Inc." The AP continues, "Smithfield said it plans to acquire the pork producer for $674 million in cash and stock and assume $117 million in debt. … Smithfield said it hopes the antitrust division can complete its review in enough time for the deal to close in the first quarter of 2007." The AP adds, "A Premium Standard Farms shareholders meeting has been scheduled for Feb. 23 to vote on the deal."

Firms Trying To Beat Antitrust Clock Find Mixed Results. The Deal (2/6, Lindell) reports, "Companies trying to hasten the antitrust reviews of their deals are increasingly deciding to hit the reset button on the regulatory clock, a maneuver aimed at saving time and money on government reviews." The Deal continues, "Although the strategy is becoming increasingly popular, it's not a sure thing. … Two recent deals indicate that refiling produces mixed results. … Express Scripts Inc. Wednesday announced it was pulling and refiling its premerger notification, in the hope of evading a second request from the Federal Trade Commission regarding its hostile bid for rival pharmacy benefit manager Caremark Inc. But Genentech Inc., which earlier pulled and refiled its paperwork regarding its purchase of Tanox Inc., announced Monday it will have to comply with a longer, costly review." The Deal adds, "While the government hasn't historically kept track of corporate decisions to pull and refile merger notices, it is starting to, and on Wednesday a Department of Justice official said those corporate moves to pull and refile seem be increasing. About two-thirds of those cases have successfully skirted a government demand for documents and data, known as a second request for information. … The process of notifying the government's antitrust agency of merger plans and getting approval to proceed despite competitive issues has become an increasingly elaborate dance under the rubric of the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antirust Improvements Act of 1976." The Deal notes, "Tom Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the antirust division at DOJ, and FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras have both repeatedly said they are trying to minimize the cost and time burden of the merger review process, and that as a part of that effort, both agencies are aggressively examining deals during the initial 30 days they are permitted to look over a deal before having to issue a second request. … But sometimes, one month just isn't enough for antitrust lawyers to collect, review, deliver and explain the data fast enough. During that same time, staff lawyers at the agencies also need to review information that may include sophisticated economic data, consider the implications and evaluate the merger's competitive impact in industries that may be new, arcane or rapidly evolving. … As a result, the staff decision to issue a second request for information can prolong the review, and dramatically increase the price tag on the merger review process. … But a second request may not mean the government is really interested in blocking the deal. During the past seven years, 265 cases at DOJ received second requests, according to Bob Kramer, a senior staff official, but only 104 of those cases saw enforcement actions, such as consent decrees involving divestitures or licensing agreements. And only four of those cases actually proceeded to trial."

DOJ_NMG_0128019

FTC Reaffirms Antitrust Ruling Against Rambus. The AP (2/6) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission made final its ruling that the memory chip designer Rambus violated antitrust laws, imposing limits on the royalties the company can charge." The AP continues, "Wall Street was bracing for a potentially harsher order than the one the commission released Monday, and Rambus stock rose sharply. … Still, the final opinion provides the sharpest criticism to date of Rambus, and legal experts said it would set an important precedent for the broader technology industry." The AP adds, "The order said Rambus violated federal antitrust laws 'by deliberately engaging in a pattern of anticompetitive acts to deceive an industrywide standard-setting organization.' … Thomas R. Lavelle, senior vice president and general counsel for Rambus, said the company was disappointed with the opinion and would appeal." The AP notes, "The case hinges on whether Rambus illegally obtained a monopoly in the 1990s when it secured patents for two popular types of memory used in personal computers. Rambus was accused of failing to disclose to an engineering council that its patents had been incorporated into an industry standard regarding memory technology. … An administrative law judge dismissed the complaint in 2004, but the F.T.C. overturned that ruling in July 2006."

Market Watch (2/6, Andrejczak) reports, "Rambus, of Los Altos, Calif., said it plans to appeal the ruling that stems from government antitrust charges filed more than four years ago. … However, shares of Rambus surged 24% to $23.50 as the FTC remedy was deemed less severe than investors had expected." Market Watch continues, "The FTC issued its order on a 3-2 vote. Commissioners Pamela Jones Harbour and J. Thomas Rosch disagreed with parts of the remedy. … Importantly, one analyst said, the FTC order doesn't affect second-generation DDR and SDRAM memory-chip designs that Rambus has developed or other memory technologies that it's engineered. The order also didn't invalidate any Rambus patent."

USA Today (2/6, 3B, Iwata) reports, "In a statement, Rambus general counsel Tom Lavelle said the company will appeal the decision 'because we strongly disagree with a number of the commission's determinations.' Lavelle said that the FTC commission 'continues to ignore the extensive findings of fact' made earlier by FTC chief administrative law judge Stephen McGuire."

Beatles, Apple Near Settlement Of iTunes Dispute. The Financial Times (2/6, Waters, Tait, Terazono) reports, "The Beatles on Monday buried their latest trademark dispute with US technology company Apple, removing one of the obstacles to a potential deal that could bring the Fab Four's songs to the iTunes music store." The Times continues, "Bringing The Beatles to iTunes would open up a highly valued catalogue of songs and could represent a significant breakthrough for the entire digital music business, according to analysts. … However, others cautioned that personal and legal complications could still stand in the way of a deal."

DOJ_NMG_0128020

The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A7, Clark, Smith) reports, "The companies have long squabbled over the word Apple, with the Beatles' Apple Corps Ltd. objecting to the use of its trademarks by the Silicon Valley company. Under a new agreement announced yesterday, Apple Inc. will take over those trademarks, and license some of them back to Apple Corps, which agreed to drop its trademark-infringement litigation. Financial terms weren't disclosed. … Neither company answered the biggest question for music fans -- whether they will finally be able to buy Beatles recordings from Apple's iTunes music store and transfer those purchases to an iPod music player. The Beatles are the most prominent holdout from iTunes, and the companies have privately discussed licensing deals in the past, but nothing has materialized."

USA Today (2/6, Graham) reports, "The move clears the way to get the Beatles music available as digital downloads on Apple's popular iTunes Store, say Wall Street analysts." USA continues, "The Beatles are the 'most notable iTunes holdout,' says Gene Munster, an analyst at equity firm Piper Jaffray. 'Once the Beatles are in, this will lead to a chain reaction among other bands and movie studios. No one will want to be left out anymore.'" USA notes, "Besides the Beatles, Led Zeppelin, Radiohead, AC/DC, Kid Rock and Garth Brooks have declined to offer their music as digital downloads. Last year, Apple added movies to iTunes with films from Walt Disney and, more recently, Paramount Pictures. Studio holdouts include 20th Century Fox, NBC Universal, Sony Pictures, MGM and Warner Bros. … Munster predicts that Apple Inc. will officially announce the Beatles availability on iTunes within the next three months."

The New York Times (2/6, Flynn) reports, "The new agreement replaces one signed by the companies in 1991, when Apple Corps, which represents Paul McCartney; Ringo Starr; the estate of George Harrison; and Yoko Ono, the widow of John Lennon, moved to ensure that the computer company did not use the apple logo in the music business. The Apple Corps logo is a Granny Smith apple. The logo for Apple Inc. is an apple with a bite taken out of it. … But things changed in 2003 when Apple Computer, as it was known until it dropped 'Computer' from its name last month, began signing deals with record labels to distribute music online through iTunes. … Apple Computer had approached the British company in hopes of distributing the Beatles' music on iTunes, but Apple Corps instead accused the technology company of breaching the 1991 contract, arguing that Apple was essentially entering the music business with its service. … The Beatles are considered the last major holdout from online downloading services like iTunes. Today, Beatles fans can play Beatles music on an iPod only by transferring the songs from a CD." The Times notes, "With the Beatles dispute behind it, Apple Inc. faces still another trademark battle: a lawsuit filed by Cisco Systems, the networking company, over the use of the iPhone brand. Cisco has said the two companies have been unable to reach an agreement over the name after several years of discussion." The Washington Post/AP (2/6, D2) also reports this story.

State Street To Purchase Investors Financial. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, C3, Levitz) reports from Boston, "Bulking up in a bid to stay independent, securities-processing company State Street Corp. said it plans to buy Investors Financial Services Corp. for $4.5 billion in stock to become a big player in the hedge-fund realm." The Journal continues, "For years, State Street has prospered here as a leader in the unglamorous business of offering back-office custody work, such as portfolio accounting and issuing monthly statements to institutional investors such as mutual funds. … But the company, which has in the past faced unwanted takeover interest, now grapples with intensified competition in a rapidly consolidating industry in which big players hope to achieve economies of scale through acquisitions." The Journal adds, "To shore up its position, State Street is buying fast-growing Investors Financial, a smaller Boston neighbor that provides similar investment services to customers, including hedge funds -- lightly regulated private investment partnerships that cater largely to institutions and wealthy people. Financial-services companies are eager to cater to these sophisticated and fast-moving clients that have exploded in popularity. The two companies say the deal will create the No. 1 administrator of hedge-fund assets, in terms of assets under custody."

Mills Corp. Receives Another Buyout Offer. The Washington Post (2/6, D3, Hedgpeth) reports, "The nation's largest mall owner and a hedge fund yesterday offered to buy the financially troubled Mills Corp. for $1.6 billion, exceeding the $1.35 billion offered by a Canadian company in January." The Post continues, "The latest offer for Mills of Chevy Chase, which owns about 40 malls nationwide, including Potomac Mills and Arundel Mills, was made by Simon Property Group and the hedge fund Farallon Capital Management. Simon is the country's largest real estate investment trust, by market value, and Farallon is Mills's largest shareholder." The Post adds, "Brookfield Asset Management, a Canadian investment company and owner of the World Financial Center in New York, made the earlier offer, which Mills accepted. … Simon, of Indianapolis, owns 285 properties across the country, including Bowie Town Center and Leesburg Corner Premium Outlet. Farallon of San Francisco manages $26 billion of equity capital." The Post notes, "Simon said its cash tender offer would allow Mills shareholders to get their cash as much as six months earlier than they would under Brookfield's deal. … In a statement, Mills said that it would 'promptly consider the proposal' from Simon but that the 'current merger agreement with Brookfield remains in effect.'"

DOJ_NMG_0128021

The Washington Times (2/6, Haberkorn) reports, "What makes Mills so valuable, despite recent revelations that executives may have mismanaged funds and that it was running out of money, is its 38 shopping centers across the country. … Locally, it owns Lakeforest Mall in Gaithersburg, Potomac Mills and Potomac Town Center in Prince William County, Marley Station in Glen Burnie, Md., and Arundel Mills in Hanover, Md." The Times adds, "Simon's offer is cash, meaning shareholders could receive payment six months before they would under a Brookfield deal, the company said. … Simon Property Group is an Indianapolis real estate investment trust that owns the Fashion Centre at Pentagon City, Bowie Town Center, Leesburg (Va.) Corner Premium Outlets and St. Charles (Md.) Towne Center. … Simon said its experience would make it most qualified to run the Mills properties."

Icahn Seeks Takeover Of Lear. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (2/6, D02) reports, "Carl C. Icahn, the billionaire activist investor, offered to pay $2.31 billion for the 84 percent of auto-parts maker Lear Corp. that he does not already own." Bloomberg continues, "Lear and Icahn's American Real Estate Partners discussed the proposal over the weekend. Lear said in a regulatory filing yesterday that it was trying to reach an agreement. The cash offer of $36 a share from Icahn, the company's biggest shareholder, was criticized by its third-largest investor as too low. … Richard Pzena, whose New York investment group Pzena Investment Management owned 7.48 million, or 11 percent, of Lear's shares in November, sent a letter to the non-management directors expressing 'alarm' about the offer. 'To claim today that $36 is a fair price is quite disingenuous,' Pzena said in the letter. 'It is our fear that the company's management may have lost sight of the long-term value inherent in the company and that their personal interest in the transaction may create an inherent conflict.' … Pzena said that his staff and Icahn's staff met in November to talk about Icahn's increased stake in Lear and that analysts from both groups agreed on a valuation of $60 a share."

EU Judge To Make Microsoft Ruling By September. The AP (2/6) reports, "The judge due to rule on Microsoft Corp.'s appeal against the European Commission's antitrust order said Monday he hoped to publish his decision before he leaves office in September." The AP continues, "Bo Vesterdorf, the president of the Court of First Instance, refused to give a precise deadline for his ruling. … 'Obviously we would do our very best to get the case out as soon as at all possible,' he told reporters at an Informa legal conference in Brussels. 'It's a very big case.'" The AP adds, "Microsoft is challenging the European Union's 2004 antitrust order, which found the software maker broke competition law and fined it a record 497 million euros ($613 million). … To remedy market harms, the EU ordered the company to offer a version of its Windows computer operating system without Microsoft's media player software. The EU also ordered Microsoft to share communications code and information with rivals to help them develop server software that worked smoothly with the ubiquitous Windows platform."

ENVIRONMENT:

Pelosi, Dingell Reach Agreement On Global Warming Committee. The Hill (2/6, Kaplan) reports, "Ending a three-week long turf war, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) have reached an agreement on the parameters of the select committee on global warming. In a new letter to Pelosi, Dingell wrote that the select committee has no legislative authority and that the panel will expire on Oct. 30, 2008." He "wrote that he has 'assurances' from Pelosi that his committee will get first dibs to call witnesses where there could be potential conflict and that Pelosi will be consulted 'before the exercise of any compulsory powers by the select committee to ensure the appropriate coordination of efforts.'" The Hill adds, "The negotiations between Pelosi and Dingell to establish the panel have overshadowed difficulties Democrats face drafting a comprehensive energy bill. While they have overcome one turf battle, they probably will face many more regional and ideological disputes."

DOJ_NMG_0128022

China, UN Plan Beijing Carbon Trading Exchange. The Financial Times (2/6, Dickie, Harvey) reports China and the UN "are working to set up a carbon trading exchange in Beijing – a move that could establish the Chinese capital as an important centre for the multibillion-dollar global trade in carbon credits, according to the UN's top official in China." If successful, the exchange "would compete with private sector carbon exchanges established in Europe and the US, and would help to open up further the lucrative Chinese market in carbon credits."

WSJournal Blasts California "Nuisance" Suit Against Automakers. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/6, A16, 2.04M) writes that "it ought to be obvious that the absolute last branch of government that should set climate policy is the courts. As usual, California Attorney General Jerry Brown has his own ideas. At issue is a federal lawsuit filed last September by Mr. Brown's predecessor, Bill Lockyer, asking for billions of dollars worth of damages to be levied against six automakers...because their products allegedly create a common-law 'nuisance' by contributing to global warming." Brown "has decided to pursue the case, which he says rests on 'sound legal doctrine.'" There is "scarcely any economic activity imaginable that doesn't somehow affect the balance of greenhouse gases, which is why a 'nuisance' complaint against any single industry doesn't make sense. It's also why the judiciary has so far wisely refused to get drawn into this kind of blame game." The Journal concludes, "If environmentalists want the U.S. political system to do something about CO2 emissions, a good place to start would be convincing a majority of Americans that they are serious people with serious concerns. California's attempt to single out automakers -- which gives a whole new meaning to the term 'junk lawsuit' -- is not helping their case."

Applebaum Says Carbon Tax, Not Kyoto, Is Solution To Climate Change. In her Washington Post (2/6, A17, 690K) column, Anne Applebaum criticizes the Kyoto treaty, writing, "The limiting of fossil fuels cannot be carried out with an unenforceable international regime, using complicated regulations that the United Nations does not have the staff or the mandate to supervise, with the help of a treaty that effectively penalizes those who bother to abide by it." The solution to climate change "is grippingly unoriginal, requires no special knowledge of economics and is easy for any country to implement. It's called a carbon tax, and it should be applied across the board to every industry that uses fossil fuels, every home or building with a heating system, every motorist, and every public transportation system. Immediately, it would produce a wealth of innovations to save fuel, as well as new incentives to conserve." It "would produce a big chunk of money that could be used for other things." And "users of the tax would suddenly find themselves less dependent on Persian Gulf oil or Russian natural gas, too." Moreover, "the successful use of carbon taxes does not require 'American leadership,' or a U.N. committee, or a complicated international effort of any kind. It can be done country by country."

Energy Department Considers Ethanol Reserve. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, Jackson Randall, Heinsohn, 2.04M) reports, "As the U.S. Energy Department looks to expand the nation's emergency oil stockpile, officials are also considering whether it would be beneficial to create an ethanol reserve. 'Perhaps we should be thinking about having an ethanol reserve,' Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman told reporters Monday during a press briefing to discuss DOE's fiscal year 2008 budget proposal." Bodman "said there are several ideas being discussed as the Bush administration moves to expand the strategic petroleum reserve. The plan is to double the size of the oil stockpile, increasing it from its current capacity of 727 million barrels to 1.5 billion barrels in the next two decades. Administration officials are also considering whether there should be storage sites built in areas outside of the Gulf Coast, Mr. Bodman said." The Journal adds, "Aside from considering new locations for SPR sites, another question on the table is 'should we have an expansion in the type of fuel,' Mr. Bodman said, noting that the idea might have merit given the administration's newly announced goal of reducing gasoline use 20% in the next 10 years."

NYTimes Says US Needs To Reduce Appetite For Corn, Oil. The New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The current price of corn is $3.23 a bushel, more than half again what it was a year ago, and beginning to bring to mind the record $5.545 a bushel set in July 1996. There are many reasons for this price spurt. The ethanol boom has created a sharp new demand for corn. The Department of Agriculture revised its estimate of the 2006 corn harvest downward by some 200 million bushels because of weather and other factors. There is also a smaller corn reserve on hand than usual — the smallest in a decade — which parallels shortages around the world." Gratifying our "two major appetites — cheap food and cheap gas — used to seem easy because both corn and oil were abundant. Cheap oil helped keep corn prices low because it cost farmers less to run their tractors and combines." But "no matter how high prices go, what will need to change isn't the amount of corn acreage available or even the size of the enormous harvests we are already getting. What will need to change is the size of our appetites."

DOJ_NMG_0128023

Asarco Claims Mexican Owners Illegally Stripped Company's Assets. The Tacoma (WA) News Tribune (2/6, Blumenthal) reports, "One-time mining giant Asarco, charging that its Mexican owner stole its most valuable asset and left it to face $7 billion worth of environmental and asbestos-related claims, is asking a federal bankruptcy judge to void the transfer of two Peruvian copper mines to Grupo Mexico, S.A. de C.V." The Tribune continues, "The stakes are high for U.S. taxpayers, who would be stuck with the tab for cleaning up nearly 100 contaminated sites nationwide where Asarco once operated. If the court agrees that the mines were 'fraudulently transferred,' Asarco could recover several billion dollars, by some estimates." The Tribune adds, "In a 23-page complaint filed late Friday in a Texas bankruptcy court, Asarco alleged that Grupo Mexico plotted to gain control of Asarco's 54.2 percent interest in the Peruvian mines. The complaint, which one lawyer in the case said reads like a 'legal potboiler,' charges that Grupo Mexico took control of the mines with the "actual intent to hinder, delay and or defraud" Asarco's creditors. … Grupo Mexico is owned by one of Mexico's richest families, the Larreas. The complaint alleges that another of Mexico's super rich, Carlos Slim, who owns and controls Inbursa, a Mexican bank, may have benefited from the deal. The complaint describes Slim as a 'close associate' of the Larrea family." The Tribune notes, "Asarco is assembling a reorganization plan and trying to emerge from bankruptcy. It is still wholly owned by a Grupo Mexico subsidiary, but under federal bankruptcy laws it's now responsible to its creditors rather than to its stockholders. … Asarco, a century-old mining, smelting and refining company that once was listed on the Fortune 500, filed for bankruptcy protection in 2005. It faces about $6 billion in environmental claims filed by the federal government and more than a dozen states. It also faces 95,000 asbestos-related claims that could be worth between $500 million and $1 billion. … The federal Environmental Protection Agency filed a $1.3 billion claim for cleanup of Superfund sites across the country. The federal departments of Agriculture and Interior, along with local governments, several Indian tribes and private parties, have also filed environmental claims. … Asarco has talked with state and federal lawyers about the possibility of settling the environmental claims, though there are no offers in the table."

Extremely Cold Weather Makes News. All three network newscasts last night led their broadcasts with stories about the cold winter weather. ABC World News (2/5, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) said, "Yes, it is February. And, yes, it is supposed to be cold. But this is ridiculous." ABC (Reynolds) said in some places "it's the coldest it's been…this decade. And it's likely that future winters will be compared to this one." The CBS Evening News (2/5, lead story, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "If you've been wondering what happened to winter, chances are you're getting your answer tonight," and NBC Nightly News (1/5, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) said "a kind of cold weather has descended across a large part of this country that is cold enough to now be dangerous."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Visits El Salvador To Coordinate Anti-Gang Activities. KBNT-TV (Univision), San Diego, CA (2/5, 11:18 p.m.) broadcasted (translated from Spanish), "From the US Justice Department, Alberto Gonzales was in El Salavador to meet with president Antonio Saco, and with officials from El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala. The meeting was to coordinate actions in the war against gangs. Gonzales' visit forms a union for Latin America, which includes visits to Argentina and Brazil. Felipe Calderon, president of Mexico, lost all political parties that surpass their differences and arrived to productive agreements for the country.

KWEX-TV, San Antonio, TX (2/5, 10:10 p.m.) and KDTV-TV, in San Francisco, Oakland and San Jose, CA also broadcasted this story.

DOJ_NMG_0128024

New Jersey Man Accused Of Leading Multimillion-Dollar Drug Network. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (2/6) reports a New Jersey man "was arrested Jan. 25 as the alleged ringleader of a multimillion-dollar narcotics network." Mohamed Hassanain "allegedly ran the drug ring from his home as well as his business, Lyons Avenue Auto Sales in Newark, said state police in New Jersey." The charges against Hassanain "stem from a six-month investigation led by New Jersey State Police and the Attorney General's Division of Criminal Justice, with assistance from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. The investigation, dubbed 'Operation Pandora,' determined the network allegedly sold 20,000 to 30,000 OxyContin and Percocet pills per week, most going to a distribution ring based in Bronx, N.Y., according to state police Col. Rick Fuentes."

Authorities Say California Man Attempted To Smuggle Meth Aboard Hawaiian Airlines Flight. In San Jose, the AP (2/6) reports an East Palo Alto man "allegedly tried to smuggle three pounds of methamphetamine in his cargo pants while trying to board a Hawaiian Airlines flight. Michael James Cade, 26, was charged Friday in U.S. District Court in San Jose with possession with intent to distribute at least 50 grams of methamphetamine. … While patting him down, a Transportation Security Administration agent 'felt a large bulk item in the front right pocket of Cade's cargo pants,' Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent Anthony Guzman wrote in a charging document." A test "concluded that the crystal-like substance was methamphetamine, Guzman wrote." The San Diego Union-Tribune used the AP story.

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/5, Lee) reported authorities "said they believe Cade was smuggling the drugs and, since he had only $10 with him, had hoped to be paid for the illicit cargo in his pants. Cade has previous convictions for felony theft, grand theft and narcotics possession, the affidavit said."

In New Jersey, Sentencing Of "Drug Kingpin" Expected Tomorrow. The Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger (2/6, Whelan) reports Hakeem Curry, "convicted by a jury last July of conspiracy, money laundering and drug trafficking, could face 30 years to life in prison under federal sentencing guidelines. … Curry's conviction was one of the most significant for federal law enforcement officials since they began investigating and prosecuting drug gang members as part of ongoing conspiracies. During an investigation that spanned more than a year, Drug Enforcement Administration agents built the case by secretly taping tens of thousands of phone calls of Curry and his associates." Prosecutors "said Curry's criminal organization pumped tens of millions of dollars of cocaine and heroin onto the streets in Essex and Union counties for more than a decade and arranged for the murders of a rival and another government witness slated to testify against one of Curry's allies." The Star-Ledger says Curry is set to be sentenced tomorrow.

South Carolina Judge Refuses To Suppress Evidence In Drug Conspiracy Case. The Spartanburg (SC) Herald Journal (2/6) reports a federal drug conspiracy case "involving hundreds of pounds of marijuana and more than 10 pounds of cocaine is headed to court this week for two men who have pleaded not guilty. Two women and 13 men in the Upstate have already pleaded guilty to charges including weapons violations and conspiracy to distribute cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana, but none have been sentenced." On Monday in Spartanburg, U.S. District Judge Henry Floyd "refused to suppress evidence gathered using a search warrant at the home of one of the men who will stand trial, Alviero Mesa-Lopez of Greer. While executing the search warrant at Mesa-Lopez's residence…authorities found 1,400 pounds of marijuana, several ounces of crystal methamphetamine [and] one kilogram of cocaine."

Attorneys For Accused Mexican Drug Kingpin May Try To Blame Brother. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/6, Soto) reports, "Defense lawyers for accused Tijuana drug cartel kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix hinted at a defense in court yesterday: His brother Benjamín actually was running the drug organization from a Mexican prison." The Union-Tribune continues, "The lawyers mentioned the theory while asking federal prosecutors to give them any documents that might help prove that in preparation for a trial in less than a year. … Javier Arellano took over as head of the murderous drug-running ring in 2002 after Benjamín was jailed and another brother, Ramón, was killed, prosecutors said in court papers filed last week. … Defense lawyers said they hope to prove that's not the case as they defend Javier from charges that could lead to the death penalty." The Union-Tribune adds, "Prosecutors said they would turn over all their evidence as required by law. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is expected to decide whether prosecutors will seek the death penalty. U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns set an Oct. 10 deadline for prosecutors to announce how they plan to proceed. … Burns wants jury selection in the case to begin right after Thanksgiving and witnesses to begin testifying in January. Defense lawyers said that is too soon."

DOJ_NMG_0128025

Convicted Officer Testifies In Former ATF Agent's Suit Against Chicago. The Chicago Tribune (2/6, Coen) reports, "Drawing chuckles from jurors for his Chicago mannerisms and colorful language, infamous former Police Officer Joseph Miedzianowski was back in federal court Monday, but only in a videotaped deposition in a case involving a one-time federal agent who is suing the city." The Tribune continues, "Tapes of Miedzianowski being questioned about his dealings with former Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Agent Diane Klipfel were played for the panel. Klipfel and her agent husband are suing Chicago, charging that when they tried to blow the whistle on Miedzianowski in 1992, the city ignored the allegations and Miedzianowski was able to turn the Police Department's internal affairs unit against them." The Tribune adds, "Dressed in prison garb with short hair and a hint of a goatee, Miedzianowski admitted in the video that he doesn't like Klipfel. He called her out of control, a liar and a lunatic. He eventually was arrested in 1998 and later convicted of masterminding a massive Chicago-to-Miami drug ring and was dubbed the most corrupt police officer in Chicago history by federal prosecutors. … 'Lunatic would've been one of the nicer words I would've used on her,' Miedzianowski said." The Tribune notes, "Miedzianowski said Klipfel sowed dissent among agents and officers while she supervised a gang detail of which he was a member, and she made false allegations against him to cover her own questionable conduct. … In her testimony, Klipfel had described an enraged Miedzianowski who kicked her car and threatened her when she confronted him about taking money from the dealer and others. Miedzianowski described calmer meetings called by Klipfel, and he said the matter in dispute was that she wanted to give inventoried cash back to the dealer."

ATF Agent Tells Of Life Undercover Infiltrating Motorcycle Gang. CNN (2/6, Arena, Bronstein, Spellman) reports from Mesa, AZ, "In a parched, secluded desert, a brutal killing is caught on videotape. A member of the feared and violent Mongol motorcycle gang is shot in the head at close range. His body is dumped in a shallow grave. … That murder was Jay Dobyns' ticket for membership into the Hells Angels motorcycle gang, Dobyns said. … 'I had committed, like the ultimate deed, the ultimate act of loyalty to these guys,' Dobyns said in an exclusive CNN interview." CNN continues, "But that murder was a fake, complete with special effects, cow guts for brains and artificial blood. What's more, Dobyns had a dark secret he was keeping from his fellow Hells Angels gang members: He was actually an agent for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and was infiltrating the gang to help bring them down. (Read about Dobyns' complaints against the ATF) … For nearly two years, from 2001-2003, Dobyns abandoned his old life, his family and his friends to wear the Hells Angels trademark vest and to simultaneously build a case against the most feared motorcycle gang in the world. If he'd been caught, he figured he would be dead. … The undercover plot was elaborate: Dobyns even had to fake a romantic relationship with a fellow biker played by a female agent, so he had an excuse not to sleep with other women. … Dobyns saw what few outsiders have ever seen -- the inner workings of the Hells Angels. He says that included gun and drug trafficking, extortion, rape and even murder. And Dobyns testified about it all in court."

California Officials Offer Reward For Illegal Guns. The Sacramento Bee (2/6, Jewett) reports, "Sacramento law enforcement leaders have announced a new program offering $1,000 rewards to get illegal guns off the street." The Bee continues, "Authorities are turning to YouTube, MySpace.com and text messaging - communication highways for teens - to promote a new program offering $1,000 rewards for information about illegal guns." The Bee adds, "The rewards will go to anonymous callers who provide police with information about an illegal gun or unlawful gun owner - if the information leads to an arrest. In California, felons are not allowed to own guns, and only people with permits can carry loaded firearms. … 'This is one of the things we're doing to try to reduce the level of violence we see on the streets,' Sacramento Police Chief Albert Najera said at a press conference with Sacramento County Sheriff John McGinness and agents from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives."

DOJ_NMG_0128026

US Will Not Charge ATF Agents In Arlington Shooting. The Washington Post (2/6, B02, Stockwell) reports, "Arlington County's chief prosecutor has ruled that there will be no charges against the federal agents who exchanged gunfire with a man who then broke into an Arlington home, shot another man and kept police at bay for 10 hours last summer." The Post continues, "Commonwealth's Attorney Richard E. Trodden said an investigation into the July 5 incident found that the three agents acted in self-defense when they fired at Travis Hampton, 24. Hampton had fired several shots at the agents before leading them on a chase that zigzagged through the county's narrow streets, Trodden said. Hampton, of Southeast Washington, later fatally shot himself inside the home he had broken into. … 'We found no grounds for any kind of criminal case,' Trodden said. 'The only real issue here was whether the agents acted properly, and we found they certainly had a right to defend themselves.'" The Post adds, "The incident began as a minor collision at the height of rush hour on Interstate 395 south and evolved into a tense standoff that lasted into the next morning and involved out-of-town agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. Moments before the crash, Trodden said, Hampton had robbed a drug dealer of marijuana at gunpoint from inside the car, which belonged to his girlfriend. … ATF spokeswoman Sheree Mixell would not comment on the case and declined to say whether the agents faced any internal action. She referred calls to the civil rights division of the Justice Department, which also reviewed the case. A spokesman there did not a return a message left yesterday."

IMMIGRATION:

Report Highlights Role Of Immigrant Entrepreneurs. The New York Times (2/6, Bernstein, 1.16M) reports as "the flow of immigrants to suburban and small-town America outpaces the growth of bustling ethnic centers in New York, many foreign-born entrepreneurs" are "facing an unfamiliar crossroads. In the city, rising rents and density hamper growth, while swelling ethnic enclaves in the suburbs generate competitors. Yet in other places, opportunity beckons as never before, as immigrants expand the tastes of mainstream America." Whether these businesses "exploit the new chances to break out or succumb to the new perils, the city's economy will feel the effects." Jonathan Bowles, director of the Center for an Urban Future, says, "These are precious and important economic generators for New York City, and there's a risk that we might lose them over the next decade." The Times adds a report published by the center says even in cities like New York, "where immigrant-friendly mayors have promoted programs to help small business…immigrant entrepreneurs have been overlooked in long-term strategies for economic development."

LATimes Urges Deportation For Convicted Illegal Immigrants. The Los Angeles Times (2/6) editorializes, "Police should not act like immigration agents, nor should landlords. But if there's one place it's wholly appropriate for local officials to crack down on illegal immigrants, it's in county jail." The Times continues, "Two years ago, Los Angeles County kicked off a controversial program to screen the immigration status of jail inmates more carefully. Eight custody assistants with the Sheriff's Department were trained to investigate inmates' backgrounds, and in October, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement doubled the number of agents assigned to local jails. The result, as Times staff writers Patrick McGreevy and Stuart Pfeifer reported Monday, is that the number of inmates flagged for deportation nearly doubled last year, to 5,829." The Times adds, "L.A. jails are facing an overcrowding crisis, and illegal immigrants are part of the problem. Federal officials estimate that as many as 40,000 of the 170,000 inmates who pass through local jails each year are in this country illegally. Deporting them won't solve overcrowding in the short term because they have to serve their sentences before being turned over to the feds, but it will probably reduce crime and the jail population over the long term. Meanwhile, illegal residents will have more incentive to obey the law, without being unduly discouraged from cooperating with police. … The only legitimate fear about the jail program is that cops may bust street thugs they suspect to be illegal immigrants for the tiniest of infractions, knowing that a deportation hearing will follow the punishment. But this is a narrow concern that requires monitoring; it's not a deal-breaker. … There should be a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants, but convicts have forfeited the right to be on it. Send them home."

DOJ_NMG_0128027

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Presents Budget Plan As Blueprint To Balance Budget Without Raising Taxes. President Bush yesterday unveiled his budget proposal to largely negative media reviews. Reports tend to focus on proposed spending reductions on domestic programs, including Medicare, while casting a skeptical eye on the Administration's claims that its spending blueprint would balance the budget in five years. For example, the Wall Street Journal (2/6, A12, McKinnon, 2.04M), in a story titled "On Deficit Cutting, Skeptics Abound," says Bush "often describes himself as optimistic about the nation's future, and he demonstrated that again with his 2008 budget request to Congress. … Even if the White House is able to persuade Democrats to cut 141 federal programs, squeeze nonsecurity programs to a 1% annual growth rate and make sharp cuts in Medicare, Mr. Bush's projections still don't account for several big potential budget-busters, as budget analysts and Democratic critics were quick to note yesterday."

The Financial Times (2/6, Guha) says the "deficit dynamic" in Bush's plan "is substantially driven by the way the budget accounts for the cost of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan." The White House "set out to show that it is possible to balance the budget by 2012 while making the Bush tax cuts permanent. The budget indeed does this, though the fiscal maths rests on certain assumptions, some of which – like the rapid decline in war costs – look optimistic. The biggest assumption is that it is possible to hold non-security discretionary spending growth to 1 per cent in nominal cash terms."

Likewise, ABC World News (2/5, story 2, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) said Bush's plan shows a balanced budget in 2012 "in part by projecting no war costs at all after 2009, increasing Medicare premiums for seniors with incomes over $80,000" and "reducing Medicaid costs by $12 billion and farm subsidies by $18 billion over five years." The budget also "wants to deeply cut 141 unnamed Federal programs." NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 4, 2:25, Gregory, 9.87M) noted "such proposals have been rejected in the past."

Bush's budget is being described as a reiteration of principles put forth throughout his presidency. The New York Times (2/6, Stolberg, 1.16M) says the budget "made few concessions to the political realities facing Mr. Bush. For a president less than two years from the end of his second term, and with his poll numbers low, it was a defiant statement of the principles he has championed for years." Likewise, the Chicago Tribune (2/6, Silva, 617K) reports Bush's plan "is much like the budgets he has presented for the past six years, averting new taxes and limiting spending in many 'discretionary' areas while boosting defense spending. … What is different is the political environment in which the president is delivering his newest spending plan." In fact, says the AP (2/6, Davis), Bush "asked Congress on Monday to slash taxes by $1.9 trillion over the next decade, cementing his first-term tax cuts while changing the way health insurance is taxed. The lion's share of the president's proposed tax reductions would come from making permanent his signature cuts enacted in 2001 and 2003, at a cost of $1.6 trillion over the next 10 years."

USA Today (2/6, Jackson, Wolf, 2.27M) says Bush's plan "sets the stage for a series of politically difficult debates over war, taxes and the safety net for poor, elderly and disabled Americans. By laying down his priorities, Bush wooed Democrats with spending proposals they favor and made clear that if they want to raise taxes to pay for more, they will have to propose it themselves." If Democrats "reject those proposals," they "may need to boost taxes in their own budget plan, to be written this spring." The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Simon, 850K) reports "promises of more federal dollars clashed with fiscal reality as a deficit-minded Bush sent his first budget to a Democratic-controlled Congress." The Washington Times (2/6, Dinan, 88K) says Bush is "butting heads with Democrats by calling for Mr. Bush's tax cuts to be made permanent -- at a value of $1.2 trillion over 10 years."

Fox News' Special Report (2/5, Baier) reported, "Senior administration officials call it a budget designed around pro-growth policies that have already proven they can keep the economy moving forward." Rob Portman, head of the Office of Management and Budget, was shown saying, "To increase taxes would to put at risk the economy that has generated the revenues that are largely responsible for putting us in a better fiscal condition."

Roll Call (2/6, Pierce) reports, "As Republicans go, Democrats really like…Portman. It's just too bad for the Office of Management and Budget director that he works for the Bush administration." Senate Budget Chairman Kent Conrad "praised Portman as 'a thoughtful, bright person who is concerned about the long-term unsustainability of our fiscal situation.' So does that mean that Conrad is approaching with an open mind the $2.9 trillion fiscal 2008 budget the White House delivered on Monday? 'The problem is not with the staff. The problem is at the top,' Conrad said." Roll Call adds, "That's the overwhelming sentiment Portman, a former Ohio Congressman, faces over the next few weeks as he teams up with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to sell…Bush's budget blueprint to a skeptical Democratic majority on Capitol Hill."

DOJ_NMG_0128028

The expected partisan clash is another major focus of media reports this morning. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A1, Rogers, 2.04M) reports Bush "put a little of everything in his 2008 budget: high spending, assumptions that the government will collect still-higher revenues, and the promise of a modest surplus in five years, even if his tax cuts remain intact." But "no amount of optimism is expected to head off what is likely to be a continuing series of conflicts in coming months between the White House and lawmakers on priorities ranging from urban housing to farm subsidies and defense spending to investments in child health care and education." Democrats "share the president's goal of erasing the federal budget deficit by 2012, but would take a very different path. The two biggest flash points between the White House and Congress are taxes and the war in Iraq. Conflict over these two issues alone could derail Mr. Bush's promise of a modest surplus in five years -- the first since 2001."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Havemann, Reynolds, 850K) says "the heat flared up immediately Monday as Republicans lined up squarely behind Bush's budget for fiscal 2008, while Democrats castigated it as both heartless and fiscally irresponsible." The "sharp divide seemed to shatter the spirit of bipartisanship that both parties had cultivated since the Democrats captured control of Congress in November's elections."

On NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 4, 2:25, Gregory, 9.87M), Democratic Sen. Kent Conrad was shown saying, "I would characterize this proposal as filled with debt and deception. It is disconnected from reality and it continues to move America in the wrong direction." McClatchy (2/6, Rosen) reports, "The new Democratic chairmen of the congressional budget committees assailed President Bush's spending plan Monday as a fiscal ruse that's based on inflated government revenue projections and understated future war costs." Conrad and Rep. John Spratt "gave caustic reviews to Bush's 2008 fiscal year budget, the first of the annual fiscal proposals he has submitted to a Democratic-controlled Congress. … Spratt accused Bush of using budgetary sleight of hand to buttress his claim that the federal deficit -- projected at $172 billion this year by the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) -- would disappear by 2012 under his plan."

The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A12, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "In his new budget yesterday, Mr. Bush proposed some modest ways to restrain the wealth gap, particularly by offering new tax breaks to help the uninsured buy health insurance, but did little to fundamentally strengthen existing government efforts to alter the distribution of income. Included in his budget also was a proposal to extend his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts, which Democrats say benefit the rich over everyone else. … Rather than using the tax code to redistribute income more than it does already, Mr. Bush's budget looks to address inequality largely by helping people afford health insurance and providing more money for education, including increased Pell grants for college."

Skelton Says Congress May Pare Down Defense Spending. USA Today (2/6, 5A, Brook, 2.27M) reports, "Bush's budget brings Pentagon spending to $623 billion for 2008. It also includes a supplemental request for $99 billion to pay for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan and other costs of the war on terror for the rest of this year." The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A13, Jaffe, Karp, 2.04M) notes Rep. Ike Skelton, "the Missouri Democrat who chairs the House Armed Services Committee, suggested the Democratic-led Congress may move to pare back the defense budget. 'We cannot provide an adequate national defense on the cheap, but neither can we afford to simply ratify the president's request without performing the due diligence and oversight our Constitution requires,' Rep. Skelton said."

The Washington Post (2/6, A6, Tyson, 690K) says Bush's defense budget request "pushes US defense spending to levels not seen since the Reagan-era buildup of the 1980s." The Washington Times (2/6, Kralev, 88K) runs a similar report. The New York Times (2/6, Cloud, 1.16M) notes "more than a quarter of the money the Bush administration is requesting in the 2008 fiscal year for military operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere would go toward repairing and replacing military equipment, according to budget figures released Monday by the Pentagon. The scale of the request illustrates the toll that years of combat in Iraq and Afghanistan are taking on the military's vehicles, aircraft, weapons and other equipment." But "some budget experts say its size also raises questions about whether the military is using the argument that troops fighting in the field need equipment in top condition to increase purchases of equipment generally."

DOJ_NMG_0128029

Rumsfeld Shown In Old Footage Underestimating Cost Of Iraq War. ABC World News (2/5, story 2, 2:25, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "The staggering costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan come through loud and clear in the President's budget: $163 billion this year, and at least $142 billion more estimated for next year. One Democratic Senator pointed out the Administration had at one point claimed the war would cost a fraction of that." Donald Rumsfeld, former Secretary of Defense (from January 19, 2003, appearance on ABC's "This Week"): "Office of Management and Budget estimated that it would be something under $50 billion." George Stephanopoulos: "Our estimates say under $300 billion." Rumsfeld: "Baloney."

Democrats Said To Face Limited Options. The New York Times (2/6, Weisman, 1.16M) reports, "In theory, the budget presents the Democrats their first real opportunity to rewrite the administration's policies, especially on tax cuts, that they have been attacking for six years. But in practice, Democrats know that the only way they can find the revenue to restore the administration's proposed spending cuts would be to cut back on military spending, delay their stated intentions to balance the budget or rescind the Bush tax cuts in future years. They are not especially eager to do any of these." The Times adds, "The most likely result, even some Democrats acknowledge, will be a limited reshaping of the budget by restoring some proposed cuts in a variety of domestic programs, including children's health care, Head Start and home heating assistance for the poor and the elderly."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/6, Grier, Chaddock, 59K) reports, "A president's opponents routinely deride his budget as dead on arrival. Despite this, months of congressional hearings on its details follow. In the end, much of the plan will provide a blueprint for the day-to-day operations of many federal departments and agencies."

Bush Calling For Means Testing, "Deepest Medicare Cuts" Of His Presidency. Much of the coverage emphasizes the budget's spending reductions on healthcare and other social programs. The Financial Times (2/6, Daniel, Guha) reports Bush's budget sets "the stage for a confrontation with Democrats by making greater means-testing for middle-class benefits a central part of his proposals to address entitlement reform. The budget represents a challenge to parts of the system of entitlements enacted as part of the Great Society agenda of the 1960s, with plans to cut Medicare spending, the main publicly funded health insurance programme for those over 65, by raising premiums for wealthier recipients." And in addition, says USA Today (2/6, Appleby, 2.27M), "Higher-income Medicare beneficiaries -- those earning more than $80,000 individually or $160,000 as a couple -- would pay more for the new drug benefit under the president's budget released Monday."

The AP (2/6, Taylor) reports that the proposal "pinches programs cherished by Democrats," while the Washington Post (2/6, A1, Abramowitz, Montgomery, 690K) says "Bush signaled he would attempt to squeeze spending on health care, education, housing and other domestic programs important to the Democratic majority for the duration of his term. Overall domestic spending would be held below the rate of inflation in the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 and frozen thereafter."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports, "The budget…calls for the deepest Medicare cuts of his six years in office and falls short in expanding health coverage to uninsured children -- a top priority for congressional Democrats this year. … Consumer and industry groups -- including AARP, the American Medical Association, the American Cancer Society, the Alzheimer's Association and the California Hospital Association -- roundly criticized Bush's plan, and their opposition signaled that it is unlikely to gain traction." The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A13, Zhang, 2.04M), in a story titled "Medicare Cuts To Be Painful," says "hospitals would bear the brunt of…Bush's proposal to cut Medicare spending by $65.6 billion over five years. … In total, hospitals would see about $30 billion in Medicare payment cuts over the next five years, industry analysts said. Industry lobbyists vowed a fierce fight to block the proposed cuts." The Washington Post (2/6, A7, Lee, 690K) also notes Bush's call for "across-the-board cuts in provider payments if Medicare spending reaches certain levels."

The AP (1/6, Freking) reports "hospitals, nursing homes and other providers say that they can't afford lower payments from the government. They said that the payments won't keep up with the cost of providing health care." The New York Times (2/6, Pérez-Peña, 1.16M) also runs a story on how the Bush budget would affect New York Hospitals. The Times says the Bush budget "includes deep cuts in spending to train young doctors, cuts that would hit New York especially hard, eliminating several hundred million dollars a year in payments to teaching hospitals around the state."

DOJ_NMG_0128030

Budget's "Winners" And "Losers" Noted. In an analysis of the budget, McClatchy (2/6) lists the Defense Department, Veteran Affairs, and the State, Interior and Labor Departments the "winners," while it estimates the biggest "losers" are Amtrak, the Environmental Protection Agency, Low Income Home Energy Assistance, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, the Education Department, the Labor Department's Bureau of International Labor Affairs, the Office of Disability Employment Policy and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The Washington Post (2/6, A7, Hsu, 690K) offers a similar overview of the budget.

In its "Federal Diary," the Washington Post (2/6, D1, Barr, 690K) reports the budget "contains nuggets of good news for federal employees: Their numbers would grow, as would their salaries." But "those retiring after relatively short careers would lose part of the standard health insurance subsidy. And many employees not involved in national and homeland security would see their programs operate with flat or reduced funding in fiscal 2008."

The Washington Post (2/6, B1, Sheridan, MacGillis, 690K) reports the plan "would provide hundreds of millions of dollars for projects in the Washington area, including a new Homeland Security complex in Southeast and improvements to roads and Metro." But "Democratic lawmakers said it does not include enough for homeland security, health care and cleanup of the Chesapeake Bay."

The Washington Post (2/6, C3, Trescott, 690K) also reports, "The federal cultural agencies and museums received solid support yesterday from the White House in the proposed budget for fiscal 2008." The Administration proposed "$678.4 million for the Smithsonian complex, the largest of the cultural accounts. If passed by Congress at that level, the budget would include an increase of more than $20 million for utilities, rents and salaries; $10 million for improvements to a storage facility for anthropological and art collections in Suitland; $9.9 million for planning for the National Museum of African American History and Culture; and $18 million for improvements at the National Zoo, including $9 million for the new elephant habitat."

Budget Shifts $1 Billion To NCLB. The Washington Post (2/6, A7, Paley, 690K) reports, "Bush proposed $56 billion in Education Department funding, level with his proposal for the current fiscal year" and included "$1 billion in new spending related to the landmark No Child Left Behind law. Democrats and education groups attacked Bush's proposal" saying that it would "slash key education programs and fall short of full funding" for NCLB."

The Washington Times (2/6, 88K) reports, "The $2.9 trillion spending blueprint calls for establishing a national expectation that all high school students will graduate on time and be prepared for college or the workplace. Bush is seeking more than a $1 billion increase in Title I grants for students attending high schools in low-income areas and $100 million for reading programs. Some $412 million is being sought to help pay for achievement testing."

National Education Association President Reg Weaver writes in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (2/6, 2.04M) that school vouchers "would actually reduce attractive choices for most parents" because "most elite private schools charge higher fees than vouchers would provide, they would only serve as a subsidy for students already attending private schools" and "everyone else would be left in public schools with dwindling resources." Instead, "the way to give parents more positive choices is to improve our public schools. The NEA agrees with President Bush that the No Child Left Behind Act should be reauthorized; meantime, we have a positive agenda to improve the law."

Budget Includes Boost In Pell Grant, Cut In Student Loan Subsidy To Banks. USA Today (2/6, 3B, Block, 2.27M) reports, "The budget President Bush proposed Monday would increase federal grants to low-income college students by 33% over five years and pay for it by reducing subsidies to private lenders." The maximum Pell grant "which hasn't been increased since 2003," would be raised "to $5,400 from $4,050 over five years. To offset the cost, the administration proposes reducing interest-rate subsidies to private lenders by half a percentage point." And "news of the plan sparked a sell-off in shares of publicly traded lenders."

The Wall Street Journal (2/6, Godfrey, 2.04M) reports the plan "is substantially more ambitious than one being pursued in Congress, in which lawmakers also reduced lender guarantees, but cut the lender rate subsidy by just 10 basis points."

No Provisions To Build Entire Border Fence Or Reform Social Security, AMT. The Washington Times (2/6, Dinan, Seper, 88K) reports "Bush's new budget would pay for only about half of the 700 miles of US-Mexico border fence he and Congress four months ago promised to build." The plan "makes good on his promise to fund 3,000 new U.S. Border Patrol agents, putting him near his goal of doubling the agency's size" and "asks for $1 billion in new money to build the fence. Even coupled with $1.5 billion appropriated in the past two years, this would not pay for the entire fence called for in a bill Congress passed and the president signed into law in October."

DOJ_NMG_0128031

Meanwhile, McClatchy (2/6, Hall) reports, "Bush's budget ducks tough issues such as shoring up Social Security and overhauling the alternative minimum tax, which threatens to punish millions of middle-class taxpayers in coming years. … For several years, Congress has avoided the AMT's impact on middle-class families by passing one-year patches. Bush's budget assumes no more patches after the 2008 tax year. He also assumes that new revenues from the AMT will help him balance the budget by 2012. Congress is unlikely to go along, however." However, says the Wall Street Journal (2/6, D1, Herman, Chaker, 2.04M), "some kind of AMT fix is likely to win congressional approval. Among those already feeling the pinch of the AMT are many people who live in high-tax areas, such as New York City, New Jersey, and California and those with large families."

Bush Budgets $71.7 Million For Mexico Border Water Treatment. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A12, Paltrow, 2.04M) reports the White House, "stepping into a controversy over cross-border pollution from Mexico, asked Congress for $71.7 million to enhance treatment of sewage drifting from Tijuana to communities in Southern California if a plan to use a private contractor falls through." Until 2000, "the U.S. had planned to expand treatment of sewage from Tijuana at an existing government-owned treatment plant on the border in San Ysidro, Calif. The intent was to help stem pollution from raw sewage causing beach closings and damaging a wildlife estuary on the U.S. side." But "a group of Southern California lawmakers was able to cut off funding for that plan and instead helped a start-up company, Bajagua LLC, a generous contributor to their campaigns, get a no-bid contract to build an entirely new plant on the Mexican side of the border."

Bush Budget Would Close All Public Libraries In Oregon County. The Christian Science Monitor (2/6, Knickerbocker, 59K) reports, "In a corner of southwestern Oregon, a century's worth of American history is bumping up against the politics of federal spending. As a result, all 15 public libraries in Jackson County could be shuttered in a few weeks for loss of federal payments. Washington, Alaska, Montana, and other states would be affected as well. In California, more than 4,500 schools face imminent teacher and administrator layoffs." As "a portion of President Bush's $2.9 trillion budget sent to Congress Monday, not much money is involved: about $800 million or so." But "the cutoff in funding has united lawmakers across the political spectrum – from Sen. Ted Stevens (R) of Alaska on the right to Sen. Barbara Boxer (D) of California on the left. Normally mild-mannered Sen. Gordon Smith (R) of Oregon is threatening to filibuster a $464 billion continuing resolution meant to fund the federal government for the rest of the fiscal year because of what is, in essence, a quirk of history." The county, along with others, have been receiving federal funds to make up for the loss of revenue from the timber harvest, which declined sharply in the late 1990s.

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, 2.04M) editorializes, "Politicians are typically late in picking up trends, so it will be interesting to see how long it takes Washington to acknowledge the big story in the Fiscal 2008 budget that…Bush unveiled yesterday: To wit, with a little spending restraint, Congress could balance the budget in no time. You wouldn't know this from all the garment-rending yesterday in response to Mr. Bush's proposal to spend the not-so-meager sum of $2.9 trillion. Our favorite agonist is Kent Conrad, the Senate Budget Committee Chairman, and he didn't disappoint. 'The President's budget is filled with debt and deception, disconnected from reality, and continues to move America in the wrong direction,' said the Senator who was himself blocked from sneaking nearly $5 billion in 'emergency' farm spending into a military construction bill in the final days of the last Congress. … The news Mr. Conrad won't broadcast is that over the past three years the federal deficit has shrunk by 58%."

The Washington Post (2/6, A16, 690K) says in an editorial that "Bush's balance is more illusory than real. It ignores known costs such as ameliorating the impact of the alternative minimum tax, which would top $90 billion in 2012 alone; the administration, once again, would simply affix a one-year patch for 2008. It assumes the government will collect far more revenue than the Congressional Budget Office projects, amounting to a $150 billion difference in 2012. No one should start spending Mr. Bush's projected surplus." The Post adds, "The more fundamental problem with Mr. Bush's supposedly balanced budget is its fundamentally unbalanced approach. He squeezes social programs while his tax cuts remain untouchable."

The New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) editorializes, "Apart from war costs and personnel increases, this budget slips in more than $40 billion in other spending increases, compared with last year. Since Mr. Bush took office, the Pentagon budget has more than doubled. It is now higher, in real terms, than it has been in the past half-century." Congress "should direct particular attention to the roughly $140 billion in weapons procurement, research and development costs that are not part of the Iraq and Afghanistan section of the budget. Far too many of these programs are products of cold war strategic thinking and have outlived their rationale in a world with no superpower arms race. … This nation can afford to pay for all of its legitimate military needs. What it cannot afford are costly jobs programs disguised as defense and the wasteful weapons projects promoted by an army of well-connected Washington lobbyists."

DOJ_NMG_0128032

Steven Rattner, managing principal at the Quadrangle Group, a private investment firm, writes in the New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) that when Bush "sent his new budget to Congress yesterday, he trumpeted a continuing decline in the deficit and projected a swing back into the black by 2012." But "the accounting in the thick volumes issued by his Office of Management and Budget bears about as much similarity to the practices of private sector companies as Sanskrit does to Chinese. For sometimes obscure and sometimes political reasons, the federal government reports its finances in a way that portrays them far more favorably than they deserve. … The Sarbanes-Oxley Act tried to reform misleading private sector practices. The federal government needs a similar effort."

Administration Plans To Cut "Tax Gap" By $29.5 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, Wells, 2.04M) reports the Bush Administration is "launching an effort to collect an estimated $29.5 billion in uncollected taxes, partly through new reporting requirements on securities sales." The proposals "to close part of the estimated $290 billion tax gap are included in the White House's proposed $2.9 trillion budget plan for the 2008 fiscal year, released Monday." The Bush budget "would require corporations, investors and merchants to report more details of their business dealings to the Internal Revenue Service. This is part of a move to boost the overall compliance rate with the tax code, which was 86% in 2001." A key proposal "in this expanded 'information reporting' includes new reporting requirements for the basis of publicly traded securities, which involves a measure of stock purchase price plus any necessary adjustments."

Bush Proposal Would Revamp FAA Funding. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A12, Matthews, 2.04M) reports President Bush "told Congress he wants to scrap the passenger-ticket taxes used to help fund the air-traffic control system and replace them with user fees for commercial airlines." However, the result "will be some air travelers, commercial airlines and corporate jet owners are likely to end up paying more to fly to pay for a new generation of traffic control technology." The proposed changes "would take effect in 2009 and mark a major shift in how the Federal Aviation Administration is funded."

McConnell To Pressure Democrats On Judicial Nominations. The Hill (2/6, Bolton) reports Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) is "signaling to colleagues that he will take a personal and leading role in pressuring Democrats to confirm President Bush's judicial nominees, an issue that has received little attention since the election." Republican senators "agreed to make judicial nominees one of their top priorities at a one-day retreat held Friday at the Library of Congress before a meeting with Bush at the White House. Other key concerns, which senators designated in questionnaires they submitted to the Republican leadership, are fiscal policy, taxes, budget, healthcare, energy security, immigration reform and national security." While Bush "has said he still wants to push Social Security reform, the senators did not include it in their broad agenda for the next two years, indicating a lack of support for the measure." At the retreat, McConnell "kicked off the private talk on judges and reiterated his expectations of Democrats on judges during a press conference Monday." McConnell said, "Senate Republicans expect that Bush be treated the same way during the last two years of his presidency as each of the last three presidents were treated in the last two years of theirs when the Senate was controlled by the opposition party." McConnell said "that during the last two years of the Reagan, the first Bush, and the Clinton administrations, the Senate confirmed an average of 17 circuit court nominees, adding that conversations with Senate Majority Leader Reid (D-Nev.) have left him optimistic 'that standard will be met.'"

9th Circuit Increases En Banc Reviews. The National Law Journal (2/6, Maclean) reports, "The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals appears bent on reining in potential conflicts between its precedents and those in other circuits before they catch the eye of the U.S. Supreme Court." The

DOJ_NMG_0128033

Journal continues, "The nation's largest federal appellate court issued 25 orders to rehear appeals by 15-judge en banc panels in 2006, the highest number in decades, with a whopping nine orders in one five-week period between Dec. 21, 2006, and Jan. 23, 2007, according to court records. … The latest spate of nine orders all came in criminal or habeas petitions. … 'This is a noteworthy flurry of activity,' said Arthur Hellman, a professor at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law who has written a book about the circuit and follows it closely. 'One thing it says is the court is being proactive in clarifying its law.'" The Journal adds, "Judge Alex Kozinski, a 9th Circuit judge since 1985 and slated to be chief judge at the end of the year, agreed. 'There seems to be a greater willingness on the part of judges to view the en banc process as a continuing part of our responsibility in shaping circuit law,' he said." The Journal notes, "Circuit rules provide that a majority of the court's 26 active judges may order a full court reconsideration of three-judge panel decisions in a process known as en banc review. Because of the impracticality of all 26 judges sitting for rehearing, the circuit adopted a system of limited en bancs with random selections of 15 judges to rehear cases. … The en banc process is intended to eliminate conflicting panel decisions within the circuit and conflicts with precedents in other circuits. … In three of the nine cases that the court most recently voted to review en banc, the lower court panel had yet to issue a ruling. That generally happens when the three judges find a conflict within the circuit and refer the case to the entire court, according to Kozinski. Under circuit rules, three judges can't resolve the internal split; it must be done by en banc review."

Former Treasury Chief Criticitzes Bush's Insistence On Private Social Security Accounts. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, 2.04M) reports former Treasury Secretary John Snow "said the Bush Administration's first effort to overhaul Social Security failed because the administration was 'intransigent' on private accounts." Snow said the "Administration's insistence that a Social Security fix include private accounts carved out of the program shifted the focus from making the retirement program solvent. It would have been better, he said, to propose private accounts on top of the existing program, as some Democrats suggested."

"Winners Could Turn Into Losers" Under Bush Healthcare Plan. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, D1, Meckler, 2.04M) reports, "New prescriptions to help the uninsured are proliferating by the day, but some of the proposals would have a big impact on another group -- people who already have health insurance." The Journal assesses several proposals for their effect on consumers, including President Bush's proposal, one by Oregon Sen. John Wyden (D), another by the Health Coverage Coalition for the Uninsured, state proposals, and the Edwards proposal. The Journal reports that under the Bush plan, "[a]mong the winners would be those whose coverage costs less than $15,000 a year -- or about 80% of workers who have job-based insurance, the White House says." However, "winners could turn into losers with time. Even people with policies under the cap could eventually hit the ceiling as health costs rise." The Journal calls the Wyden proposal "the most radical one on the table." The Journal writes, "He would sever the link between employment and insurance altogether and require everyone to buy coverage directly from insurance companies, much like people now buy auto insurance. … Under this plan, people with insurance will have a greater choice of health plans than most get from work today, given that the market is likely to produce more options. But as health costs and insurance premiums rise, families would have to absorb the increase."

Senate Proposal Authorizes Space Intelligence Office. The Washington Times (2/6, Gertz, 88K) reports Congress is "calling for the creation of a new National Space Intelligence Center to better spy on space-based and other threats to U.S. military, intelligence and commercial satellites." A provision "of the Senate intelligence authorization bill for fiscal 2007 would require the Bush administration to set up the new center within the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI). The plan was disclosed in a little-noticed section of committee's report on the bill made public Jan. 24." The report "stated that threats to U.S. satellites are increasing, a fact highlighted by China's recent test of an anti-satellite (ASAT) missile interceptor that destroyed a Chinese weather satellite."

Pelosi Gets Use Of Larger Plane Than Hastert. The Washington Post (2/6, A15, Romano) reports amid "rumblings from conservatives that she is seeking special treatment, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D) will receive use of an Air Force jet larger than the one used by her predecessor, Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, so she can fly nonstop to her home in San Francisco." Since the "Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the speaker, who is next in line for the presidency after the vice president, has been given use of a government plane for security reasons." Yesterday, the House sergeant-at-arms "issued a statement saying that the leadership is awaiting word from the Air Force on the rules for using the plane. It is unclear, for example, who can travel with Pelosi and whether she can return home from a political event on the taxpayer-funded plane."

DOJ_NMG_0128034

Evan Thomas Says Reporters' Job Is To "Bash" Bush. The Washington Times (2/6, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Evan Thomas of Newsweek says it is the job of reporters to 'bash' President Bush. Friday on WETA-TV's 'Inside Washington' program, the topic was 'whether the media's been unfair to President Bush, given his abysmal approval ratings,' Tim Graham reports at www.NewsBusters.org. NPR reporter Nina Totenberg said Bush received a 'free ride' for years, so now the worm has turned and the coverage is fierce." Host Gordon Peterson then "asked for Mr. Thomas' opinion: 'What do you think, Evan? Are the mainstream media bashing the president unfairly?' Mr. Thomas: 'Well, our job is to bash the president; that's what we do almost.' Mr. Peterson: 'But unfairly?' Mr. Thomas: 'Mmmm -- I think when he rebuffed, I think when he just kissed off the Iraq Study Group, the Baker-Hamilton commission, there was a sense then that he was decoupling himself from public opinion and Congress and the mainstream media, going his own way. At that moment, he lost whatever support he had.'"

Parties Seen As Reversing Roles In Senate. Roll Call (2/6, Pierce) reports it "seems that no matter who is in the majority in the Senate, the ruling party bemoans the 'obstructionism' of the minority, while the minority bristles at the majority's efforts to limit the number of amendments and debate time." The "irony of this sudden and wholesale shift in rhetoric" since the 2006 elections "hasn't been completely lost on Senators of both parties, even as they swear they are doing things slightly differently than their predecessors." Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin "defended the new majority, saying, 'I like to think we are taking a more reasonable approach. We want to give them time to amend without allowing them to obstruct.'" Roll Call adds, "Noting that Senate Democrats pulled the same stunt last year on the lobbying and ethics bill, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) defended his party's adoption of the standard minority script." McConnell said, "In fairness to Senate Republicans, to portray an effort to get votes on this bill as something unusual is truly astonishing."

Roberts Offers Advice To Law Students. The Washington Post (2/6, A15, Barnes, 690K) reports that in remarks to law students and faculty at Northwestern Law School, Chief Justice John Roberts offered "Absolutely free advice on how to make your briefs better-read, your arguments more closely followed, your justices more sympathetic. … First, pretend that you're not always right." Roberts said, "We get hundreds and hundreds of briefs, and they're all the same. Somebody says, 'My client clearly deserves to win, the cases clearly do this, the language clearly reads this,' blah, blah blah. And you pick up the other side and, lo and behold, they think they clearly deserve to win.'" The Post adds, "How about a little recognition that it's a tough job? Roberts asked." After "16 months as a justice, he advised that lawyers try to become more 'attuned' to what judges are asking. 'I would try today to be much more receptive, try to process more effectively, 'Now what does that question tell me about what that judge is thinking?' and respond rapidly rather than trying to stick to my script,' Roberts said."

OTHER NEWS:

Service Sector Continues Expansion. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A2, 2.04M) reports, "The service sector, whose strength fueled the nation's economic growth last year despite a housing slump and higher interest rates, extended its robust performance into 2007." The Institute for Supply Management, "an Arizona-based group of corporate purchasing managers, said its index of nonmanufacturing business activity in the U.S. rose to 59 in January from 56.7 in December. Readings over 50 indicate expansion, and January's surge marked the 46th consecutive month that the service sector, which includes everything from massage therapists to financial planners, has grown." The New York Times/AP (2/6) runs a similar report.

Stocks Finish Mixed. NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 7, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York, stocks finished narrowly mixed. The Dow was up just over 8 points [to close at 12,661.74] on the day. NASDAQ was down more than 5 points [to close at 2,470.60]." The Wall Street Journal (2/6, C1, McKay, 2.04M) notes the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "slipped 0.1%, or 1.40 points, to 1446.99, up 2% on the year." USA Today (2/6, 6B, Krantz, 2.27M) says it was a day of "mixed and unexciting action on Wall Street."

DOJ_NMG_0128035

ABA Panel Recommends Diluting Code Of Judicial Conduct. The New York Times (2/6, Liptak, 1.16M) reports a commission of the American Bar Association "has recommended that the group weaken its code of judicial conduct by changing, from a mandatory rule to nonbinding advice, an instruction to judges to 'avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety.'" Supporters of the change "say disciplining judges for violating a concept as vague as 'the appearance of impropriety' is unfair. Opponents denounce any retreat from the longstanding and widely embraced standard, and one critic — Robert H. Tembeckjian, the administrator of the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct — has resigned in protest as an adviser to the A.B.A. commission." The change "is part of what would be the first comprehensive revisions to the association's Model Code of Judicial Conduct since 1990; the revisions now go before the group's House of Delegates, which meets in Miami next week, before they can become formal policy."

Giuliani Files "Statement Of Candidacy" With FEC. The AP (2/6, Sidoti) reports that ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) "suggested Monday that a formal presidential announcement was a matter of when, not if. 'Today we just took another step toward running for president,'" Giuliani "said, hours after filing a so-called 'statement of candidacy' with the Federal Election Commission, which moved him closer to a full-fledged campaign. 'It's a big step, an important one. Quite honestly, we're probably ahead of schedule,' Giuliani told reporters in Long Island while campaigning with a state Senate candidate. 'We still have to think about a formal announcement and how to do it, but this is a pretty strong step.' Later, in an interview on Fox News' 'Hannity & Colmes,' Giuliani was more direct. 'I'm in this to win,' he said. 'My campaign is going to be about the future.' Unlike chief GOP rivals Sen. John McCain and Mitt Romney, Giuliani had thus far been ambiguous about whether he would pursue the Republican nomination, even though he had taken the initial steps." However, "Monday's steps, including eliminating the phrase 'testing the waters,' put Giuliani on the same level legally as McCain and Romney, the other top-tier GOP candidates who have formed regular exploratory committees and filed statements of candidacy."

ABC World News (2/5, story 6, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that "Giuliani took a major step today toward a full-fledged 2008 campaign," filing papers with the FEC "that put his hat very close to the ring." NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 2, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported that Giuliani, "the man who was forced into a new national prominence after 9/11, today filed what is called a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission, not an announcement, but it is this close."

The New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) reports that on FOX News' "Hannity and Colmes," Giuliani "just skirted the line on declaring his candidacy. 'We still have to formally announce it and do a few more things,' he said, but added that yesterday's paperwork 'is about as close as you're going to get.'" Asked if he could defeat New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D), Giuliani "said, 'I'm in this to win.' Then he added, 'You do this because you believe that you can win the nomination of your party, and then you believe that you're the strongest candidate to win the election for your party.'"

Long Island Newsday (2/6, Gordon, 414K) reports that Giuliani's appearance on "Hannity and Colmes" "was part of a carefully choreographed effort by his campaign to put to rest questions among Republicans about whether he is serious about running. … Three people close to the campaign agreed, with one source saying Giuliani wouldn't have filed the papers if he didn't have every intention of running. 'There will be a time at some point when he makes a formal announcement, but…he's moving in that direction,' said another campaign source, who noted that Giuliani's communications and political staffs started work Monday."

Giuliani Bid Would Face Hurdles In Winning Over Social Conservatives. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (2/6, A1, Balz, Cillizza, 690K) reports that Giuliani "leads the field of declared and prospective Republican presidential candidates in national polls and, with Sen. John McCain of Arizona, ranks either first or second in most of the important early states. But his support for abortion rights and gay rights puts him sharply at odds with the majority of his party, a situation that many GOP strategists think will present a substantial obstacle to his hopes of winning the nomination." The Post notes, "Giuliani's challenge, aides believe, will be to convince Republican primary voters that, despite his disagreements with conservatives, he will not overturn what has been party orthodoxy on many social issues. One way of indicating that has been through his comments about judicial appointments, a topic he returned to last night. 'I think the appointment of judges that I would make would be very similar to, if not exactly the same as, the last two judges that were appointed' to the Supreme Court, he told Hannity."

DOJ_NMG_0128036

On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (2/5), Giuliani was asked to respond to criticism that he will not be able to "just explain away the fact that he's consistently taken positions that are completely opposite to the conservative Republican base on issues they hold near and dear." Giuliani said, "I don't think anyone has campaigned much more than I have for Republican candidates, going back to 1998. I mean, I've been in 45 states on behalf of 200 candidates, all Republicans. Sometimes differences on issues here and there, but the same basic philosophy of strong foreign policy, being on offense against terrorism, smaller government, lower taxes. And in my case, those are things that I did."

In a report on the NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 3, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) John Harwood, chief Washington correspondent for CNBC, said, "The question about Giuliani is whether his first day as a candidate will be his best day once primary voters look at his personal life, mayoral record and his stance on social issues. The most important thing that happened today, he began to resolve doubts among Republican voters and donors that he is serious about the race."

In a report on the CBS Evening News (2/5, story 3, 1:20, Couric, 7.66M), anchor Katie Couric discussed a potential Giuliani bid with national political correspondent Gloria Borger. Couric: "Giuliani supports abortion rights, gay rights and gun control. Given the conservative Republican base that comes out during the primary process, does he have a chance?" Borger: "I think that Giuliani candidacy is going to test just how much sway those cultural conservatives will have in the Republican Party. Some of them have already come out and said that Giuliani is completely unacceptable. But I spoke with Giuliani aides today. They tell me that they have answers for conservatives on each of these issues. For example, they're going to tie gun control to crime. They're going to say he was the Mayor of New York city. New York was a mess with a terrible crime problem. He got guns off the street. Therefore, he's a leader."

In a report on the NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 2, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg was quoted as saying of Giuliani, "As the year progresses and he becomes evaluated among conservative primary voters, they are going to have problems with his record." NBC News correspondent Ron Allen added, "He is pro-abortion, pro gun control, pro-gay rights. In recent weeks he supported the troop buildup in Iraq." Giuliani: "The fastest and quickest way to bringing about peace is by remaining on offense and remaining strong and not become weak in a time of pressure." Allen: "And there is also his personal life, two divorces, three marriages, with unflattering details splashed across New York's tabloids. On the other hand, Giuliani supporters will focus on his achievements here. A growing economy, cleaning up the city. Reducing crime. And Giuliani's supporters insist he is the one Republican who can win next November."

The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A4, Cooper, 2.04M) reports that in the 2008 GOP presidential race, "perhaps no candidate faces more trouble in gaining the nomination than Mr. Giuliani, which is ironic, given his early lead in many polls. His long-shot status in the nomination sweepstakes is based on his well-known moderate stances on litmus-test social issues. Such positions, along with his two divorces, won't enamor him to social conservatives." GOP hopefuls "McCain and Romney have had their own run-ins with the conservative wing of the party as well, but none quite as significant as that awaiting Mr. Giuliani. … Indeed, a Giuliani nomination would suggest a sea change has taken place within the Republican Party, where successful nominees traditionally have had to maintain allegiance to certain core social beliefs." Scott Reed, "a Washington Republican who managed Bob Dole's 1996 presidential campaign," said that "Giuliani has the potential to change the race even if he doesn't win the nomination, simply by taking a top share of the media spotlight. Mr. Giuliani 'sucks the air out of the room,' Mr. Reed said, making second-tier candidates compete for notice."

Giuliani Restates Belief "In A Woman's Right To Choose." On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (2/5), Giuliani was asked about his position on abortion, Giuliani said, "Where I stand on abortion is, I oppose it. I don't like it. I hate it. I think abortion is something that, as a personal matter, I would advise somebody against. However, I believe in a woman's right to choose." But Giuliani added he would appoint judges "very similar to, if not exactly the same as, the last two judges that were appointed. Chief Justice Roberts is somebody I work with, somebody I admire, Justice Alito someone I knew when he was US attorney, also admire."

DOJ_NMG_0128037

Morris Suggests Conservatives Appear More Likely To Back Giuliani Than McCain. On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (2/5), Dick Morris said that he recently attended a weekly meeting of conservatives at Grover Norquist's office, "And I said, Show of hands. How many people here think McCain can overcome being against the Bush tax cuts, amnesty for illegal immigrants, McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform, and being in favor of global warming legislation? And three-quarters said he could not overcome that; one-quarter said he could. Then I said, OK, how many people here think Rudy can overcome being pro-choice, pro-gun control, pro-gay rights, pro-immigration? Three- quarters said he could overcome it. So I met with Norquist, who's sort of the leading tax reform person in the country, and I said, 'What, have you guys got religion or something?' And he said, 'No, we understand that we have to beat Hillary.'"

More House Republicans Set To Announce Support for Romney. Roll Call (2/6, Whittington) reports, "House Republicans supporting former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) will hold a Capitol Hill press event today to unveil new additions to their team -- additions that move him ahead of Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) in public Congressional endorsements as the battle for Member support continues at a torrid pace between two of the leading GOP presidential hopefuls." McCain "named his six-person House whip team last week and also announced the support of three Cuban-American Members. Members of Romney's team will appear at an afternoon news conference at the Republican National Committee. About half of Romney's Capitol Hill supporters previously have been announced. Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.), who is Romney's liaison in the House chamber, said the Republicans now on board constitute the former governor's initial whip team. 'We'll be utilizing these 22 Members to bolster support for Romney here on Capitol Hill,' he said. Among the endorsements to be announced today are those of Reps. Rodney Alexander (La.), John Linder (Ga.), Ralph Regula (Ohio), Bill Shuster (Pa.) and Mike Simpson (Idaho)."

Obama, Clinton Could Be No-Shows At Early Debates. Roger Simon writes in The Politico (2/6, Simon), "What if the media-political complex announced a presidential debate…and then the major candidates said: 'Stick it in your ear. We're not coming.' That could happen this year for one good reason: Major candidates are complaining that too many states are planning too many debates too early. Nevada has two forums and three debates scheduled already. … Other states have already announced their own Democratic and Republican debates, but there are two developments that might alter things considerably. First, the Democratic National Committee is soon going to call the campaigns together to try to limit the debates. But that may not work. … More importantly, however, Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton may just say no. They might do the unthinkable and just refuse to show up." Simon, asserting that for "the top tier" presidential candidates, "early debates are a negative, an ordeal, a chance for the rest of the pack to nip them in their rear ends," notes that neither Clinton nor Obama "has accepted any debate or forum invitations as of yet. 'The two people who can blow up the debates are those two,' an adviser to the Obama campaign told me. 'All they have to do is say: 'Debate without me. Go ahead.'" Simon adds that "Obama and Hillary have the perfect excuse for not showing up: They have day jobs."

Eyeing White House, Obama Says He's Trying To Kick His Cigarette Habit. The Chicago Tribune (2/6, Parsons, Brachear, 617K) reports, "After struggling to quit smoking in the past, Sen. Barack Obama is trying a cessation aid not available over the counter: public attention." Obama "resolved to quit his cigarette habit over the winter holidays, just weeks before his expected presidential campaign would make photographers and reporters an even more regular part of his life. He said in a Monday interview that, although he has never been a heavy smoker, he has quit for periods over the last several years but then slipped back into the habit. On the cusp of a potential presidential bid seemed the right time to quit for good, he said. 'I've never been a heavy smoker,' Obama said. 'I've quit periodically over the last several years. I've got an ironclad demand from my wife that in the stresses of the campaign I don't succumb. I've been chewing Nicorette strenuously.' The incentive to quit is great for any office seeker, as increasingly negative attitudes about smoking translate into political pressure not to do it -- or at least not to be caught doing it publicly. At a time when most willing public figures also are expected to serve as role models, those with unhealthy habits face intense pressure to leave them behind."

DOJ_NMG_0128038

Edwards Outlines Healthcare Plan, Says Tax Hike Will Be Needed To Fund Proposal. The AP (2/6, Pickler) reports that Democratic presidential hopeful John Edwards "is embracing a position that has been political suicide in the past -- admitting he would raise taxes." Edwards "is betting that voters will back the idea in exchange for the promise of quality health coverage for all, part of the first major domestic policy initiative from a Democratic White House hopeful. The tax increase would pay for the plan's cost of up to $120 billion a year. Edwards' proposal would require that every business provide health care coverage for employees or help them pay for it and every American has insurance. … The plan would free up money for health care coverage by abolishing President Bush's tax cuts for people who make more than $200,000 a year and by having the government collect more back taxes, Edwards said." Noting Edwards' "plan aims to have universal coverage by 2012," the AP adds that Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) "also has said that is his goal, but" he's "yet to provide more specifics about how he would get there. New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton also has said she will have a universal plan."

The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A4, Lueck, 2.04M) reports, "It remains to be seen whether voters will accept Mr. Edwards's vision of 'shared responsibility,' in which employers would have to help fund their workers' coverage and individuals would be required to purchase insurance, often with the help of new tax credits aimed at low-income and middle-class people. Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, or SCHIP, would be expanded to cover more children and low-income parents. New regional 'health markets' would offer comprehensive health-insurance plans to anyone who doesn't get insurance through their jobs or a government program. … Patrick Toomey, president of the Republican antitax group Club for Growth, said Mr. Edwards's plan wouldn't sit well with most voters, who, he said, 'already think taxes are too high.' The idea is 'very good news for the Republican candidate, whoever that may be.'"

Edwards was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (2/5, Blitzer) "if it was a "smart move" to say he would be "raising taxes if you're elected president" to pay for his health care plans. Edwards said, "No one can propose universal health care and say they can pay for it without doing anything to the tax structure. That is not the truth. And I think the American people deserve and are entitled to the truth, that I suspect the will be other Democratic candidates as we go forward who will follow the lead that I've put out there today and will come forward with their own universal health care plan. And if they contend that they can pay for it leaving the tax cuts and the tax structure exactly as it is, I don't believe that's true."

The New York Times (2/6, Broder, 1.16M) reports that Edwards' "plan would be partly financed by eliminating tax cuts for households earning more than $200,000 a year, cuts that Congress approved in the Bush administration. Mr. Edwards said he would also offset the program's cost by using the estimated $15 billion in capital gains taxes that go uncollected each year by requiring brokerage houses to report capital gains from taxpayers' stock sales to the Internal Revenue Service, just as interest and dividend income is reported now." Edwards' "plan would provide tax credits or subsidies to low-income families who cannot afford health insurance, expand Medicare and the federal program of health care for children, and create a federal health insurance agency that could become the basis for a single-payer system that would eventually do away with private health insurance." The Times adds, "One provision of the Edwards proposal certain to draw fire is a requirement that companies provide health insurance for all workers or pay 6 percent of their payrolls into a government fund to buy insurance for them. This type of 'play or pay' program was an element of former President Bill Clinton's failed 1994 health care plan that was shaped in large part by Mrs. Clinton."

The Washington Post (2/6, A3, Balz, 690K) reports that Edwards said his "plan bears some resemblance to the new health-care program enacted in Massachusetts, but he said it would require employers that do not provide health insurance to pay a greater share of their revenue into a government fund to help individuals buy insurance. He called the plan less complicated than that proposed by Bill Clinton and Hillary Rodham Clinton when they were in the White House."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Finnegan, 850K) reports, "Edwards' explicit call for a tax increase to broaden access to healthcare could carry wide appeal among Democratic primary voters. But if he wins the nomination, it risks exposing him to Republican attacks in a general election race, just as Walter Mondale, President Reagan's Democratic challenger in 1984, was pilloried for proposing higher taxes." Edwards, in an interview, "said he did not expect his plan to draw any storm of opposition, as the Clinton White House did with its failed effort, led by Hillary Clinton, to overhaul health coverage in the 1990s. 'I think it's appealing across the ideological and political spectrum,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0128039

Edwards Won't Accept Public Funds For Presidential Bid. USA Today (2/6, Lawrence, Schouten, 2.27M) reports that former Sen. Edwards "on Monday joined New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in saying he will not use public money for the presidential primary campaign or, if he wins his party's nomination, for the general election." His move "is the latest sign of trouble for the public campaign funding system." In an interview yesterday, Edwards said "that he expects major candidates in both parties to raise unlimited private dollars rather than participate in the public system. He said he needs to do the same 'to have the funds to be competitive.'" Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) "is not disclosing his financial plans until after a formal announcement Saturday in Springfield, Ill." On the GOP "side, an aide to former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney said Monday that Romney will not take public money in the primaries. 'Our focus right now is on securing the nomination. Decisions on the general election haven't been made yet,' Kevin Madden said in an e-mail. Two other top GOP prospects, Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, have not said yet whether they will use public money at any stage of the race."

Edwards, Richardson Wow Democrats At Winter Meeting. In his Washington Post column (2/6, A17), David Broder says, "The good news for the nation's Democrats is that neither of the supposed front-runners for the party's 2008 presidential nomination, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama, stole the show when all 10 of the likely contenders spoke last weekend to the Democratic National Committee." Clinton and Obama "got good receptions from the crowd at the Washington Hilton, having filled many of the spectator seats with their young supporters. But they didn't blow away the field." The "stars of the weekend, judging from reactions in the ballroom and the lobby, were not Obama and Clinton but former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico." Both "played to the antiwar sentiments of this liberal-leaning audience by demanding that those now in Congress do more than pass resolutions decrying President Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq." Their view, "which was echoed by former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, left Obama, Clinton and Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware -- who have to deal with the realities of a 51-49 Senate where nothing can pass without significant Republican support -- in the uncomfortable position of seeming to be less fervent about the war. Only Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut and Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, among those with votes to cast, joined the call for early withdrawal." One of the "losers in the weekend oratorical marathon was retired Gen. Wesley Clark, who repeatedly invoked the West Point motto of 'Duty, Honor, Country,' forgetting that few in this particular audience have much experience with, or sympathy for, the military."

Biden's "Backpedaling" Examined. In a New York Times guest column (2/6), Stacy Schiff says, "Football season is over, but there is no cause for despair. We are smack in the middle of an all-star backpedaling tournament. Last week Joe Biden announced his candidacy with that loaded line about Barack Obama, 'the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy.' Forget what Mr. Biden really meant to say. Think instead about where he went next, which was where Michael Richards and Mel Gibson had gone before him. Not only did Mr. Obama understand what he meant, insisted Mr. Biden, but 'I have no doubt that Jesse Jackson and every other black leader — Al Sharpton and the rest — will know exactly what I meant.' Indeed they did. The day ended with Mr. Sharpton assuring Mr. Biden that he bathed regularly. Rehabilitation came that evening on Jon Stewart; this is why television was invented."

Labor Groups Hopeful For Measure To Ease Union Membership. The Washington Times (2/6, Lengell, 88K) reports labor groups "are hoping that the new Democratic majority in Congress will push through a measure that would make it easier for workers to join unions." The bill, "scheduled to be introduced today by Rep. George Miller, California Democrat, is prompting labor activists and union foes to square off in an intense and high-profile lobbying campaign." The Employee Free Choice Act "would allow workers to unionize by simply signing a card or petition stating their interest in joining the union, as opposed to the decades-old practice of secret-ballot elections. If a majority of employees sign, the employer would be required by law to recognize and bargain with the workers' union." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "will introduce the Senate version of the act later this year, his office said yesterday." Labor activists "say the bill is crucial for helping defend them from anti-union companies and lawmakers, which they blame in part for decades of decline. Overall union membership was 12 percent nationally last year -- down from 12.5 percent in 2005."

DOJ_NMG_0128040

Texas Plan For HPV Vaccination For School Girls Generates Controversy. NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 10, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Now to a story that continues to generate talk in Texas. The Governor's executive order that all girls entering sixth grade must receive a new vaccine to protect them against cervical cancer. Today one of the allies spoke for many outraged citizens who want the Governor to rescind this unusual order." NBC (Teague) added, "The state of Texas will soon require girls entering the sixth grade to be immunized against HPV, a sexually transmitted virus that causes cervical cancer." In "mandating the vaccine which families can opt out of, he bypassed the state legislature and sidestepped public hearings." But "opponents insist the vaccine will encourage promiscuity. Some question Perry's ties to Merck, which makes the vaccine. Merck donated to Perry's re-election campaign and stands to make billions in the vaccine is mandated nationwide. But while many parents here in Texas are angered give the Governor's decision, some experts say the HPV vaccine should be mandatory in every state."

NYTimes Praises Texas For Requiring HPV Vaccination. The New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) praises the Texas decision, saying, "Congratulations to Texas for becoming the first state to require vaccinating young schoolgirls — ages 11 and 12 — against a sexually transmitted virus that causes cervical cancer and genital warts. Other states would be wise to follow the same path." There is "no doubt that Merck's vaccine against the human papillomavirus, given in three shots over eight months, is highly effective." Many parents "are appalled at the notion of vaccinating such young girls against a sexually transmitted disease. But the medical reality is that the vaccine will generally not work after a woman has been infected, so it is best for girls to be vaccinated well before they become sexually active."

Studies Showing Wealth Concentration Critiqued. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/6, A17), Alan Reynolds of the Cato Institute and David Henderson of the Hoover Institution say, "Is the share of income of the top 1% in the United States high and rising? Those who say it is usually base their belief on statistics from one of two sources. One, a paper by Thomas Piketty and Emmanuel Saez, was discussed by Alan Reynolds in the Journal on Dec. 14, 2006. The other source is the Congressional Budget Office (CBO). It, too, is wrong." But at the IRS Statistics of Income (SOI) division, Barry Johnson and Brian Raub "examined 28,000 estate tax returns to calculate wealth shares. 'In 2001,' they noted, '1.0% of the U.S. adult population [2.1 million people] . . . owned approximately 22.3% of total U.S. individual wealth, a 1.0% decrease since 1998 but virtually identical to the shares of wealth held in 1995 and 1992.'"

Mecca Talks Seen As "Last Chance" To Avoid Palestinian Civil War. The AP (2/6, Daraghmeh) reports, "For the rival Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah, a reconciliation meeting this week in Saudi Arabia may be a last chance to avoid civil war. If Saudi prestige, money and discussions" in Mecca today "don't produce a power-sharing agreement, it's unlikely anything will, analysts said." In recent months, Egypt, Syria and Qatar have "tried in vain" to end the power struggle between the two groups. The clashes, writes the AP, have "deepened resentment and suspicion between the sides, making agreement on a coalition government seem more elusive than ever. But the fighting also served as a reminder that neither side can win by force without causing massive destruction, and that failure in Mecca could be followed by an even deadlier round of violence." At the same time, the "gaps" between the two sides "are small," with the "underlying" problem appearing to be "deep mistrust and an unwillingness to share power." However, both sides "might have a hard time saying no to the Saudis, particularly in a venue heavy with religious symbolism."

Saudi Arabia Takes On Central Role As Regional Violence Looms. On its front page, the New York Times (2/6, A1, Slackman, Fattah, 1.16M) reports, "With the prospect of three civil wars looming over the Middle East -- and Iran poised to gain from them all -- Saudi Arabia has abandoned its behind-the-scenes checkbook diplomacy and taken on a central, aggressive role in reshaping the region's conflicts." In recent months, the kingdom has increased its involvement in the Palestinian talks, in Iraq and its support of the Sunni-led government in Lebanon. The process is "shaping up as a counteroffensive to efforts by Iran to establish itself as the regional superpower, according to diplomats, analysts and officials here and throughout the region." Some even say that the "recent Saudi commitment to temper the price of oil is aimed at undermining Iran's economy, although officials here deny that." The Times notes that the "shift is occurring with encouragement from the Bush administration," yet Riyadh's goals "may not always be in alignment with those of the White House, and could complicate American interests." Nonetheless, both Washington and Riyadh believe that "one important way to block Iran and calm the many fires in the region is to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict -- or at least appear to be trying to."

DOJ_NMG_0128041

In a similar report, the AP (2/6, Faramarzi, Abu-Nasr) writes, "Relations between Iran and Saudi Arabia are bumpy at the best of times, but violence between Shiites and Sunnis in Lebanon and Iraq is prompting the two Mideast heavyweights to engage in new talks seeking to head off a regional crisis." The "clearest sign of the new diplomacy" has been in Lebanon, where "a joint Saudi-Iranian effort defused a general strike called by the pro-Iranian Shiite militant group Hezbollah after the country erupted into violence two weeks ago." The two sides have also engaged in a series of recent high-profile meetings involving former Ambassador in Washington, Prince Bandar, and Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani. One Saudi official told the AP last week that Iran "asked the kingdom to get Washington to tone down its verbal attacks on Iran."

Qatar Seeks Greater Regional Role. The Christian Science Monitor (2/6, Harman, 59K) reports, "Until 1995, Qatar did not have a distinguishable foreign policy to speak of, and instead took cues from Saudi Arabia and stayed on the sidelines of world affairs. But ever since reformist Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani deposed his father in 1995, Qatar has been charting an increasingly distinctive path." US Ambassador to Qatar, Chase Untermeyer, told the Monitor, "Qatar is a player now." Qatar "seems to be involved in everything lately," from funding Al Jazeera to being the "only Gulf country to maintain any sort of official relations" with Israel. It has also become involved in the Israeli-Palestinian crisis, providing funds to Hamas while remaining "closely allied with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas's Fatah Party."

US Officials Says Pyongyang Prepared To Negotiate. The AP (2/6, Tabuchi) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill Monday said Pyongyang "must get out of the nuclear business if it wants energy or economic aid," adding he believed the North "was prepared to negotiate at the coming arms talks in Beijing." However, he "refused to speak on news reports that Pyongyang is prepared to freeze a key reactor and accept inspectors in exchange for 500,000 tons of heavy oil and other conditions." Hill was in Tokyo meeting with Japanese officials before leaving for Beijing on Wednesday. For its part, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Tokyo would "not consider giving North Korea energy aid unless the communist also came clean on its past abduction of Japanese nationals."

The Washington Times (2/6, Sands, 88K) also reports on Hill's comments.

Pyongyang Seeks To Improve Clinton-Era Deal. The Washington Post (2/6, A12, Kessler, 690K) reports Pyongyang North Korea "has set tough terms for a freeze of one of its nuclear facilities, demanding that the United States exceed commitments made under a Clinton-era deal that the Bush administration previously derided as inadequate." According to the Post, North Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Kim Gye Gwan, "and other officials outlined Pyongyang's position in meetings last week with two American nuclear experts, saying they would be presented when six-nation disarmament talks resume in Beijing on Thursday." In exchange for "a freeze of the Yongbyon facility and a return of international inspectors," Pyongyang wants "a substantial supply of heavy fuel oil, an end to a Treasury Department action that froze North Korean accounts at a Macau bank, an international commitment to build civilian nuclear reactors in North Korea and, most important, normalization of relations with Washington."

US Embassy Warns Of Terrorist Threat In Sudan. The AP (2/6, De Montesquiou) reports the US Embassy in Khartoum warned Americans Monday "of a heightened terrorist threat against Westerners in Sudan." In a message, the US Embassy said it has received "new information that an extremist group based in the country is likely to target Western interests." The US message followed "a similar warning that the United Nations sent its staff in Sudan last week," said a UN official.

US, Malaysia Resume Trade Talks. The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/6) reports the US and Malaysia Monday began "a fresh round of free-trade talks, bogged down by differences over opening two tightly protected sectors, and a controversy over a major gas deal with Iran." The latest round is "crucial to determine if negotiators can bridge differences and conclude the pact before a July 1 deadline," officials said. Deputy US Trade Representative Karan Bhatia "warned last week that the proposed pact may falter if negotiators fail to make firm progress this week over opening up Malaysia's services and government contracts -- two top hurdles to a deal."

DOJ_NMG_0128042

Indonesia Withholding Bird Flu Data. The Financial Times (2/6, Aglionby, Jack) reports Indonesia, the country worst hit by the deadly H5N1 bird flu virus, "has stopped sharing human genetic samples of the highly pathogenic illness with foreign laboratories, raising fears it could slow international efforts to prepare for a pandemic." Officials say Indonesia stopped providing samples internationally last month, "hindering efforts to confirm whether the virus killing its citizens is H5N1 and limiting production of vaccines to help prevent its spread." Dr Triono Soendoro, director-general of Indonesia's National Institute of Health Research and Development, said the step to withhold samples was taken "because the government wanted to keep control of the intellectual property rights of the deadly strain of the virus."

India Walks "Tightrope" In Washington Talks. The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Chu, 850K) reports, "Amid mounting tension between Washington and Tehran, Indian and Iranian officials plan to meet today for their second round of high-level talks in less than three months, signaling the eagerness of the two countries to patch up differences that recently have clouded their historically close ties." Despite American "misgivings" over the relationship, Indian Foreign Minister Pranab Mukherjee is expected to land in Tehran for discussions on Iran's nuclear program and on boosting cooperation over energy issues. As India's economy continues to boom, the Indian government is "increasingly preoccupied with securing reliable sources of energy," including access to Iran's natural gas reserves. But its relations with Tehran have put New Delhi "in a delicate position" with the US.

US Firms Push For End To Cuban Embargo. The Hill (2/6, Swanson) reports congressional supporters of "easing restrictions on travel and agricultural trade to Cuba say business supporters need to offer stronger backing for several measures introduced this year if they are to become law." With Democrats in control of the House, Reps. Jeff Flake (R-AZ) and Sam Farr (D-CA) said Cuba legislation has "a great chance of moving this year," but Farr emphasized that the business community "must become more engaged." At a rally for USA Engage, an anti-embargo group, Flake "said business and farm groups should talk to more members about how lifting trade and travel restrictions will help the US and Cuba," an idea once considered "a lost cause given the Bush administration's active efforts to tighten Cuba trade and travel bans."

Former Ambassador Urges "Opening Doors" To Cuba. Ambassador Vicki Huddleston, former director of the State Department's Office of Cuban Affairs, writes in the Washington Times (2/6, 88K) that "very little change will take place in Cuba as long as the Cuban people are isolated from their loved ones and from the ideas and influences of the outside world." To "start the ball rolling," she says President Bush "should reinstitute the 'People-to-People' program and the annual Cuban American family visits that were in place during the first two years of his administration." However, the ambassador insists that "more needs to be done, it isn't all up to Mr. Bush. Congress will have to act if the president is to have the flexibility he needs in the coming months and years to respond to the challenges and opportunities Fidel Castro's death and Raul Castro's succession will bring."

US Urges Nicaragua To Destroy Missiles. The AP (2/6, Aleman) reports Washington "insisted Monday that Nicaragua destroy hundreds of Soviet-made surface-to-air missiles after President Daniel Ortega said the weapons were needed for the country's defense." Ortega said Friday it would be "absurd" to destroy Nicaragua's SAM-7 missiles "while neighboring Honduras is adding US planes to its military fleet." In response, the US Embassy said in a statement released Monday that Honduras is buying eight small planes from the US to be used "in the fight against drug trafficking and not offensive military aircraft," while stressing that the US government "expects that Nicaragua will continue its already established path of disarmament and destruction of all SAM-7 missiles."

Ban Faces Criticism Over Appointments, Slow Pace. The New York Times (2/6, A9, Hoge, 1.16M) reports new U.N. chief Ban Ki-moon "returned to his headquarters on Monday after a two-week working trip to Africa and Europe and ran into dissension over restructuring changes he has proposed and concern at the slow pace of his appointing top officials since taking office on Jan. 1." At issue are Ban's "proposals to divide peacekeeping, the fastest growing activity at the United Nations, into two departments, and to reshape the disarmament department in a way that many envoys believe downgrades it." While the changes

DOJ_NMG_0128043

"would strike a layman as bureaucratic nuance," the Times says at the United Nations," they fuel a continuing competition between the great powers….and the General Assembly, where the developing world feels its authority is threatened when its elaborate deliberative procedures are not respected."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Farley, 850K) adds, Ban "faced one of his first tests Monday when developing nations sent him back to the drawing board with his plan to restructure the U.N.'s peacekeeping department." The "setback could foretell troubles for the new secretary-general," who faces the task of reforming the U.N. at a time when its peacekeeping demands are growing in nations such as Sudan and perhaps Somalia.

China Cracks Down On Corruption In Shanghai. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A1, Areddy, 2.04M) reports on its front page that "underneath the boom and glitter" in Shanghai, Communist Party leaders in Beijing "say, lay a secret: massive corruption." Last fall, the party fired Chen Liangyu, who "not only ran the city but sat in China's ruling Politburo," alleging "mismanagement and theft at a city pension fund, influence peddling and other misdeeds." The fall of Mr. Chen was China's "biggest political shakeup in a generation. But more than the ouster of one official, it amounted to an indictment of the business model known as Shanghai Inc." The crackdown, the Journal writes, is also "a reminder that China's system leaves great power in the hands of local Communist leaders, whose decisions can ripple unchecked through the economy. Now that the party has stepped in to take its Shanghai leader out of action, approval for the flashy big development projects for which Shanghai is famed has slowed to a crawl."

Expert Says Chinese Reform Must Come From "Below." Ross Terrill, an author and research associate at Harvard's Fairbank Center, writes in a Wall Street Journal (2/6, A17, 2.04M) op-ed, "As President Hu Jintao tries to transcend communism forward to 'market Leninism,' Mao [Zedong], now dead for 30 years, transcends communism backward to Chinese folk history." However, "Today, young pro-market Chinese who devour Hayek's 'Road to Serfdom' and books on American business are embracing an anti-state Chinese tradition (best known in the West through Taoism). They would like -- but will not get -- a China without politics. A new public philosophy, when it comes, as it must, will come from gestation below, not as a diktat from a father-figure or a paternalistic Communist Party."

Russia Brings New Charges Against Khodorkovsky. The New York Times (2/6, Chivers, 1.16M) reports, "Russian prosecutors brought new charges Monday against the imprisoned founder of the Yukos oil company and one of his business partners, opening a new line of legal attack against a Kremlin opponent. The former executive, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, and his partner, Platon A. Lebedev, were charged with embezzlement and money laundering." The two men's "lawyers said they had potentially qualified for parole late this year, when they would have served half of their sentences. The new charges, which accused the men of embezzling about $20 billion in Yukos revenues, appeared to destroy that possibility and opened a new chapter in the long saga of Yukos's legal troubles." The lawyers said the charges "were a means to keep Mr. Khodorkovsky and Mr. Lebedev in prison beyond Russia's presidential election in early 2008 and throughout the remainder of the liquidation of Yukos."

Charges Likely To Tighten Moscow's Grip On Energy Industry. In an analysis, the New York Times (2/6, Kramer, 1.16M) says the new charges "are likely to ease what remains of [Yukos] into state hands, strengthening the Kremlin's control over the industry, analysts and company officials said. In this sense, the Yukos affair is ending as it began — in an opaque mixture of criminal prosecution and Russian energy nationalism, where it is far from clear where one ends and the other begins." The Times adds, "State-owned companies already control a third of the oil production in Russia, one of the world's largest producing nations. Now, both of Russia's large state energy companies are expressing interest in buying Yukos oil fields and refineries, assets that critics say were expropriated by the government but that could look more like the spinoff from a corporate tax and accounting scandal if the new charges stick, as expected."

LATimes Welcomes Mexico's Lifting Of Avocado Tariff. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/6, 850K) says "free trade has never tasted so good" as it did February 1st when Mexico lifted its barrier on avocadoes. Mexican President Felipe Calderon, it notes, decided that Mexico "would rather send its avocados to the US than send its avocado farmers. So it's good news for everyone."

DOJ_NMG_0128044

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Intrepid Armchair Explorers."
"High stakes for young test takers."
"Bottom Line For Bush's '08 Budget: Contention."
"GOP Bats Down Resolution Debate."
"A Union Boss With Some A-list Clout."
"Astronaut Arrested In Kidnap Attempt."

USA Today:
"Evacuee Camp Kids Worry Schools Chief."
"U.S. Advisers Find Joint Patrols With Iraqis Don't Go As Planned."
"Vote On Iraq Is Blocked By GOP."
"Wal-Mart To Launch Video Downloads."

New York Times:
"G.O.P. Senators Block Debate On Iraq Policy."
"Bush Releases Budget Aimed To Erase Deficit."
"S.E.C. Is Looking At Stock Trading."
"In Public View, Saudis Counter Iran In Region."
"A New Problem For Farmers: Few Veterinarians."
"Immigrant Entrepreneurs Shape A New Economy."
"Drawing Lines Across The Sand, Between Classes."

Washington Post:
"GOP Stalls Debate On Troop Increase."
"'It Was Just Shockingly Cold'."
"Bush Plan Reins In Domestic Spending."
"Overachieving Students Told to Lighten Up."
"U.S. Unit Walks 'A Fine Line' In Iraqi Capital."
"Giuliani Announces He's In '08 Presidential Race."

Washington Times:
"Bush Submits 'Staggering' $2.8 Trillion Budget."
"Senate GOP Blocks Iraq Resolution."
"House Bill Eases Union Sign-Ups."
"Anti-Violence Push Begins In Baghdad."
"National Driver's License Hits A Bump."
"Baseball A Hit In Ghana."

Detroit Free Press:
"Jefferson Plant Due For Huge Face-Lift."
"Family Stands By Mom Charged In Deaths'To The Deep Ends Of Hell'."
"Kids get Another Day Off For Cold."
"Bush's Budget Offers More For Plug-In Autos Research."
"Michiganders Favors Cuts Over Taxes."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Tech Puts Touch On Fans."
Dalai lama named As Emory Professor."
"Senate Vote On troops Buildup Blocked."
"Turner Pomes Up $2 Million To Ease Boston's Panic Pain."

Houston Chronicle:
"Vaccine Uproar Perry Not Budging."
"Astronaunt Arrested In Romantic Feud."
"A Small Texas Town Buries One Of Its Own."
"Houston Could Benefit Under Budget Proposal."
"Man Won't Face New Trial In Assault."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Winter Weather-Chicago; Bush Budget; Senate Filibuster; President Assad Interview; Abortion Debate; Giuliani Presidential Bid; Teen Suicide Rate; Super Bowl Aftermath.
CBS: Winter Weather; FL Tornadoes; Giuliani-'08; Senate-Iraq Resolution; Iraq WMD Claims; Kalamazoo Scholarship Program; Ambush Porn; Unhealthy Models.
NBC: Winter Weather-Chicago; Giuliani Presidential Bid; Giuliani Presidential Run-Analysis; Bush Budget; Securing Baghdad; Securing Baghdad; Turner Pays Compensation; Stock Market; Rebuilding The Gulf Coast; Missouri Kidnapping Case; HPV Vaccine-Texas Debate; FL-Tornados-Warning.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Senate-Iraq Resolution Debate Blocked; US-Cold Weather; FL-NASA Astronaut Arrested; New Orleans Residents Requesting Katrina Investigation; Jakarta-Flooding; Giuliani Files Statement Of Candidacy; Parade For Super Bowl Champs.
CBS: FL-NASA Astronaut Arrested; Senate-Iraq Resolution Debate Blocked; WA-Lt. Ehren Watada's Military Trial For Refusing To Fight In Iraq; US-Cold Weather; Heating Oil, Crude Oil And Gasoline Prices Up; Giuliani Files Statement Of Candidacy; Research Shows Elderly Can Suffer Physiological Damage From Isolation.
NPR: US-Cold Weather; Senate-Iraq Resolution Debate Blocked; President Bush's Budget-State And Local Law Enforcement; Giuliani Files Statement Of Candidacy; Jakarta-Flooding; UN-Problems In Central African Republic; Tokyo Stock Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0128045

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Makes remarks on fiscal responsibility, Micron Technology, Manassas.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 defense budget and the FY07 war supplemental request. Defense Secretary Gates, Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on ``Preserving Prosecutorial Independence: Is the Department of Justice Politicizing the Hiring and Firing of U.S. Attorneys?" Paul J. McNulty, deputy attorney general; Mary Jo White, partner, Debevoise and Plimpton, New York; Laurie L. Levenson, Loyola Law School, Los Angeles; Stuart M. Gerson, partner, Epstein Becker and Green. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the costs of the Iraq war. Steven Kosiak, Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments; Gordon Adams, Wilson International Center for Scholars; Michael Gilmore, CBO. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing on recent EPA actions. Location: Room 406, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on stabilization, reconstruction and counter-terrorism strategy for Somalia. Jendayi Frazer, assistant secretary of State for African affairs; Michael Hess, USAID; David Shinn, George Washington University; Ken Menkhaus, Davidson College, Davidson, N.C . Location: Room 628, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on judicial nominations. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committgee. Closed. Hearing on Iran. Location: Room 219, Hart.

2:45 p.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget. Treasury Secretary Paulson. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10:30 a.m. Meets for morning hour and at noon for legislative business.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Homeland Security Subcommittee. Hearing on management challenges in the DHS. Location: Room 2362A, Rayburn.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget. OMB Director Rob Portman. Location: Room 210, Cannon.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 HHS budget. Secretary Leavitt. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on Gulf Coast rebuilding housing needs and the federal response. Deputy HUD Secretary Roy A. Bernardi; David Garratt, Acting Director of Recovery, FEMA; Walter Leger, Chairman, Housing and Redevelopment Task Force, Louisiana Recovery Authority; Gray Swoope, Executive Director, Mississippi Development Authority; Sheila Crowley, President, National Low Income Housing Coalition; Kirk H. Tate, Chief Executive Office, Orion Real Estate Services; Ghebre Selassie Mehreteab, Co-Chairman & CEO, NHP Foundation; James H. Perry, Executive Director, Greater New Orleans Fair Housing Action Center; Edgar Bright, III, President, Standard Mortgage Corporation (New Orleans); James A. Richardson, Louisiana State University; Doris Koo, President & CEO, Enterprise Community Partners; Derrick Johnson, President, Mississippi State Conference NAACP; Mr. James R. Kelly, Chief Executive Officer, Catholic Charities Archdiocese of New Orleans; Margery Austin Turner, Urban Institute; Judith A. Browne, Co-Director, Advancement Project; Martha J. Kegel, UNITY of Greater New Orleans; Rep. William J. Jefferson, D-La. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Transportation Security and Infrastructure Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on federal rail and public transportation security efforts. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on wasate, fraud and abuse dealing with Iraqi reconstruction. L. Paul Bremer, former head, Coalition Provisional Authority; Stuart W. Bowen Jr., special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction; Timothy Carney, coordinator, Economic Transition in Iraq, State Department; David Oliver, former adviser, Iraq Ministry of Finance and former director, Management and Budget, Coalition Provisional Authority. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0128046

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASATRUCTURE _ Economic Development, Public Buildings and Emergency Management Subcommittee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget. Treasury Secretary Paulson. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

Other:

INDEPENDENT COLLEGES _ The National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities holds its 2007 meeting, ``Charting Our Course." Highlights: 9 a.m. Rep. Louie Gohmert, R-Texas. 9:45 a.m. Historian and author Michael Beschloss speaks on ``Great Presidents, Past and Present." Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

COAL TECHNOLOGY _ The Education Electric Institute, Electric Power Research Institute and the Coal Utilization Council hold a conference, ``The Power of Technology: Ensuring the Global Future of Coal." Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Keynote address: Rep. Rich Boucher. 12 p.m. Luncheon address - Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

FEDERAL BUDGET BRIEFINGS _ Highlights: 1 p.m. The DOE's National Nuclear Security Administration holds a media roundtable to discuss its FY08 budget request. 1000 Independence Ave. SW. Contact: 202-586-7371. Media must RSVP. Credentialed media only. 3 p.m. GSA Administrator Lurita Doan holds a telephone briefing on the FY08 budget for the General Services Administration. Call Deborah Ruiz, 202-208-0861 no later than 5 p.m. Monday for phone number and passcode.

FEDERAL BUDGET-RELATED EVENTS _ Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Assistant Secretary for Energy Efficiency & Renewable Energy Andy Karsner participates in a teleconference on the FC'08 budget request. Dial-in : (888) 529-1867. Conference ID : 8481873. 1 p.m. Acting Under Secretary for the National Nuclear Security Administration Tom DAgostino holds a teleconference to react to the FY'08 budget request.Call 202-586-7371 for more information. 4:15 p.m. Assistant Secretary for Nuclear Energy Dennis Spurgeon holds a teleconference to recat to the FY'08 budget request. Dial-in 888- 529-1867. Conference ID : 8482683.

SHOW BUSINESS _ The Motion Picture Association of America holds a symposium, The Business of Show Business. Highlights: 8 a.m. Video Address: California Govenor Arnold Schwarzenegger. Welcome: Dan Glickman, Chairman and CEO, MPAA. Remarks: Representative Charlie Rangel, Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means. Keynote: Actor Will Smith. Presentation: Why I Am a Filmmaker, Rob Meyer, Sayeeda Clarke, Alrick Brown, Graduate Film Division, Kanbar Institute of Film & Television, Tisch School of the Arts, New York University. 9:30 a.m. - 10:45 a.m. Panel 1: The Art and Economics of Show Business and Intellectual Property: How a Movie Gets Made. Participants include: Opening Remarks: Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.; by Ron Grover, Los Angeles bureau chief, Business Week, others. 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. Directors' luncheon. Welcome: Dan Glickman, Chairman and CEO, MPAA. Opening Address: Barry Meyer, Chairman & Chief Executive Officer of Warner Bros. Remarks: Sen. Patrick Leahy, Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate. Keynote: Michael Apted, President, of the Directors Guild of America. Director Luncheon.This event at the Hotel Monaco, 700 F Street NW, Second Floor, Paris Ballroom. NOTE: Luncheon is FULL. 2:15 p.m. Panel 3: The Future of Show Business: Entertainment in the Digital Age. Opening Remarks: Senattor Gordon Smith. Session is moderated by Bob Dowling, Former Editor-in-Chief and Publisher, The Hollywood Reporter; Founder, The Bob Dowling Group. Participants include: Reed Hastings, Founder and Chief Executive Officer, Netflix; and John Fithian, President, National Association of Theatre Owners. 5:30 p.m. The Chairmans Dinner, honoring Clint Eastwood, Recipient of the Jack Valenti Humanitarian Award. Note: Red Carpet Photo-Op at the Donald W. Reynolds Center, 8th and G Streets NW entrance. Media set-up/arrival at 5:30 p.m. Red Carpet at 6 p.m. Those wishing to participate in the photo-op must notify Cara Duckworth at cduckworthmpaa.org or 202-378-9144 to be assigned a credential. Credentials will be available on-site.Dinner is not open to the media, however, a pool camera will be available on-site.

HOMELAND SECURITY _ American Military University holds a two-day conference, ``Homeland Security: The Ripple Effect." Highlights: 8:15 a.m. Rep. Bennie Thompson. 9 a.m. Panel discussion on mass fatality management during a pandemic flu event. 12 p.m. Luncheon address - Mayor Patrick McCrory, of Charlotte, N.C., and member of the President's Homeland Security Advisory Council. 3:30 p.m.

DOJ_NMG_0128047

Panel discussion on local, state and national cooperation, with FEMA Director David Paulison, others. Location: National Press Club.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 9 a.m. Meeting of the House Republican Conference. Closed press. Location: Room HC-9, Capitol. Notes: Media availability with the GOP leadership, HC-9, Capitol, at about 10 a.m.

KATRINA _ 9 a.m. New Orleans public housing residents, others hold a news conference to call on the public and politicians to support their right to return to their homes damaged by Hurricane Katrina. Location: Room HC-8, Capitol.

QUAD DEFICITS _ 9 a.m. The Johns Hopkins Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS) will hold a forum, ``The Quad Deficits: Why They Matter and What We Can Do About Them." Participants: Peter G. Peterson, senior chairman and co-founder of the Blackstone Group; David Wighton, New York City bureau chief of the Financial Times; and Robert Guttman, CPFR director. Location: Room 500, Bernstein-Offit Building, 1717 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IMMIGRATION _ 9 a.m. - 11 a.m. The Migration Policy Institute holds a news conference to announce the launch of a National Center on Immigrant Integration Policy. Briefers include: Michael Fix, MPI Vice President and Director of Studies and Co-Director, National Center on Immigrant Integration Policy; Margie McHugh, Co-Director, National Center on Immigrant Integration Policy; and Demetrios Papademetriou, MPI President. Location: Migration Policy Institute Conference Room, 1400 16th St. NW, Suite 300, third floor.

CHINA-MILITARY _ 9:30 a.m. - 11 a.m. The Carnegie Endowment hosts a panel discussion on Chinas military modernization as the third in series ``Carnegie Debates: Reframing China Policy, regarding the most pressing issues in U.S.-China relations. Participants: Ambassador J. Stapelton Roy, Carnegie Endowment Board of Trustees; Dr. David Finkelstein, Director of Project Asia and the China Studies Center at The CNA Corporation; and Dr. Larry Wortzel, US-China Economic and Security Review Commission. Location: Room 562, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

IRAQ _ 10:15 a.m. Sen. Barack Obama, and Reps. Mike Thompson and Patrick Murphy hold a press conference on Iraq. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

ABU-GHRAIB-JORDAN _ 10:30 a.m. Hearing on defense motion to dismiss charges against Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan for alleged crimes at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. Location: Fort McNair, 4th and P Sts. SW.

HOYER _ 11 a.m. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing on the FY08 budget. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

PEACE-NONVIOLENCE _ 11 a.m. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, others, hold a news conference to announce reintroduction of a bill to create the Department of Peace and Nonviolence. Location: Cannon Terrace. Rain site: HC-7, Capitol.

EMPLOYEE CHOICE _ 11:15 a.m. AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, Rep. George Miller, Sen. Edward Kennedy, others, hold a news conference to introduce the Employee Free Choice Act to restore workers' ability to form unions and bargain with employers. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

CRIME AGENDA _ 11:30 a.m. Reps. Lamar Smith and J. Randy Forbes hold a news conference on the antiviolence crime agenda. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

GLOBALIZATION _ 12 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations hosts a panel, ``Has Globalization Passed Its Peak?" Panelists: Adam Segal, Maurice R. Greenberg Senior Fellow for China Studies, Council on Foreign Relationsl Rawi Abdelal, Associate Professor, Harvard Business School; and Marco Vicenzino, Founder and Director, Global Strategy Project. Location: World Bank J Building- J1- 050, 701 18th St. NW.

DEMOCRATIC LEADERSHIP _ 1 p.m. The House Democratic leadership hold a media availability. Participants: Majority Leader Steny Hoyer; Majority Whip James E. Clyburn; Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel; Caucus Vice Chairman John Larson; and Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

PARK SERVICE _ 2 p.m. Secretary of the Interior Dirk Kempthorne, National Park Service (NPS) Director Mary Bomar, NPS Regional Directors, and several NPS Superintendents will be available to the media to discuss the recently announced budget and NPS Centennial Initiative. Notes: Media should call 888-566-5778. Pass Code: 2230.

TURKEY _ 2 p.m. Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul holds a news conference to discuss U.S.-Turkish relations. Location: NPC Broadcast Operations Center, Suite 480, National Press Club.

SENATE-IRAQ _ 2:30 p.m. There will be a closed Senate briefing by members of the intelligence community on Iraq. Location: Room S-407, Capitol.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 3 p.m. House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam and Whip Roy Blunt hold a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room HC-9, Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0128048

SOCIAL SECURITY _ 3 p.m. Reps. Howard Berman, Howard McKeon, and Lloyd Doggett hold a news conference with others on the Social Security Fairness Act. Location: Room 2261, Rayburn.

INFLUENZA PANDEMIC _ 4 p.m. Assistant Labor Secretary Edwin Foulke Jr. holds a telphone media briefing on OSHA's ``Guidance on Preparing Workplaces for an Influenza Pandemic," guidance prepared by DOL and HHS support of President Bush's National Strategy for Pandemic Influenza Implementation Plan. Notes: Callin number: 800-475-8421; passcode: Pandemic Flu; leader: Kevin Ropp. Note: Callers will need both the passcode and leader's name to join the conference.

US-TAIWAN _ 5:30 p.m. The Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office, others, hold a reception marking the 5th anniversary of the Congressional Taiwan Caucus. Location: Room 2200, Rayburn.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Proposed Budget Includes $7.2 Million More For Guantanamo Cases 3
Acquitted "Virginia Jihad" Defendant Convicted Of Perjury, Obstruction 3
LATimes Says More Details About NSA Wiretapping Needed 4

Homeland Response:

Turner Broadcasting To Pay Boston $2 Million Over Cartoon Terror Scare 4
Tennessee Man Pleads Guilty To Possession Of Ricin 4
Louisiana Official Says Some Katrina Evacuee Children Not In School 4

War News:

Vote On Warner Resolution Falls Eleven Votes Short 5
Waxman Panel To Grill Bremer On Iraq Contracts 7
US, Iraqi Forces Prepare To Launch New Baghdad Security Plan 7
Iraqi Troops Kill Al-Sadr Aide 8
Administration Officials Playing Down Evidence On Iran's Role In Iraq 8
Assad Urges US-Syrian Cooperation On Iraq 9
Allies "Dawdle" On Aiding Iraq 9
Rice Announces Task Force On Iraqi Refugees 10
100th British Soldier Killed In Iraq 10
Watada Court Martial Opens 10
Afghan Ambassador Denounces Pakistani Haven For Taliban .. 10

DOJ:

Senate Hearing To Examine US Attorney Departures 10
DOJ Budget Includes Flat Funding For Several Flagship Programs 11
Gonzales Addresses SMU Law Students 11

Corporate Scandals:

Budget Includes Increase For SEC 12
Banks Appeal Ruling On Enron Investor Class Action 12
SEC Examines Front-Running Trading 12
Hyundai Chairman Sentenced To Three Years By South Korean Court 12
Former Fannie Mae Head Seeks Earlier Hearing Date 13
Donohue Says SEC Investigation Into Sunrise Lacks Merit 13

Criminal Law:

FBI Agent Acknowledges Errors In Earlier Libby Trial Testimony 13
California Agency Fined Councilman For Accepting Funds From Miller In 1992 15
Fumo Lashes Out At Expected Indictment, Vows To "Stand Up And Fight." 15
Florida Development Bribery Scheme Trial Begins Today 16
Man Sentenced To 8½ Years In Prison For FEMA Relief Fraud 16
Suspect In Boys' Abduction Charged With Molestation 16
States Consider Changes To Police Lineups 16
Videographer Nears Jail Record For Resisting Grant Jury 17
New Jersey Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Distribution 17
FBI Child Sex Sting Snares New York Elementary School Teacher 17
Study Finds Identity Fraud Down Since 2003 17
New DC Police Chief Challenged By Rise In Homicides 18
Barry Faces Possible Revocation Of Probation 18

Civil Law:

Jury Finds FBI Retaliated Against Whistle-blowing Agent 18
Trial Begins Over Fatal Crash Of Small Aircraft 19

Civil Rights:

Expert Will Not Testify At Mississippi Voting Rights Trial 19
FBI To Give Update On Civil Rights Cold Case Initiative 19
Rights Groups Warn Of Increase In White Supremacist Activity. 20
NAACP Calls For Limits On "No-Knock" Warrants After Atlanta Shooting 20
WPost Columnist Decries Anti-Semitism Charge 20

Antitrust:

Smithfield Complies With DOJ Request For Information On Premium Deal 21
Firms Trying To Beat Antitrust Clock Find Mixed Results 21
FTC Reaffirms Antitrust Ruling Against Rambus 21
Beatles, Apple Near Settlement Of iTunes Dispute 22
State Street To Purchase Investors Financial 22
Mills Corp. Receives Another Buyout Offer 23
Icahn Seeks Takeover Of Lear 23
EU Judge To Make Microsoft Ruling By September 23

Environment:

Pelosi, Dingell Reach Agreement On Global Warming Committee ... 23
Energy Department Considers Ethanol Reserve ... 24
Asarco Claims Mexican Owners Illegally Stripped Company's Assets ... 25
Extremely Cold Weather Makes News ... 25

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Visits El Salvador To Coordinate Anti-Gang Activities 25
New Jersey Man Accused Of Leading Multimillion-Dollar Drug Network ... 25
Authorities Say California Man Attempted To Smuggle Meth Aboard Hawaiian Airlines Flight ... 26
In New Jersey, Sentencing Of "Drug Kingpin" Expected Tomorrow ... 26
South Carolina Judge Refuses To Suppress Evidence In Drug Conspiracy Case ... 26
Attorneys For Accused Mexican Drug Kingpin May Try To Blame Brother ... 26
Convicted Officer Testifies In Former ATF Agent's Suit Against Chicago ... 26
ATF Agent Tells Of Life Undercover Infiltrating Motorcycle Gang27
California Officials Offer Reward For Illegal Guns ... 27
US Will Not Charge ATF Agents In Arlington Shooting ... 27

Immigration:

Report Highlights Role Of Immigrant Entrepreneurs ... 27
LATimes Urges Deportation For Convicted Illegal Immigrants.... 28

Congress-Administration:

Bush Presents Budget Plan As Blueprint To Balance Budget Without Raising Taxes ... 28
Administration Plans To Cut "Tax Gap" By $29.5 Billion ... 33
Bush Proposal Would Revamp FAA Funding ... 33
McConnell To Pressure Democrats On Judicial Nominations ... 33
9th Circuit Increases En Banc Reviews ... 33
Former Treasury Chief Criticitzes Bush's Insistence On Private Social Security Accounts ... 33
"Winners Could Turn Into Losers" Under Bush Healthcare Plan. 34
Senate Proposal Authorizes Space Intelligence Office ... 34
Pelosi Gets Use Of Larger Plane Than Hastert ... 34
Evan Thomas Says Reporters' Job Is To "Bash" Bush ... 34
Parties Seen As Reversing Roles In Senate ... 34
Roberts Offers Advice To Law Students ... 35

Other News:

Service Sector Continues Expansion ... 35
ABA Panel Recommends Diluting Code Of Judicial Conduct ... 35
Giuliani Files "Statement Of Candidacy" With FEC ... 35
More House Republicans Set To Announce Support for Romney37
Obama, Clinton Could Be No-Shows At Early Debates ... 37
Edwards Outlines Healthcare Plan, Says Tax Hike Will Be Needed To Fund Proposal ... 38
Edwards, Richardson Wow Democrats At Winter Meeting ... 39
Biden's "Backpedaling" Examined ... 39
Labor Groups Hopeful For Measure To Ease Union Membership39
Texas Plan For HPV Vaccination For School Girls Generates Controversy ... 39
Studies Showing Wealth Concentration Critiqued ... 40
Mecca Talks Seen As "Last Chance" To Avoid Palestinian Civil War ... 40
US Officials Says Pyongyang Prepared To Negotiate ... 41
US Embassy Warns Of Terrorist Threat In Sudan ... 41
US, Malaysia Resume Trade Talks ... 41
Indonesia Withholding Bird Flu Data ... 41
India Walks "Tightrope" In Washington Talks ... 41
US Firms Push For End To Cuban Embargo ... 41
US Urges Nicaragua To Destroy Missiles ... 42
Ban Faces Criticism Over Appointments, Slow Pace ... 42
China Cracks Down On Corruption In Shanghai ... 42
Russia Brings New Charges Against Khodorkovsky ... 42
LATimes Welcomes Mexico's Lifting Of Avocado Tariff ... 43

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 43

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 44

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0128051

TERRORISM NEWS:

Proposed Budget Includes $7.2 Million More For Guantanamo Cases. The Miami Herald (2/6, Rosenberg) reports, "President Bush's budget request published today includes plans to spend $7.2 million on salaries and expenses for civilian lawyers -- to both fend off legal challenges at home and help prosecute terrorist suspects at the war-crimes court at Guantánamo." The Herald continues, "Until release of the budget, the military commissions had been described as a military function -- handled by the Defense Department and soon to be supervised by a former Pentagon inspector general. … But an annex of the budget released by the White House today lists a supplemental request of $1,736,000 for the government's National Security Division, part of the Justice Department run by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … 'This request would provide the National Security Division $2 million to support the Department of Defense's prosecution of high-value detainees at Guantánamo via the process established by the military commission,' the 2007 supplemental request released today says." The Herald adds, "Bush announced in September that he had ordered the CIA to transfer 14 so-called high-value captives to the U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba, effectively putting them under Pentagon control. … They include Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, and a captive known as Hambali, who was allegedly an Islamic militant in Indonesia. … The budget request said the Justice Department's National Security Division 'will support the [Pentagon] effort by providing experienced assistant United States attorneys and paralegals.' … A Justice Department fact sheet explaining the supplemental budget request said the federal prosecutors, who are civilian lawyers, will get their assignments 'as soon as possible.' … The assignments, it said, 'will last a year or longer.' High-value prosecutions are expected to be more complex. The captives were held at so-called CIA 'black sites,' out of reach of the International Committee of the Red Cross." The Herald notes, "Separately, the Justice Department is seeking an additional $5.5 million for its civil division to fend off lawsuits filed by Guantánamo captives in the federal courts. … Civilian lawyers have filed habeas corpus petitions in U.S. District Court in Washington on behalf of several hundred captives -- and the Justice Department has been challenging them for years."

Budget Would Boost Funding For FISA Court. U.S. News and World Report (2/6) reports, "With the Bush administration's revelation that it will replace the controversial warrantless surveillance program conducted by the National Security Agency with a plan approved by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, the fiscal 2007 budget includes a $3.1 million increase to address what is expected to be a spike in FISA applications." US News continues, "FISA, the secret court that issues wiretap orders from Justice Department requests to conduct electronic surveillance and physical searches of suspected international terrorists or spies, already has had an increased workload since 9/11. … A senior justice official told U.S. News that the department's newly retooled National Security Division has streamlined the FISA application process dramatically, and the increased funds along with the quicker processing will allow the department to handle the new surveillance workload. … But 'it will mean more work for our office,' the official said."

CNET News (2/6, Broache) reports, "President Bush's proposed $2.9 trillion budget for next year calls for increases in some scientific research funding, along with boosts for counterterrorism surveillance and screening programs." CNET continues, "The overall budgets for the U.S. Departments of Justice and Homeland Security… saw slight boosts, with an emphasis on government screening and surveillance programs." CNET adds, "Within the Homeland Security department, the president proposed $1 billion for the so-called Secure Border Initiative, which includes plans for a 'virtual fence' composed of motion sensors, infrared cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles, or UAVs, that the administration hopes will help keep better tabs on illicit entrants. … Homeland Security also would receive a $21.9 million increase in funding for its Science and Technology Office of Innovation, which hopes to develop technologies that would create a more resilient electric grid and detect tunnels along the border, among other things. Overall funding levels for the Science and Technology directorate under Bush's proposal, however, would drop from $848 million for fiscal year 2007 to $799 million for the upcoming year."

Acquitted "Virginia Jihad" Defendant Convicted Of Perjury, Obstruction. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/6, Barakat) reports, "A Virginia man was convicted Monday of lying to a federal grand jury about his training with a Pakistani militant group, three years after he was acquitted of giving aid to the Taliban as part of a group that trained with paintball games. A jury in U.S. District Court convicted Sabri Benkahla, 31, of four felony counts including perjury and obstruction of justice." The AP adds, "An FBI agent testified that Benkahla's testimony was important needed because the bureau was investigating his links to suspected terrorists including Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, another U.S. citizen from Falls Church who was subsequently convicted of joining al-Qaida and plotting to assassinate President Bush." The Washington Post (2/6, B2, Markon, 690K) notes in "Virginia Briefing" that Benkahla "had been acquitted in 2004 of being a member of a 'Virginia jihad network' but appeared before the grand jury later that year," when he made the statements which led to the perjury and obstruction case.

DOJ_NMG_0128052

LATimes Says More Details About NSA Wiretapping Needed. The Los Angeles Times says in an editorial (2/6), "Slowly but surely, the National Security Agency's eavesdropping on Americans suspected of ties with foreign terrorists is being brought under the rule of law. But the Bush administration still owes not just Congress but the country some straight answers about the program." Last week, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales "agreed to provide Congress details of the program's new arrangement for being monitored by a special court set up by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Gonzales' latest concession comes a few weeks after the administration abruptly reversed itself and said that it could, after all, conduct surveillance of international calls and e-mails under the court's supervision." But the administration "has still refused to spell out whether the court will approve individual requests for wiretapping authority -- as it traditionally has done -- or just sign off on more general requests. This is the crucial question."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Turner Broadcasting To Pay Boston $2 Million Over Cartoon Terror Scare. USA Today (2/6, 2A, Koch, 2.27M) reports, "Boston won an apology and a $2 million settlement Monday from Turner Broadcasting and a marketing company for a campaign that caused a terrorism scare last week. The city, however, has lost ground on the comedy front. Cartoonists, comedians and entrepreneurs are poking fun at Boston officials for dispatching bomb squads and shutting down bridges and highways Wednesday in reaction to blinking electronic devices left on bridges and subway stations." USA notes, "The devices caused no stir in nine other cities where they were posted in recent weeks."

Tennessee Man Pleads Guilty To Possession Of Ricin. The AP (2/6, Rucker) reports from Nashville, TN, "A man pleaded guilty Monday to federal charges of possessing the potentially deadly poison ricin, firearms silencers and explosives." The AP continues, "William Matthews entered his plea in a deal with prosecutors that calls for a prison term of 7 years and 3 months when he is sentenced April 27. … The ricin charge could have been punished by up to life in prison, and the weapons charges each carried a maximum sentence of 10 years. … 'Mr. Matthews, I think, chose this (deal) as the best of the available options,' his lawyer, public defender Sumter Camp, said after court." The AP adds, "Neither the defendant nor the authorities explained why Matthews had the ricin, which is illegal to possess except for research, and the silencers and explosives, which are legal but were not properly registered. … Matthews was charged after a tip from his estranged wife led police and federal agents to search his property May 31. They found the ricin in a sealed baby jar, two functional pipe bombs, five gun silencers, three blasting caps and bomb-making materials."

Louisiana Official Says Some Katrina Evacuee Children Not In School. USA Today (2/6, Johnson, 2.27M) reports the leader "of Louisiana's largest school system says she believes that up to 200 children in the state's biggest hurricane evacuee camp are not registered in local schools. And she says the U.S. government — citing privacy laws — is doing little to help officials identify the youths." East Baton Rouge Parish School Superintendent Charlotte Placide "says the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) has refused to give school officials direct access to information about youths in Renaissance Village, a trailer park for families where 1,200-2,000 people live." Placide said, "The law requires students to be in school. We have families in the FEMA trailer park who concern me greatly."

Slow Pace Of New Orleans Reconstruction Criticized. In his Washington Post column (2/5, A17), Eugene Robinson says, "It's beyond frustrating to hear well-meaning bureaucrats cite all the reasons that so little has been done to rebuild this ruined city and the rest of the Gulf Coast -- why, for example, out of more than 100,000 Louisiana households that have applied to the state government for their share of $7 billion in federal reconstruction funds, fewer than 400 have received their money." The three senators "who flew down to conduct" the Senate Homeland Security Committee field hearing in New Orleans, Chairman Joseph Lieberman (I-Conn.), home-state champion Mary Landrieu (D-La.) and presidential hopeful Barack Obama (D-Ill.) – "were remarkably focused and patient, given the circumstances. I got so exasperated that I had to let my mind wander, and it settled on Brownian motion." That's "where the recovery of New Orleans stands, or floats. Factors such as subparagraph-level provisions of federal programs, fine-print details of a contract signed by the state government and shifting alliances in municipal politics -- minuscule things, compared with the size of the job that must be done -- push from all sides, and the result is a frenzied stasis."

DOJ_NMG_0128053

WAR NEWS:

Vote On Warner Resolution Falls Eleven Votes Short. ABC World News (2/5, story 3, 1:55, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "Senate Republicans filibustered the anti-surge resolution, preventing it from being formally debated or coming to a vote." Republicans "are doing this, they say, because Democrats won't let them introduce, under the same rules, a different resolution opposing any cuts in funding for troops in Iraq." Sen. Mitch McConnell: "We are, in effect, being denied, a fair process for this extremely important debate."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Levey, 850K) reports Republicans "complained that Reid was giving preferential treatment to a resolution by Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) to require benchmarks for Iraqi progress. The GOP asked for similar consideration for a measure by Sen. Judd Gregg." The AP (2/6, Espo) notes "the 49-47 vote was 11 short of the 60 needed to go ahead with debate, and left the fate of the measure uncertain." The resolution Republicans want to vote on, by Sen. Gregg, "says Congress should neither cut nor eliminate funding for troops in the field. That measure takes no position on the war or the president's decision to deploy additional forces."

USA Today (2/6, Kiely, 2.27M) notes "all three Republican co-sponsors of the resolution opposed it in the 49-47 vote. The only Republicans voting for that resolution were Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Susan Collins of Maine, both of whom face potentially difficult re-election bids next year. … Sens. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., Mary Landrieu, D-La., Mel Martinez, R-Fla., and John McCain, R-Ariz., did not vote."

The New York Times (2/6, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.16M) says the Republican "show of unity, with war critics including Mr. Warner of Virginia and Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, siding with the leadership, lent some credibility to Republican claims that Democrats were being unfair." The Times adds, "In addition to the resolution introduced by Mr. Gregg, declaring that Congress should not cut off financing for forces in Iraq, Republican leaders had sought a Democratic commitment for a vote on another alternative, one introduced by Senator…McCain." That measure "would set 11 conditions for the Iraqi government if it wanted to retain American support. The Republican approach would need 60 votes for passage."

The Washington Post (2/6, A1, Weisman, Murray, 690K) reports, "The Democratic leadership gave Republicans a choice: Allow all…versions to come to a vote, with a simple majority needed for passing any of them, or debate and vote on the Warner and McCain resolutions, with both needing 60 votes to pass." McConnell "wanted all four resolutions to meet a 60-vote threshold, for a simple reason: Both Democrats and Republicans think the only measure that could attract 60 votes is Gregg's, because Democrats would be concerned about the political ramifications of appearing to take action that might harm troops in battle." The Washington Times (2/6, Hurt, 88K) says GOP Sen. Arlen Specter "called Mr. Reid's squelching of resolutions 'an effort to short-circuit debate.'"

McClatchy (2/6, Talev) also notes that after the vote, which "fell well short of the 60…that the Democrats needed to move to debate under Senate rules," Democrats "shot back that they'll go beyond nonbinding resolutions against the troop buildup in the months ahead, including efforts to attach strings to war appropriations. 'You can run but you can't hide,' said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev."

NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 3, 2:00, Harwood, 9.87M) reported, "We are learning that President Bush may have more ability to hold Republicans together on Iraq than many assumed after the 2006 elections." And the CBS Evening News (2/5, story 4, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) said the Senate debate "doesn't seem to be going according to the Democrats' plan." CBS (Attkisson) added, "Not at all." The President "has been warning Congress against passing critical resolutions and today also cautioned against setting timetables for withdrawing troops. … That argument has been hitting home even with some Republicans who are against sending more troops -- and there are quite a few of them. But privately expressing doubt is very different from casting a vote against a President's war plan."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (2/5, Hume), Fred Barnes of the Weekly Standard said Sen. McConnell "is fantastic on this maneuvering and the procedural stuff. He knows that the minority has the advantage. He once blocked a campaign finance reform bill by filibustering sending the Senate conferees to the conference to decide on the bill -- very brilliant."

Roll Call (2/6, Stanton) reports, "Following Republicans' successful filibuster…Senate Democrats are launching a national public relations campaign aimed at tying GOP moderates and incumbents facing difficult 2008 re-election races to Bush in the public's mind, Democratic leadership aides said Monday." The "final vote was something of a surprise, with 49 Members voting to begin debate. Sen. Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) joined 46 Republicans in filibustering the bill." Although "neither Reid's operation nor the DSCC is planning to delve into the paid media world at this point, one source noted that the activist group VoteVets ran an ad opposing the war during the Super Bowl and that MoveOn.org also is expected to play a role in the debate."

In his "Washington Sketch" column, Dana Milbank writes in the Washington Post (2/6, A2, 690K), "Those waiting for the much-anticipated Iraq debate in the Senate will have to wait a while longer." Republicans, "eager to avoid a public airing of views on the unpopular war, raised procedural objections. Democratic leaders, figuring that public pressure would force Republicans to capitulate, refused to meet their demand that all resolutions on the Iraq war get 60 votes to pass." And "each side got tangled up in talking points as it tried to blame the other for preventing a discussion."

DOJ_NMG_0128054

On Fox News' Special Report (2/5, Garrett) reported said yesterday's events change "the onus, the political pressure on who is trying to put themselves in the most advantageous political situation on this debate. Two weeks ago Democrats thought that a vote opposing the troops surge would be the most advantageous, they'd split Republicans. Now Democrats are moving more towards a debate about cutting off funds. Republicans want to accelerate that, but Democrats are not organized. So in the end, Democrats feel more political pressure on this question of future funding than they do on opposing the troop surge."

On Fox News' Special Report roundtable (2/5, Hume), Morton Kondracke of Roll Call said, "If things go badly, we will revisit, I predict, the issue of funding." Brit Hume responded, "I know, but wouldn't it be easier for the White House if a whole bunch of Democratic senators, who are already on record, even on a non-biding resolution, saying that they don't want to cut funds?" Kondracke added, "Yeah, it'll help."

On MSNBC's Hardball (2/5, Matthews), GOP Sen. David Vitter outlined the Republican line on the Iraq resolution standoff, saying, "I support multiple votes on the Senate floor to give senators every opportunity to clearly articulate where they're coming from. The obstacle…isn't having a vote. It's how many different resolutions and votes we're going to be able to have. For some reason, Sen. Reid is adamant at holding it to just two. And there is a great diversity of opinion, perhaps particularly on the Republican side." Also on MSNBC's Hardball (2/5, Matthews), Sen. Jack Reed explained the Democratic position, saying Republicans "should get a chance to put up their option. What they want to do is put up two options and attempt to confuse what is very straightforward and simple. … This is a vote of whether you support or you don't support the President's proposed increase in forces in Iraq."

On CNN's "The Situation Room" (2/5, Blitzer), Sen. Trent Lott said, "We have to change the status quo in Iraq. We can't just summarily pull out. Nobody wants that. We have to support our troops that are there or are headed there. I think, broadly, people support that. Then, the question is: What do we do? You know, the President has a proposal, a plan. Maybe it's not, you know, a perfect plan. I don't deny that. But he -- he has made some recommendations. And we should look at that. I think we should give it a chance."

The Financial Times (2/6, Daniel) says the Senate debate is "the most significant sign of Congress reasserting itself against a powerful executive since the start of the war. … The debate forms part of an intensifying battle over Mr Bush's exercise of executive power. Congressional concern has prompted a White House compromise over its terrorist surveillance programme. But when it comes to the conduct of the war and a more direct challenge to the commander-in-chief's power, this debate goes to the heart of the administration's philosophical view of its authority."

Half Of Democratic Senators Who Backed War In 2002 Regret Vote. The Politico (2/5, Lowe, Reilly, Budoff) reported, "Half of the current Democratic senators who backed President Bush's call to war in 2002 say they now regret authorizing the invasion of Iraq, according to a Politico survey." But "while nine of 18 Democrats who backed Bush now wish they had not, Republicans had fewer misgivings -- only three voiced regret. The lack of a similar GOP groundswell highlights the dilemma that some senators from the president's party face as they seek re-election amid sagging voter support for the war -- and, specifically, the president's plan to send 21,000 additional troops to Iraq."

Powell's UN Speech On Iraqi WMD Remembered. The CBS Evening News (2/5, story 5, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "And how is this for irony? Today's Capitol Hill confrontation began four years to the day after then-Secretary of State Colin Powell made a dramatic speech at the UN to make the case that Iraq was hiding weapons of mass destruction. It was a brilliant performance, enough to sell the Congress and the nation on going to war. But before long, it became an embarrassment." Secretary Colin Powell (February 5, 2003): "What we're giving you are facts and conclusions based on solid intelligence." CBS (Martin) added, "That statement about the evidence Saddam Hussein was hiding weapons of mass destruction was made by one of the most trusted men in America. Weapons inspector David Kay remembers being impressed." But "after the invasion, Kay was put in charge of finding the WMD and he found out where those diagrams came from." Kay: "It was a single source. A source that the US intelligence had never at that point talked to, didn't know his name. In fact, he was a fabricator." Martin: "The intelligence about Iraq was not all wrong. On the eve of the invasion, CIA analysts, including Paul Pilar warned the aftermath could get ugly. … But, says former CIA officer, and now CBS consultant, John Brennan, the Administration passed over that intelligence." Brennan: "I don't think there was enough attention paid to those assessments that said after the war, after the invasion, there's going to be difficulty in the streets of Iraq and in Baghdad."

More Commentary. The Washington Post (2/6, A16, 690K) editorializes, "Most senators seem to be aiming to position themselves against their domestic competitors -- in the case of Democrats such as Barack Obama or Joseph R. Biden Jr. -- or cover themselves with voters who are angry about the reverses in the war, in the case of Republicans such as Gordon Smith or Susan Collins. The most overtly political posture may be that of Hillary Rodham Clinton, who petulantly called on President Bush and Congress to 'end this war' -- whatever that means -- before the next president takes office, presumably so that it will not trouble the administration she hopes to lead." The war "will not end before the next president takes office. Mr. Bush's surge is unlikely to produce a breakthrough toward peace; in fact the violence may continue to worsen. All the same, the United States may not be able to withdraw from Iraq without triggering worse consequences than those that might arise from remaining. In short, the country needs a strategy for defending its interests in Iraq for years to come. That perspective, and not the American political calendar, is what Congress ought to be focused on."

DOJ_NMG_0128055

Edward N. Luttwak, a fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, writes in the New York Times (2/6, 1.16M), "The sooner President Bush can get his extra troops for a 'surge' in Iraq, the sooner he will be able to announce that all American troops are coming home because of the inevitable failure of the Iraqi government to 'live up to its side of the bargain.'" Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "was induced to issue promises -- particularly in terms of government troops taking on Shiite militias -- that he cannot possibly fulfill. Mr. Maliki, it seems, simply agreed to whatever was asked of him, to humor the White House and retain American support for a little while longer." Luttwak concludes that "in any case, it is time for the Iraqis to make their own history."

E.J. Dionne, in the Washington Post (2/6, A17, 690K), writes that Bush supporters are "saying that the resolution is meaningless and that true opponents of the war should prove their sincerity by cutting off funding altogether. But they are doing all they can to keep the Senate from even voting on a bipartisan anti-surge resolution that would send a powerful message to Bush that most Americans have lost faith in his bungled war policy. … The anti-surge resolution is a necessary first step, which is why those who are against a genuine change in our Iraq policy are fighting so hard to stop it."

Waxman Panel To Grill Bremer On Iraq Contracts. USA Today (2/6, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "Democrats begin their scrutiny of contracts in Iraq today by grilling the top civilian official in Iraq after the 2003 invasion." Paul Bremer, the former head of the Coalition Provisional Authority, "testifies today before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee about the billions of dollars his agency spent in Iraq. It will be his first appearance on Capitol Hill since he left office more than two years ago. It's all part of the examination of the Bush administration's conduct in Iraq that Democrats promised after regaining control of Congress." The committee's chairman, Rep. Henry Waxman, "is a longtime critic of the administration's handling of the Iraq war and reconstruction contracts. As head of the committee, Waxman has the power to force officials to testify and hand over documents, as well as to decide what the panel will investigate."

The Washington Times (2/6, Miller, 88K) notes "Waxman last week conducted a hearing on charges of White House meddling in the work of government climate-change scientists. He vowed more hearings into what he described as the abuses of power and taxpayer money by the Bush administration."

The New York Times (2/6, Shenon, 1.16M) profiles Waxman, in a largely positive story titled "As New 'Cop On The Beat,' Congressman Starts Patrol." Says the Times, "Halliburton? Tobacco executives? Vice President Dick Cheney? You've been warned." Waxman "is promising the sort of oversight that the Bush administration has not experienced before. … The congressman, a 67-year-old grandfather of four, would strike no one -- at least no one meeting him for the first time -- as a candidate for the role of Congress's most aggressive muckraker. But the liberal Nation magazine has called him the Democrats' Eliot Ness, and Republicans who have tangled with him say the description is apt."

Bremer Insists He Always Thought US Didn't Have Enough Troops In Iraq. The Politico (2/5, Allen) interviewed Bremer, who said, "I felt right from the start that we were the government of Iraq and the most fundamental response of any government is to provide security for its people. We, in my view, did not have sufficient troops to do that. It was protecting the people. It was guarding pipelines and electrical power lines and patrolling the border. All of the things that needed to be done, I thought we were stretched too thin." Speaking of Bush, Bremer said, "There probably were times when he was very direct and said: If you need more troops, I'll send them to you. I remember many times when they simply said: We have enough troops to accomplish our mission."

The Washington Post (2/6, A9, Chandrasekaran, 690K) reports, "While deep divisions remain about Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq, there is near-unanimity among Democrats and Republicans that the United States needs to roll back key political and economic decisions that Bremer's Coalition Provisional Authority made." Bremer "has become something of a bipartisan-consensus candidate among those looking for officials to hold responsible for what has occurred in Iraq, eliciting that sort of opprobrium once reserved for Donald H. Rumsfeld." However, "some who worked for Bremer in Baghdad contend that he is a scapegoat for Bush administration decisions that were out of his control."

US, Iraqi Forces Prepare To Launch New Baghdad Security Plan. Coverage of the new security

DOJ_NMG_0128056

crackdown in Baghdad noted its backdrop of continuing violence and doubts about the selection of a little-known Iraqi general to command his country's side of the effort. The AP (2/5, Reid) reports, "Iraqi troops set up new checkpoints and an Iraqi general took command — indications that the much-awaited operation to restore peace to the capital is gearing up nearly a month after it was announced. With little sign of an end to the carnage, many Iraqis have begun complaining that the security drive has been too slow in starting, allowing extremists free rein to launch spectacular attacks that have killed nearly 1,000 in the past week. ... With so much at stake, U.S. commanders have moved methodically to plan the operation and assemble the force, eager to avoid the mistakes that accompanied two failed crackdowns last year."

NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 5, 1:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "In Iraq today, at least 25 people are dead after several car bombs in Baghdad as Iraqi and US forces start to accept up their newest plan for securing the capital city." NBC (Engel) added, "Today US and Iraqi forces launch what they are describing as the biggest, most comprehensive offensive yet here in Baghdad. What is different about the plan this time is that American forces are establishing small, forward operating bases…across the city." US and Iraqi forces "not only go out from here on patrols during the day but then return and live together on the same base at night."

On its front page, the Washington Post (2/6, A1, Partlow, 690K) says the new plan "rests on the assumption that US troops can win the trust of a wary population by protecting civilians trapped amid sectarian warfare." In addition, the plan also offers "a chance to cultivate Iraqis as sources of information about the violence entangling their neighborhoods," but soldiers "in a task force from the 1st Battalion, 26th Infantry Regiment, who have patrolled Baghdad for months, say that trying to gain cooperation from Iraqi civilians is a thankless struggle." The Post adds, "The selection of [Lt. Gen. Abboud] Gambar, a relatively unknown officer, was greeted with skepticism by some Iraqi and U.S. officials. But an aide to Maliki said the prime minister remains confident in his choice and that Gambar has the support of coalition commanders. During a meeting last month between Maliki and Lt. Gen. Graeme Lamb, the senior British general in Iraq, Lamb pronounced Gambar a 'good man,' the aide said." The Washington Times/AP (2/6, Yacoub) says Gambar "was named to the top position under pressure from the United States after it rejected Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's first choice, Lt. Gen. Mohan al-Freiji."

In addition, the Financial Times (2/6, Negus) says "a weekend of violence" in Baghdad "may undercut Shia support for the operations, particularly as many believe the US is focusing too heavily in its new offensive on Shia militias."

Report Says Iraqi Forces Lack Training, Equipment To Replace US Troops. USA Today (2/6, 1A, Michaels, 2.27M) reports in a front page article that "getting Iraqi forces trained, motivated and taking the lead in the fight against insurgents and illegal militias has been a struggle for the US military." Meanwhile, a "major US intelligence report released last Friday said that Iraqi security forces lack the training, equipment and skills necessary to replace US troops." The National Intelligence Estimate warned that, if US troops were withdrawn in the next 12 to 18 months, "this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq."

Iraqi Troops Kill Al-Sadr Aide. The New York Times (2/6, Oppel, 1.16M) reports, following AP coverage by one day, "The director of the political office in Diyala Province for the powerful anti-American Shiite militia leader Moktada al-Sadr [Ali Khazim al-Hamdani] was shot and killed by troops during a raid on Sunday, a Sadr political spokesman said Monday." A US military statement "said Iraqi troops had killed a leader of 'rogue' and criminal elements of Mr. Sadr's Mahdi Army in Diyala who had directed attacks on American forces as well as "kidnappings, assassinations and other violence targeting Iraqi civilians and Iraqi police." Other sources differ on the nationality of those who killed Al-Hamdani: the previous day's AP coverage quoted an Al-Sadr spokesman who identified Al-Hamdani's killers as "U.S. forces." The Washington Post (2/6, A13, Partlow, 690K) reports the killers as "Iraqi soldiers, backed by U.S. advisers." The Times implicitly questions the US military statement's allegation of Al-Hamdani's "rogue" status, saying, "Some American officials familiar with Diyala, a volatile province north of Baghdad, have said that [he] provided intelligence to the American military, beginning last summer."

Administration Officials Playing Down Evidence On Iran's Role In Iraq. The Christian Science Monitor (2/6, LaFranchi, 59K) reports, "In an atmosphere of sharp skepticism about intelligence and heightened sensitivity to saber rattling since the Iraq invasion," the Bush administration is "signaling a more cautious tone toward Iran." Senior officials from the White House, State Department, and Pentagon are now "playing down" the evidence the US possesses of "nefarious" Iranian involvement in Iraq. They are "also insisting the US wants to work out problems with Tehran diplomatically." A "repeated delay" in a "promised" presentation of evidence against Iran "reflects the administration's desire to get things right, and to neither overplay nor underestimate involvement," officials say. National security adviser Stephen Hadley, Friday told reporters that "the truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts." But the "moderated tone" also "suggests an administration still smarting over memories of the earlier botched campaign to justify taking on Saddam Hussein, some experts say."

DOJ_NMG_0128057

Iraqi Officials Linked To Kidnapping Of Iranian Diplomat. The New York Times (2/6, A8, Glanz, 1.16M) reports an Iranian diplomat was "abducted Sunday evening when his convoy was stopped by men with official Defense Ministry identification" in Baghdad, senior Iraqi and American officials said Monday, "raising serious questions about whether government forces themselves were involved in the abduction." A senior Iraqi official "said that the credentials initially appeared to be genuine but that investigators later received conflicting information about whether the men had been dismissed from the ministry but somehow kept their identification." When asked about indications that an Iranian diplomat had been abducted in Baghdad, Mohammad al Hosseini, an Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman in Tehran, said he could not confirm the reports. However, the Times says "if the kidnappers' credentials turn out to be genuine, there will be enormous pressure on the Iraqi government to recover the diplomat and capture all of those involved."

US May Seek Additional Sanctions Against Iran. The AP (2/6) reports the Bush administration "will push for more U.N. Security Council sanctions against Iran if Tehran continues to ignore council demands for suspension of the country's uranium enrichment program," the State Department said Monday. Assistant Secretary McCormack Iran appears to be continuing "down the path of isolation" by its recent announcement of stepped up installation of centrifuges. McCormack said the US would seek "incremental" sanctions at the U.N. "should the standoff continue, though he did not specify what they might be or the exact timing of any action."

Iran Installs 300 Centrifuges At Natanz Site. The Washington Post/AP (2/6, A12) reports, "Shrugging off the threat of tougher U.N. sanctions, Iran has set up more than 300 centrifuges in two uranium enrichment units at its underground Natanz complex," diplomats and officials said Monday. The move "potentially opens the way for larger-scale enrichment that could be used to build nuclear warheads." It also "poses a direct challenge to the U.N. Security Council."

Opinion On Engaging Iran Divided. Retired Air Force captain and former counterintelligence consultant in Iraq, Dr. Richard Saccone, writes in USA Today (2/6, 10A, 2.27M) that "an objective look at the ominous threat from Iran provides a clear solution to the policy the United States must pursue." Iran, he says, is "easily the most significant source of terror worldwide, providing financing, training, advice, support and supplies to its proxy Hezbollah as well as other groups as far away as Asia," which makes it "a major opponent in the war on terror." In addition, Iran "has increased efforts to undermine the US mission in Iraq through operations in the south as well as in Baghdad." Therefore, Saccone concludes, "The stakes are far too high to allow Iran to buy any more time through feigned receptivity to diplomacy" and "must be confronted quickly and persistently."

Meanwhile, in an editorial, USA Today (2/6, 10A, 2.27M) says the United States "needs a fresh approach" on Iran. An emerging US strategy in the Middle East "looks a lot like containment. Rather than direct military confrontation or outright appeasement, the Administration has been building up points of leverage to isolate and pressure the Iranian regime." President Bush "has been talking tough," while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "has been lining up Sunni allies." While "all are reasonable steps," the newspaper says "a vital part is missing: dialogue."

Assad Urges US-Syrian Cooperation On Iraq. ABC World News (2/5, story 4, 3:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Tonight, we have a rare and exclusive interview with a man the Bush administration says is part of the problem in Iraq, Syria's President, Bashar Assad." ABC's Diane Sawyer, who spoke with Assad in Damascus, added, "There are a chorus of voices in the United States saying that talking to Syria is the way to end the war in Iraq." Assad told ABC, "The problem in Iraq is political, and talking to Syria…means talking to all the other parties inside Iraq and outside Iraq… It's not only about Syria. So, stopping the violence should be related to the political dialogue." However, Assad also said Syria doesn't "expect that [the US is] going to, after nearly four years of occupation, they haven't learned their lesson. They've stopped the dialogue. I think it's too late for them to move toward that." Asked about reports that insurgents are entering Iraq through Syria, Assad said the US needs "to stop looking for scapegoats and whipping boys." When asked what steps Syria can take to tightened control of the border, he responded, "You are the greatest power in the world and you can't control your border with Mexico. How do you want Syria to control its border with Iraq?"

The Washington Times/AP (2/6, Keath) reports briefly on Assad's interview with ABC News.

Iraqi Shiite Leader Says US Urged To Hold Talks With Iran. The New York Times (2/6, A8, Fathi, 1.16M) reports a senior Iraqi Shiite leader "said Monday that his country had urged Iran to hold talks with the United States and that such talks were important for the security of the region." Speaking to reporters in Tehran after meeting with Iranian national security chief, Ali Larijani, Abdel Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite leaders, said, "Given the special conditions in the region, talks between the United States and Iran are of the utmost importance" and that negotiations between Iran and the United States "are useful for the whole region."

Allies "Dawdle" On Aiding Iraq. The Washington Times (2/6, Dinan, 88K) reports, "Foreign countries are billions of dollars delinquent on their pledges to help Iraq rebuild, and four years after the war began, the international reconstruction effort is still mostly funded by the United States. Some of the biggest deadbeats are Iraq's oil-rich neighbors, such as Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, which are both about a half-billion dollars in arrears, and the United Arab Emirates, which has failed to make good on one penny of a $215 million promise, according to Iraqi government statistics. ... Of $15 billion in initial pledges at the Madrid donors' conference in 2003 and in follow-up conferences, foreign donors have made good on about $4 billion." Even the US "is the most delinquent of any nation in nominal terms, with $6.4 billion still outstanding on the U.S. pledge of $18.4 billion, although the $12 billion the United States has sent is far and away the most of any country. ... The Defense Department's Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, Stuart W. Bowen Jr., in a new report last week, said international funding is reaching a turning point where those bilateral foreign donations will become more critical as the existing funds managed by the World Bank and United Nations become exhausted."

DOJ_NMG_0128058

Rice Announces Task Force On Iraqi Refugees. AFP (2/6) reports Secretary of State Rice Monday announced the creation of a task force "to tackle the mounting Iraq refugee crisis, after Washington came under criticism for not doing enough to help millions of people displaced by the war it unleashed nearly four years ago." The task force, which will be headed by Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky, will "coordinate US assistance for Iraqi refugees and internally displaced persons and "devise strategies for Iraqis at risk because of their work with the US government," Assistant Secretary of State McCormack said. After coming under "growing criticism for taking in fewer than 500 Iraqi refugees since leading the 2003 invasion," McCormack last week said Washington was prepared to take in "a fairly significant number" of Iraqi refugees, but he declined to provide figures.

100th British Soldier Killed In Iraq. AFP (2/5) reports, "A British soldier was killed by a roadside bomb in southern Iraq, the 100th to die in military action in the violence-scarred country, the Ministry of Defence said. The bomb exploded near the US consulate in the main city of Basra ... There has been criticism in the past that British troops deployed in both Iraq and Afghanistan have not been sufficiently protected by their existing armoured vehicles."

Watada Court Martial Opens. The New York Times (2/6, Yardley, 1.16M) reports, "A court-martial started here on Monday against an Army officer who refused to serve in Iraq last summer because, he has said, the war is illegal. ... Many enlisted soldiers have faced discipline for refusing to serve in Iraq. Lieutenant Watada is the first officer to refuse to do so publicly. He could face up to four years in prison and be dishonorably discharged if convicted on all counts. The case has become a rallying point for antiwar groups, and scores of Lieutenant Watada's supporters waved signs on Monday at a highway overpass outside Fort Lewis. ... His prospects appear uncertain. The judge, Lt. Col. John Head, reinforced on Monday an earlier ruling that Lieutenant Watada could not base his defense on his contention that the war is illegal."

Afghan Ambassador Denounces Pakistani Haven For Taliban. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/6, A16, 2.04M), Afghan Ambassador to the US Said Jawad writes, "Pakistan's recent proposal to fence and lay landmines along its 1,500-mile Afghanistan border is impractical, ineffective and irrelevant to the problem of terrorism and the Taliban. Terrorism will be contained only if we end the institutional support for extremism and strengthen traditional leadership in our region. ... the border is not where the problem lies. Terrorist sanctuaries in Pakistan are the real threat to regional stability and global security. Such sanctuaries are breeding grounds for extremism and violence."

DOJ:

Senate Hearing To Examine US Attorney Departures. The Financial Times (2/6, Masters) reports, "The current mid-term turn-over in US attorneys is unprecedented and could seriously disrupt pending investigations, witnesses plan to testify at today's Senate judiciary committee hearing on whether the Bush administration is politicising the appointment process for top prosecutors." The Times continues, "Traditionally, US attorneys are named by the president and confirmed by the Senate, although 'interim' appointees could serve for 120 days without confirmation. … Last year a little noticed amendment to the Patriot Act reauthorisation allowed the president to make 'interim' appointments that lasted indefinitely. … Since then, 13 of the 93 US attorneys have left and at least seven of them were asked to leave by officials in Washington. The departures include the top lawyers in New Mexico, San Diego, Arkansas, Nevada, Washington state and Arizona, according to senators and Justice Department sources." The Times adds, "Democrats have described most of them as respected prosecutors who enjoyed the esteem of their subordinates and were reportedly asked to leave to make room for politically connected insiders. … Senator Chuck Schumer, the New York Democrat, will chair a hearing this morning on the issue. He said: 'The highly unusual recent flurry of firings of many well-respected US attorneys not only raises some flags, but also requires some explanations.' … Mark Pryor, Democratic senator from Arkansas, planned to testify about the recent appointment of a protege of Karl Rove as interim US attorney in his state. Several other witnesses gave advance copies of their written testimony to the Financial Times. … 'We have never seen the type of turnover now in progress, where the attorney-general, not the president, is asking mid-term that demonstrably capable US attorneys submit their resignations so that Washington insiders may be appointed in their place,' Laurie Levenson, a Loyola law professor, planned to say." The Times notes, "Mary Jo White, a former US attorney from New York, wrote that turnover has a price. 'Changing a United States attorney invariably causes disruption and loss of traction in cases and investigations,' she planned to testify. … Justice Department officials declined to make deputy attorney-general Paul McNulty's testimony available. But they have said the Bush administration is not trying to circumvent the traditional appointment process and will seek Senate confirmation for all replacement US attorneys."

DOJ_NMG_0128059

DOJ Budget Includes Flat Funding For Several Flagship Programs. Government Computer News (2/6, Dizard) reports, "The draft Justice Department IT spending plan calls for increases in various FBI and department technology projects seeded throughout the department's overall discretionary funding request of $21.8 billion, according to the department's press release. … Detailed funding proposals point to flat or declining funding levels for several flagship programs, such as the Justice Information Sharing Technology program. That project, which covers IT investments across the department, is set to see its total new budget authority dwindle from $103 million in fiscal 2007 to $101 million next year." GCN adds, "The JIST account covers signature programs like the Joint Automated Booking System, the Justice Consolidated Office Network, the Litigation Case Management System, the Law Enforcement Information Sharing Program and the Unified Financial Management System that help hold the department's largely independent bureaus together. … Justice's CIO, Vance Hitch, controls the JIST account and is in position to use it to harmonize the various bureaus' operations. … But Justice's press release touted a $514 million boost to Interpol's links with state and local agencies. Using different yardsticks for the department's IT spending, Justice claimed that the draft budget, when taken as a whole, included $74.5 million in funds for new IT projects. … Justice claims a total IT program increase figure of $133.2 million for new IT projects including projects affecting several department components. That statement in the department's press materials was not reflected in detailed budget documents."

Government Executive (2/6, Pulliam) reports that "the budget identified agencies that will provide information security services to others as part of the Office of Management and Budget's 'lines of business' effort to consolidate back-end IT systems across government. The Office of Personnel Management, U.S. Agency for International Development and the Defense Department will provide shared service centers for security awareness training, and the Environmental Protection Agency and the Justice Department will offer centers for meeting the reporting requirements in a federal law -- the Federal Information Security Management Act."

DOJ Programs Included Among Budget "Losers." An analysis of the proposed budget by the Fresno Bee (2/6, Doyle) includes a list of budget winners and losers. Among the budget losers, the Bee includes several DOJ programs. The Bee reports, "The Community Oriented Policing Services grant program would be slashed to $32 million, down from the current level of $500 million. … The Justice Department would eliminate a number of other programs, including ones to assist Southwest border prosecutors, stop prison rape and protect Alzheimer's patients."

Budget Includes Increases To Fight Child Porn, Obscenity. CNET News (2/6, Broache) reports, "The Justice Department's budget also includes more than $25 million in program increases--up from $93.7 million last year--for investigations involving child pornography and obscenity, particularly tracking convicted sex offenders and apprehending 'online child pornographers and molesters.'"

Gonzales Addresses SMU Law Students. The SMU Daily Campus (2/6, Jukam) reports, "Law students flocked to the Underwood Law Library Friday at noon, and not just for the free lunch. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who was in town this weekend to receive a distinguished alumni award, spoke to a lecture hall filled with students to discuss the responsibilities of the judicial branch and other topics related to law." The DC continues, "Although Gonzales initially emphasized that each of the three branches of government would affect law students' lives, his speech focused primarily on the role of the judicial branch and the characteristics of good judges. According to Gonzales, judges need to understand their role in the government. … 'I am concerned that some judges have lost sight of the goal of the judicial branch,' Gonzales said. 'It is not the role of judicial branch to make policy.'" The DC adds, "Gonzales said that judges could maintain the judiciary's independence by making decisions based on neutral policies and respecting precedent. He also believes that the Constitution wasn't intended to address every legal and policy issue, and that by making certain issues constitutional, decisions are then taken out of the hands of the people. … 'I'm concerned about judges who think they see a constitutional solution to every societal ill,' Gonzales said." The DC notes, "During a question-and-answer session, Gonzales spoke extensively about the USA Patriot Act. The Patriot Act, passed after the attacks of Sept. 11, gave law enforcement more authority to fight terrorism. … 'Shortly after the attacks of 9/11, we were looking for additional tools to protect the country,' Gonzales said. 'The Patriot Act has been extremely helpful in allowing the U.S. government [to] collect information about threats to the government.'"

DOJ_NMG_0128060

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Budget Includes Increase For SEC. The AP (2/6) reports, "The SEC's budget, after nearly doubling in 2003 under anti-fraud legislation enacted amid the wave of corporate scandals early in the decade, is roughly flat for the third straight year under President Bush's 2007 proposal. … In fact, the administration asked for nearly the same amount last year, $904.8 million. But the agency has been operating at an estimated level of $877.1 million for the budget year ending Oct. 1 because, as is the case for most federal agencies, Congress hasn't yet approved 2007 spending levels." The AP continues, "The budget proposal doesn't call for any new programs at the market watchdog agency. But it is 'sufficient for the (SEC) to do its job and do it well,' agency Executive Director Diego Ruiz told reporters in a conference call Monday." The AP adds, "It is the second budget under Chairman Christopher Cox, who became head of the agency in August 2005 after 16 years in the House as a Republican from California. Reflecting Cox's interest in technology, the spending plan provides $130 million for information technology, up from $118 million, including improvements in the SEC's online corporate disclosure system. … The budget also includes $321.2 million for investigations and enforcement actions, higher than estimated 2007 spending of $310.1 million but slightly below last year's original request of $328.1 million. The SEC plans to open 925 new investigations, compared with 960 the previous year. … The SEC and the Justice Department are investigating suspicious timing of stock options grants at more than 100 public companies -- with backdating of options awarded to executives having become corporate America's biggest scandal last year. SEC officials say the agency is focusing on cases of serious fraud -- with elements such as deliberately lying, forging documents or deceiving directors or investors."

Banks Appeal Ruling On Enron Investor Class Action. The New York Times/Bloomberg (2/6) reports from New Orleans, "Two investment banks, Merrill Lynch and Credit Suisse, asked a federal appeals court yesterday to end a class-action lawsuit by Enron investors seeking $40 billion that they lost when the energy trader collapsed in 2001." Bloomberg continues, "The banks argued that a Houston judge was wrong to allow Enron investors to sue as a group and contended that they could not be sued because they did not participate directly in the accounting fraud that led to Enron's bankruptcy." Bloomberg adds, "The investors argued the court could address only whether the plaintiffs could sue as a group. Trial is set for April in Houston. … 'This class certification is putting enormous coercive impact on my client, facing a possible $40 billion exposure,' a lawyer for Merrill, Stuart Baskin, argued yesterday before the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans. … A ruling that invalidates class status may reduce any liability the banks might face for Enron losses. In June, Judge Melinda Harmon of Federal District in Houston said investors who bought Enron securities could combine their claims. The decision gave investors, who would otherwise be forced to sue individually, the possibility of a much higher recovery and more leverage in negotiating any settlement." Bloomberg notes, "Other former Enron lenders, like Citigroup, JPMorgan Chase and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, have settled with investors for more than $7 billion. … Merrill and Credit Suisse argued that Judge Harmon's ruling was based on the mistaken theory that the banks were individually responsible for investor losses because they took part in a scheme run by Enron."

SEC Examines Front-Running Trading. The New York Times (2/6, Anderson) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a broad examination into whether Wall Street bank employees are leaking information about big trades to favored clients, like hedge funds, in an effort to curry favor with those clients, executives at Wall Street banks said." The Times continues, "The inquiry, these people said, seems aimed at determining how pervasive insider trading, or the illegal use of market-moving nonpublic information, may be on Wall Street. Knowledge about a large trade, like the sale of a big block of stock by the mutual fund giant Fidelity, would tell a trader which way the stock would move." The Times adds, "Trading ahead of client orders, or front-running, has long been an issue on Wall Street. Large mutual fund companies have often complained in the past that Wall Street brokerage firms were front-running their trades, using information about the funds' plans to buy or sell to make a risk-free bet on a stock's direction. … But the latest S.E.C. investigation appears to have a new twist: Rather than examine whether a bank is trading ahead of its own client by using knowledge of the customer's trade, the scope of the investigation will allow regulators to see if banks tip their valued customers who then go trade at another bank, making the paper trail harder to detect."

Hyundai Chairman Sentenced To Three Years By South Korean Court. The Financial Times (2/6, Jung-a) reports, "Hyundai Motor was thrown into disarray on Monday when Chung Mong-koo, its chairman, was sentenced to three years in prison for embezzlement and breach of trust, raising the possibility of a management vacuum at South Korea's largest carmaker." The Times continues, "The punishment was harsher than expected and compounded the woes at Hyundai, which was already grappling with the strong local currency, flagging profits and a disruptive labour union. … But the sentence was welcomed by corporate governance campaigners, who said it showed Korea would no longer tolerate chaebol owners using their companies to pursue their personal interest." The Times adds, "The court found Mr Chung guilty of embezzling about $100m of company funds and inflicting about $224m of damage on group affiliates during rights issues. … He was also convicted of using deals to boost his financial gains and those of his son, Eui-sun, who runs affiliate Kia Motors. … 'The defendant's act of secretively setting up massive slush funds and using them wilfully, using his status as the Hyundai Motor group's chairman, undermines the soundness and the autonomy of corporate management,' said Kim Dong-oh, the Seoul central district court judge. … The 68-year-old hairman was freed on bail to 'guarantee his defending rights and to minimise its impact on the economy' while he appeals the conviction, the court said."

DOJ_NMG_0128061

Former Fannie Mae Head Seeks Earlier Hearing Date. The Washington Post (2/6, D01, Hilzenrath) reports, "Former Fannie Mae chairman and chief executive Franklin D. Raines, accused of manipulating the housing finance company's earnings, is challenging regulators to make their case against him beginning Feb. 16 instead of waiting until the end of the year." The Post continues, "Attorneys for Raines have argued that the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which issued administrative charges in December, is required by law to begin a hearing on the evidence within 60 days of that event. … The agency, however, has proposed a schedule that would have the two sides file pretrial statements in December. The agency's proposal did not say when the hearing should begin. … 'It's a fundamental issue of fairness,' said Mark Fabiani, a spokesman for Raines. 'Frank Raines is ready to disprove OFHEO's allegations starting this month, and OFHEO is seeking to delay the proceedings until 2008.'" The Post notes, "The agency previously expressed concern about being overwhelmed by litigation related to Raines and the accounting scandal. In a lawsuit shareholders brought over Fannie Mae's accounting, the agency stated that complying with Raines's document requests could pose such a burden that it could divert regulators from their mission. … Raines's trial before an administrative law judge would be the culmination of a process regulators set in motion more than two years ago. In fall 2004, after an extended probe, OFHEO issued a report alleging that Fannie Mae used improper accounting. The Securities and Exchange Commission later agreed."

Donohue Says SEC Investigation Into Sunrise Lacks Merit. The Washington Post (2/6, A15, Birnbaum) reports that as president of the US Chamber of Commerce, Thomas J. Donohue "has long been obliged to talk tough against federal regulation, especially by the Securities and Exchange Commission. But now, it's personal." For 12 years, Donohue "has been a board member (including serving on the audit committee) of Sunrise Senior Living, a publicly traded company being probed by the SEC." Recently, the SEC "opened an inquiry into allegations that" Sunrise founder Paul Klaassen and "other insiders, including Donohue, may have improperly cashed $32 million in stock options before Sunrise in May announced an accounting problem that caused its stock to drop. Donohue calls the allegations meritless and says they were drummed up by labor unions that want to organize the company. He said that he has not been contacted by the SEC and that its inquiry will amount to nothing." But the "controversy adds fuel to complaints that investor activists have leveled at Donohue ever since he took over and revived the Chamber, the nation's largest business lobby, in 1997."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Agent Acknowledges Errors In Earlier Libby Trial Testimony. Fox News' Special Report With Brit Hume (2/5, Angle) reported, "Scooter Libby's defense got an unexpected break today when FBI agent Debra Bond was forced to reverse testimony she gave just last week. Bond had testified that when she first questioned Libby, he said he had learned from Karl Rove that Rove had informed columnist Robert Novak that Valerie Plame worked at the CIA. But today FBI agent Bond said her testimony last week was exactly backwards. As defense attorney Ted Wells asked pointedly, 'So when you said last week that Novak learned from Rove, that testimony was incorrect?' Bond, 'That's what I said. When I read that, it's like, I can't believe I said that.' Wells, 'Sometimes people make mistakes, right?' Bond, 'Yes.'" Fox added, "So yet another witness who told one story, then changed it; a perfect example of what the defense is arguing, that Libby also testified in good faith, but simply got it wrong."

MSNBC's Countdown (2/5, Shuster) reported that "Bond testified last week, on direct, that Libby, quote, 'adamantly denied telling White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer anything about Valerie Wilson before Valerie Wilson was outed.' But under cross-examination today…Bond acknowledged that the words 'adamantly denied' were her characterization, and that Libby never used those words, but rather that Libby actually said he couldn't recall discussing Valerie Wilson with Ari Fleischer. It is a difference, so give the defense some credit, but again these are differences over shades of gray. This is not a blockbuster contradiction perhaps that the defense had been hoping for."

DOJ_NMG_0128062

Under the headline "FBI Acknowledges Gaps In Notes On Libby," USA Today (2/6, Willing, 2.27M) reports both on Bond's testimony about Libby not "adamantly" denying the conversation with Fleischer, as well as her misstatement about Rove, and the New York Times (2/6, Lewis, 1.16M), at the end of its story focusing on the grand jury tapes played at trial yesterday, notes Bond's cross-examination and adds, "It was a reminder to the jury that one of the pillars of Mr. Libby's defense was that if he spoke inaccurately to the grand jury and investigators, it was only a case of faulty memory."

Jurors Hear Libby Tapes Of Libby's Grand Jury Testimony. The Washington Post (2/6, A3, Leonnig, Goldstein, 690K) reports, "I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby told a grand jury in 2004 that Vice President Cheney did not encourage him to provide information about an undercover CIA officer to the media, but Libby also said he did not believe that the information was secret and had to be safeguarded, according to audiotapes of Libby's testimony played in court yesterday. … The eight hours of audiotapes, most of which are to be played today, are intended to back up the government's assertion that Libby lied to investigators about his role in disclosing the identity" of Valerie Plame Wilson. "On the tapes, Libby said that Cheney did not tell him Plame's CIA identity was 'super-super-secret' and that he used a 'curious' tone unlike his regular voice, which 'was much more matter-of-fact and straight.' Libby said he did not remember Cheney speaking harshly of Wilson or suggesting nepotism was the reason for his mission."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Schmitt, 850K) adds, "The transcript of Libby's two grand jury appearances in March 2004 also shows that special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald explored early on whether President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney were involved in the circumstances leading to the disclosure of Plame's identity as a CIA employee. … Libby said he did not believe that Cheney wanted him to leak word about Wilson's wife to the press." The New York Times (2/6, Lewis, 1.16M) notes, "On the tape, Mr. Libby was heard saying repeatedly that he could not recall any conversation he ever had with Marc Grossman, a State Department official, about Ms. Wilson. Mr. Grossman, who was then the under secretary of state, has already testified about two such conversations."

Media Praise Judge's Decision To Release Tapes Publicly. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/6, Yen) reports, "News organizations praised a judge's decision Monday to release tapes of former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby's grand jury testimony, saying it would open a window into court proceedings. U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton said he would make the eight-hour recordings public even though he was worried that jurors could be influenced by outside media buzz." The AP notes that Libby's lawyers had fought the release, however, "Nathan Siegel, an attorney representing The Associated Press and more than a dozen other news organizations, contended that Libby's own words were far less prejudicial than evidence released in other cases, including 911 calls from inside the World Trade Center, FBI tapes in the Abscam investigation and mob wiretap tapes."

Kristof Calls For Cheney To Answer Questions About Libby, Or Resign. Under the headline "Mr. Cheney, Tear Down This Wall," Nicholas Kristof writes in his New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) column, "Mr. Cheney, now that the Scooter Libby trial is raising doubts about your own integrity, you owe the nation an explanation." Kristof poses a series of questions for Cheney, including, "did you push Mr. Libby to dig into Joe Wilson's background and discredit him?" and "What did you mean when you wrote, in a note to Scott McClellan…'not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy the Pres. that was asked to stick his head in the meat grinder because of incompetence of others.'" Kristof notes Nixon's Checkers speech and Agnew's public comments about the corruption allegations he faced in 1973, adding, "I'm not accusing you of committing a crime. But there are serious questions here," and if "you continue to stonewall, then you don't belong in office and you should resign."

Trial Highlights Difference Between "Classified" And "Secret" Material. ABC News (2/5, Coulter) reports, "In government, there's often a conflict between what can be aired publicly and what should be kept under wraps. There is no doubt about the value of keeping secret the movement of military forces in wartime. There is plenty of information that should be released, yet is jealously guarded by government officials. Sunshine laws and the Freedom of Information Act are designed to counter too much secrecy. … Secrecy and the lack of it are at the heart of the perjury and obstruction trial of former White House aide Lewis 'Scooter' Libby. The case has its origins in allegations that the Bush Administration twisted intelligence data to justify a pre-emptive war with Iraq. The prosecution believes there was a concerted effort to discredit the war critic by unmasking his CIA wife." ABC News continues, "There is no dispute at the Libby trial that Valerie Plame's CIA identity was CLASSIFIED information. It was the CIA that officially requested a Justice Department investigation of who leaked her name to reporters, a possible violation of the Intelligence Identities Protection Act of 1982. But no one has been charged with violating that law, which carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison and a 50-thousand dollar fine." ABC News adds, "Documents in the case and testimony at the trial show a number of top administration officials discussed Valerie Plame with reporters. Former State Department official

DOJ_NMG_0128063

Richard Armitage, former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer, Karl Rove, and Scooter Libby, among them. An FBI agent also testified that Libby said it's possible he and Vice President Dick Cheney discussed leaking Plame's name to journalists. It was such an incendiary topic, former Time Magazine reporter Matthew Cooper told his bureau chief the information should be considered 'double super secret background.' … Simply discussing an undercover operative is not enough to violate the law. You have to know the agent in question is covert and the government is taking steps to conceal the person's identity, and the disclosure must be intentional. So after a more than three year long investigation, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald has only charged Scooter Libby with lying and trying to obstruct his leak investigation. When he announced the indictment, Fitzgerald compared the offense to someone kicking sand into an umpire's eyes."

California Agency Fined Councilman For Accepting Funds From Miller In 1992. The Hill (2/6, Crabtree) reports Rep. Gary Miller "last week blamed an FBI review of his land deals on a media smear campaign. But this is not the first time government agencies have scrutinized his real estate transactions. In 1992, the California Fair Political Practices Commission (FPPC), a state government entity that regulates political activity and investigates conflict-of-interest allegations, levied a $1,750 fine against Covina City Councilman Christopher Lancaster for accepting $8,000 from Miller before voting in favor of a resolution Miller sponsored. The payment occurred when Lancaster was mayor of Covina and Miller was a member of the Diamond Bar City Council and running for state Senate." The Hill notes, "Shaun Martin, a law and ethics professor at the University of San Diego, said annexation of the land benefited Miller. 'The lingering question is whether the $8,000 he gave to the mayor had anything to do with the mayor's vote in favor' of the annexation tax deal, Martin said."

Fumo Lashes Out At Expected Indictment, Vows To "Stand Up And Fight." The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/6, Cattabiani, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "In a preemptive strike on the eve of his likely indictment, a defiant State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo took the fight to federal prosecutors yesterday, vowing to contest charges he called 'falsities and half-truths.' 'I know in my heart that I have not done anything illegal,' the Philadelphia Democrat said during a 12-minute speech on the Senate floor, his voice at times somber, at times bitter. 'Sometimes in life the only choice we have when we face blatant injustice is to have the courage to stand up and fight.' … Fumo stepped down from a powerful committee post yesterday…but will remain in the Senate." The Inquirer notes that Fumo "predicted the indictment would focus on two basic allegations: that he exploited a South Philadelphia charity and misused his Senate staff for personal and political purposes. … 'The indictment will not allege that I ever accepted a bribe,' Fumo said. 'And, as the government knows, I never did.'"

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/6, Jackson) reports that Fumo, "who has been under FBI scrutiny for four years, announced on the Senate floor today that he expects to be indicted this week. … Fumo would have been required to give up his leadership post as soon as he was indicted. He portrayed his resignation as minority party chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee as a temporary measure 'until I am vindicated.' Fumo charged that the investigation 'has been marked by threats, intimidations and frequent leaks to the media intended to embarrass me' and vowed to fight the allegations."

Speech Called "Terrific Public-Relations Maneuver." The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/6, McCoy, Lounsberry, 385K) reports in a separate story, "It was vintage Senator Fumo – smart, heartfelt, combative, eloquent and shrewd. … He offered a counter-narrative: Fumo, the people's champion, fighting the good fight in the face of threats, leaks and intimidation. 'A terrific public-relations maneuver to get ahead of the indictment,' said lawyer John P. Pucci, a former federal prosecutor." The Inquirer notes Fumo "said the government was about to accuse him of misusing a South Philadelphia charity. To rebut that, he extolled the nonprofit's work on 'countless' community projects, from supporting charter schools to cleaning up 'trash-strewn, rat-infested, vacant lots.' … With members of his Senate staff standing behind him, he said prosecutors were about to paint them as his taxpayer-paid campaign workers and personal servants. To the contrary, he said, they work tirelessly for the public, without bonuses or overtime."

Indictment Expected To Have Mixed Effect On Fumo-Linked Politicians. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/6, Davies, 106K) reports, "When something as earth-shattering as a federal corruption indictment hits a politician as influential as Vince Fumo, his friends and allies feel the shock waves, too. … Fumo worked hard to get U.S. Rep. Bob Brady into the mayor's race, and longtime Fumocrats Jim Kenney and Frank DiCicco are running for re-election to their seats on City Council. Kenney and DiCicco, by now multi-term incumbents with their own legislative records, political relationships and fundraising capacity seem well-positioned to thrive on their own. It's harder to predict the impact on Brady, a longtime friend and associate of Fumo's who must fight the notion that he's a machine politician." The Daily News adds, "St. Joseph's University historian and analyst Randall Miller said the Fumo scandal could raise the profile of the issue of public corruption and help mayoral candidates Michael Nutter and Tom Knox, who are fighting 'pay-to-play' politics."

DOJ_NMG_0128064

Florida Development Bribery Scheme Trial Begins Today. The Miami Herald (2/6, Clark, 286K) reports, "A decade after the late Monroe County Mayor John L. 'Jack' London was paid $29,000 as part of an alleged development bribery scheme, a former county attorney goes on trial today for his suspected role in the public corruption case. James Hendrick, who served as Monroe County attorney from 1995-2002, faces federal charges of conspiracy to obstruct justice, witness tampering and obstruction of justice. A 12-member jury was seated Monday." The Herald notes, "The case stems from a lengthy FBI investigation into alleged public corruption in the Keys. Prosecutors say Hendrick was the center of a "secret deal' in which he, London and Miami-Dade political consultant Randy Hilliard conspired to get Marathon businessman Marvin Rappaport to pay $75,000 in exchange for building and zoning approval of his stymied redevelopment project."

Man Sentenced To 8½ Years In Prison For FEMA Relief Fraud. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/6, Sanner) reports, "A 59-year-old man was sentenced Monday to 8 1/2 years in prison on charges stemming from his use of stolen identities in an attempt to acquire more than $100,000 in payments intended for victims of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Jeffrey Alan Rothschild, who's also known as Jeffrey Zahler, pleaded guilty in August to bank fraud, mail fraud and money laundering in late 2005. He was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly in Washington. U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor said Rothschild abused a system set up by the Federal Emergency Management Agency to allow hurricane victims to receive $2,000 in emergency funds after providing their names, Social Security numbers and other information." The AP notes, "Rothschild has no fixed address."

Mississippi Woman Pleads Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud. The AP (2/6) reports, "A Gulfport woman pleaded guilty to hurricane disaster-relief fraud and faces five years in prison, the U.S. attorney's office said Monday. Amanda Rettig will be sentenced April 25 and could also be fined up to $250,000. She pleaded guilty to filing a false claim with the Federal Emergency Management Agency saying her property was damaged by Hurricane Katrina." The AP notes, "She received $22,253.23, a statement from U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton said."

Suspect In Boys' Abduction Charged With Molestation. USA Today (2/6, Keen) reports from Clayton, MO, "Michael Devlin, who has been accused of kidnapping two Missouri boys who were found last month, was charged Monday with molesting the teenagers." USA continues, "St. Louis County prosecutor Robert McCulloch charged Devlin, 41, with 71 counts: two kidnapping charges and the rest for forcible sodomy. Each charge is a felony punishable by up to life in prison. He said Devlin was charged with 17 counts of forcible sodomy relating to an abduction last month and 52 more in a 2002 kidnapping. 'Devlin acknowledged committing these acts,' McCulloch said." USA adds, "Following his department's policy of not naming victims of sexual abuse, McCulloch did not name the teens. He noted that their identities 'are not a national secret.' … Ben Ownby, 13, of Beaufort, Mo., was kidnapped on Jan. 8. Shawn Hornbeck, 15, disappeared in 2002 in Richwoods, Mo. Both were found inside Devlin's apartment in Kirkwood, Mo., on Jan. 12. Devlin was charged last month with kidnapping in each boy's home county and pleaded not guilty. Monday's charges were filed in the county where Devlin lived."

States Consider Changes To Police Lineups. The Christian Science Monitor (2/6, Jonsson) reports from Atlanta, "More than two decades ago, a sexual-assault victim from Sandy Springs, Ga., pointed to a picture of her attacker in a photo lineup. … 'From zero to 100 percent, how sure are you?' a detective asked. … 'I'm 120 percent sure,' the woman said, as stated in court testimony. … It now appears that she was 100 percent wrong, according to the Fulton County district attorney. The result of DNA testing led to the release of Willie 'Pete' Williams on Jan. 23 after nearly 22 years in a south Georgia prison for a crime he did not commit. Her mistake and his exoneration have revived a debate about the accuracy of eyewitness identifications – and their central role in persuading juries to convict. … But even as a handful of police departments from Boston to Minneapolis have voluntarily changed lineup procedures to help reduce such tragic errors, resistance to top-down reform from the majority of American police chiefs and prosecutors is pushing the debate into the legislative chamber. Last week, Georgia introduced a bill that would scrap the side-by-side police lineup, and would instead require police departments to present suspects one by one – either in person or by photo. Georgia joins Texas, New Mexico, West Virginia, and Vermont, which have similar bills pending." The Monitor adds, "Some experts argue that the new procedure limits inaccurate 'relative judgments' that victims can make during a lineup. But police counter that they do not want to be forced to use a specific procedure that they say would undermine proven techniques detectives use. … Since 1992, 194 people have been exonerated on the basis of DNA evidence, and some 75 percent of the convictions involved at least one faulty eyewitness identification, according to the Innocence Project, which works to clear those who are falsely imprisoned. A separate study published by the University of Michigan in 2004 found that 90 percent of mistakes that led to false convictions in rape cases were caused by eyewitness errors."

DOJ_NMG_0128065

Videographer Nears Jail Record For Resisting Grant Jury. The New York Times (2/6, McKinley) reports from San Francisco, "A freelance videographer who refused to cooperate with a grand jury investigation will become the longest incarcerated journalist in modern American history on Tuesday. The freelancer, Josh Wolf, will pass Vanessa Leggett, an investigator and a journalist who served 168 days in 2001 and 2002 for refusing to surrender information in a murder case." The Times continues, "Mr. Wolf, 24, has been in prison since August, with a brief break in September related to his appeal, after refusing to cooperate with a grand jury investigation of an anticapitalist protest in 2005 in which a police officer here was injured and a squad car was slightly damaged by a small explosive device. … Prosecutors have demanded that Mr. Wolf give them his raw video, some of which he has posted on his Web site, www.joshwolf.net, as well as testify about the protesters seen on the tape for an investigation into possible charges, including arson. … 'Wolf videotaped a public demonstration where there may have been an attempt to set a police car ablaze and where a San Francisco police officer's skull was fractured when he was hit from behind by a demonstrator,' said Luke Macaulay, a spokesman for the United States attorney for the Northern District of California." The Times notes, "Mr. Macaulay cited six federal decisions in the government's favor, including one last week that denied a request for a new hearing. … 'This office has issued a lawful subpoena for legitimate investigative purposes,' he said. … Mr. Wolf says he is protecting his sources. He remains behind bars even as the United States attorney who had him held, Kevin V. Ryan, has said he is stepping down and the San Francisco district attorney has dismissed the lone remaining criminal case involving the protest. … Mr. Wolf could stay jailed until the term of the grand jury ends in July. … The jailing has prompted outcries by advocates for freedom of the press who say it seems out of proportion to the scale of the investigation."

New Jersey Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Distribution. The Trenton Times (2/6, Shea) reports, "A former West Windsor man pleaded guilty in federal court yesterday to one count of receiving and distributing child pornography on the Internet. Mark Wasco, 46, was charged in March 2006 with possessing child pornography after an FBI agent and a New Jersey State Police investigator searched his home and computers and found numerous images of children engaged in sex." The Times notes, "The complaint also alleges that Wasco, at one point, posed as a teenage boy to solicit images of children using the Web site MySpace.com, and admitted to the ploy."

FBI Child Sex Sting Snares New York Elementary School Teacher. The Buffalo News (2/3, Herbeck, Pasciak) reported, "An elementary school teacher from Frontier School District is accused of using the Internet to arrange a sexual liaison with a 14-year-old boy." Kollin Roy King "is also a longtime Boy Scout volunteer who was scheduled to become director of Camp Scouthaven this summer, overseeing a program for boys in first to fifth grades who attend camp with their parents. The 'boy' who led to King's arrest was actually an undercover FBI agent, who arranged a meeting at a Cheektowaga restaurant. A team of agents arrested King when he showed up." The News noted FBI spokesman Paul M. Moskal said on Friday, "We see these sting operations on television all the time. The public is well aware that we have undercover agents on the Internet. And yet, people keep doing it. This kind of criminal activity seems to get more and more prevalent."

The AP (2/3, Thompson) reported, "When authorities asked King what he would have done had two boys arrived at the restaurant, King replied, 'I hope nothing would have happened,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Allison Gioia said. But King later acknowledged that it was not the first such meeting he had arranged, and that he had engaged in sexual activity with a 16-year-old boy he met on the Internet in a park and in his apartment, Gioia said. Other scheduled meetings never came to fruition, King told authorities, because the minors did not show up or the meeting location was fictitious."

Study Finds Identity Fraud Down Since 2003. The New York Times (2/6, Leland) reports, "The number of Americans who are victims of identity fraud has declined steadily since 2003, according to a new survey sponsored by credit-card and financial services companies. Last year, 3.7 percent of people surveyed said someone had stolen their identity in the previous 12 months, down from 4.7 percent in 2003, according to the report." The Times continues, "The study found that the total losses from the crime fell last year to $49 billion from the 2005 level of $56 billion. The thieves either used the victims' existing bank or credit card accounts or opened new ones. … The survey, based on telephone interviews with 5,000 adults, was conducted by Javelin Strategy & Research, a data research firm, and was sponsored by Visa, Wells Fargo and CheckFree. The margin of sampling error is below plus or minus one percentage point for the crimes' prevalence." The Times adds, "The findings contradict public perceptions that identity fraud is proliferating out of control, said James Van Dyke, president and founder of Javelin. 'For years identity fraud has been reported as the nation's fastest growing crime, with the assumption that the numbers would keep going up,' Mr. Van Dyke said. 'We find it's not the case. The trend is going down.'" The Times notes, "Because the survey relied on people's accounts of whether they had been victims, it does not measure 'synthetic identity theft,' in which criminals fabricate identities using names, addresses, Social Security numbers and other information that may or may or may not correspond to real people. A 2005 analysis by ID Analytics, a financial industry security firm, found that synthetic identity theft was more common than 'true-name' identity theft. … As in past years, the Javelin survey found that individuals whose identities were stolen bore less than 10 percent of the loss from the crimes."

DOJ_NMG_0128066

New DC Police Chief Challenged By Rise In Homicides. The Washington Times (2/6, Taylor) reports, :A recent series of homicides will provide an early test for acting Metropolitan Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier as she faces D.C. Council confirmation hearings scheduled for next month, say some residents and council members. … 'I certainly think the way a city responds to a spike in homicides is an important indicator,' said council member Phil Mendelson, at-large Democrat and chairman of the Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary, which will hold the hearing. 'It gives important insight into how the new administration will deal with violent crimes.'" The Times continues, "The number of homicides this year in the District as of yesterday was 17, the same as last year at this time. Among them was the series of four killings in less than five hours the weekend of Jan. 27-28. Police have made an arrest in one of the cases, and Chief Lanier announced initiatives to aggressively canvass neighborhoods in the 48 hours after a homicide and to target violent criminals wanted on fugitive warrants." The Times adds, "Mayor Adrian M. Fenty, a Democrat, replaced Chief Charles H. Ramsey shortly after being elected in November, in part to implement more community policing in the department, which has 3,800 officers and a budget of about $430 million. Chief Lanier officially took over Jan. 2. … Mary Cheh, Ward 3 Democrat, said she was 'excited' about Chief Lanier's appointment, but added she has some issues that need to be addressed."

Barry Faces Possible Revocation Of Probation. The Washington Post (2/6, Cauvin) reports, "Nearly a year after he agreed to follow the law and pay overdue taxes dating back several years, the former four-term mayor has not only flouted a plea agreement but has failed to file tax returns for 2005, prosecutors say." The Post continues, "Now, the U.S. attorney's office, which did not oppose probation for Barry when he was sentenced in March, wants the federal judge in the case to put him in prison. … 'The Court's patience should be at an end,' Assistant U.S. Attorneys James W. Cooper and Thomas E. Zeno wrote in a motion to Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson, adding that Barry 'continues to flout' city and federal tax laws." The Post adds, "Under sentencing guidelines, Barry could have faced 12 to 18 months in prison for failure to file a federal income tax return and failure to make a District of Columbia return. Now that prison time could be back on the table if the judge decides that Barry isn't living up to his agreement with prosecutors and his promises to the court. … And that may only be the beginning of his problems in the case. In November, the Internal Revenue Service began garnishing Barry's city council salary because he failed to follow through with a payment plan for the taxes he owed for years 1999 through 2004. … Frederick D. Cooke Jr., Barry's attorney, said that he has not talked to his client about the problem with his 2005 taxes. But Cooke said he expects to file court papers challenging the prosecutors' bid to revoke Barry's probation. Cooke said he expected a hearing in the next month."

The Washington Times (2/6, Mcelhatton) reports, "The defense attorney for D.C. Council member Marion Barry said yesterday that he is meeting with the former mayor this week to decide how best to respond to a recent request by federal prosecutors to revoke Mr. Barry's probation in a criminal tax case. … If the motion is granted, the revocation could put Mr. Barry back behind bars more than 15 years after he served six months on drug charges. … 'Just because they write it doesn't mean it's true,' attorney Frederick D. Cooke Jr. said of the court filing last week in which prosecutors stated that Mr. Barry had failed to pay his 2005 taxes." The Times continues, "Mr. Barry received three years of probation last year after pleading guilty to failing to file returns on more than $500,000 in income from 1999 to 2004. … 'I haven't had a chance to draft a response because I have to talk to my client and gather information,' Mr. Cooke said. … In exchange for the guilty plea, prosecutors last year agreed to take no position on Mr. Barry's request for probation at his sentencing last year. … Now, prosecutors say, Mr. Barry hasn't lived up to his end of the deal."

CIVIL LAW:

Jury Finds FBI Retaliated Against Whistle-blowing Agent. The AP (2/6) reports from Minneapolis, "A jury awarded $565,000 in damages on Monday to a former FBI agent, agreeing that Jane Turner's superiors retaliated against her for filing a sex-discrimination complaint against her supervisor. … 'Today is a true vindication for whistleblowers in the FBI,' Turner said after the jury returned its verdict in federal court." The AP continues, "Turner retired in 2003, amid the pressure of both her discrimination case and a separate dispute that arose after she accused colleagues of stealing a Tiffany crystal globe from the World Trade Center ruins. … The jury awarded her $60,000 in damages for lost wages and $505,000 for emotional distress. One of her attorneys, Robert Hill, said the judge will have to reduce the $505,000 to $300,000 because of a statutory cap on nonmonetary damages, so she'll get $360,000. … Still, Hill said, it's believed to be the largest jury verdict for retaliation in the history of the FBI." The AP adds, "The defense team's jury consultant, Nikki Carlson, said it was clear that the jury didn't buy the government's defense, which attacked Turner's credibility and job performance. She said one juror told her that the two jurors seated either side of her wrote 'LIAR' on their notepads and stopped taking notes when one of Turner's superiors was testifying."

DOJ_NMG_0128067

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/6, Browning, 395K) reports, "Federal jurors hugged former FBI agent Jane Turner on Monday after awarding her $565,000 in damages and finding that the agency had retaliated against her for filing a 1998 sex-discrimination complaint. 'I think you were the very best FBI agent,' juror Mashima Dickens told Turner, who investigated child sex-abuse crimes. 'Looking at the way you were treated, I just said you were screwed left and right,' Dickens said, tears rolling down her cheeks. … But Turner said she could never repair the damage done to her by her colleagues in the FBI, an organization she had dreamed of joining since she read Nancy Drew detective novels at age 12. 'I'm dead in their eyes because I betrayed them. And that's what's so sad,' Turner said." The Star Tribune notes, "Records show that she received superior or exceptional job ratings until after her supervisor, Craig Welken, was interviewed in 1999 about a sex-discrimination complaint she had filed the previous year."

Trial Begins Over Fatal Crash Of Small Aircraft. The Chicago Tribune (2/6, O'Connor) reports, "Nearly seven years to the day after a midair collision killed WGN radio personality Bob Collins and two others, a trial opened in federal court Monday to decide who was at fault for the crash of the two small aircraft." The Tribune continues, "Government lawyers laid the blame on Collins, while attorneys for the three victims said the collision was caused by an air traffic controller and was ultimately the responsibility of the Federal Aviation Administration." The Tribune adds, "Collins, 57, had been Chicago's top-ranked morning-radio personality for 14 years when his Moravan Z242L struck a Cessna 172P as the two aircraft approached the Waukegan Regional Airport on the hazy afternoon of Feb. 8, 2000. … Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of the Midwestern Regional Medical Center, killing him and passenger Herman Luscher, 58. The Cessna's pilot, Sharon Hock, 31, a flight attendant who was on her second solo flight, died when her plane crashed on a Zion street. … No one on the ground was injured, but the hospital sustained $28 million in property damage and lost business." The Tribune notes, "The bench trial before U.S. District Judge John Darrah, expected to last about two weeks, opened with the federal government as the lone defendant after Midwest Air Traffic Control Inc., which operates the Waukegan airport's tower, admitted liability Monday. … But lawyers for survivors of the three victims, including Collins' widow, Christine, contend the FAA controlled the Waukegan airport's operations and bears the responsibility for the collision. … Jill Dahlmann Rosa, a Justice Department lawyer, said Collins set up the collision by misreporting his location to the tower, misleading Hock and the air traffic controller. … Collins' conduct 'fell below the standard of care of a reasonable pilot,' she said."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Expert Will Not Testify At Mississippi Voting Rights Trial. The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (2/6, Gates) reports, "The Noxubee County case has apparently ended without court resuming after the defense decided against calling an expert witness to testify. … An out-of-state voting rights expert had been scheduled to testify Feb. 15." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "The lawsuit, the first of its kind in the United States filed by the U.S. Department of Justice, accuses black political leaders in Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters. … The three-week trial in U.S. District Court concluded last Wednesday, with the exception of the expert coming to Jackson to testify." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "The Justice Department's lawsuit mostly accuses Noxubee County Democratic Committee Chairman Ike Brown and people working in concert with him of discriminating against white voters. … U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee set March 26 as the deadline for both sides to submit final written briefs in the case. He will then make a ruling after that time."

FBI To Give Update On Civil Rights Cold Case Initiative. The Athens Banner-Herald (2/6, Quigley) reports, "FBI officials will hold a news conference later this month to give an update on the bureau's so-called 'cold case initiative' in the Moore's Ford lynching and 51 other unsolved race-related murders, said Nancy Nelson, section chief of the public corruption/civil rights section of the FBI's Criminal Investigation Division. The bureau has been reviewing the cold cases to see if new technology…and a new willingness by witnesses to come forward, will allow federal and state agents to give some conclusion to the decades-old and often forgotten murders, Nelson said. 'If we can get prosecutions out of it, terrific,' but agents mostly are seeking resolution for the victims' families, she said." The Banner-Herald notes, "In 2005, the Moore's Ford Memorial Committee sent letters to several members of Congress…urging them to ask the FBI to 'assign two agents to (the Moore's Ford) case," and the "committee also sent a letter to FBI officials asking agents to reopen the case. 'The letter certainly proved useful in bringing the case to the forefront,' said Stephen Emmett, spokesman for the FBI office in Atlanta."

DOJ_NMG_0128068

Rights Groups Warn Of Increase In White Supremacist Activity. The AP (2/6, Texeira) reports, "Huge street protests against tougher immigration laws made millions of immigrants more visible and powerful in the United States last year, but, according to some rights groups, they seem to have revived a hateful counter force: white supremacists." The AP continues, "Groups linked to the Ku Klux Klan, skinheads and neo-Nazis grew significantly more active, holding more rallies, distributing leaflets and increasing their presence on the Internet - much of it focused on stirring anti-immigrant sentiment, a new report released by the Anti-Defamation League says. … 'Extremist groups are good at seizing on whatever the hot button is of the day and twisting the message to get new members,' Deborah M. Lauter, ADL Civil Rights director, said Monday. 'This one seems to be taking hold with more of mainstream America than we'd like to see.'" The AP adds, "Old Klan chapters have been revived and new ones started throughout the South, historically the heart of the group, and in other places such as Michigan, Iowa and New Jersey, says the report, which was scheduled for official release Tuesday. … Last May in Alabama, an anti-immigration rally included slogans such as, 'Let's get rid of the Mexicans!' according to the document, titled 'Ku Klux Klan Rebounds.' … 'The Klan is increasingly cooperating with other extremist groups and Neo-Nazi groups,' Lauter said. 'That's a new phenomenon.'" The AP notes, "Between 2000 and 2005, hate groups mushroomed 33 percent and Klan chapters by 63 percent, according to Mark Potok, director of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks hate crimes. … Precise data are difficult to pin down, but Potok's group counts as many as 150 Klan chapters with up to 8,000 members across the United States, still well below a peak of 4 million in the 1920s. More than 800 hate groups exist around the country, Southern Poverty research shows."

NAACP Calls For Limits On "No-Knock" Warrants After Atlanta Shooting. The AP (2/6, Gross) reports from Atlanta, "A local chapter of a U.S. civil rights group on Monday called on police and politicians to limit the use of 'no-knock' warrants in the wake of the death of an elderly woman shot by police during such a search." The AP continues, "The Rev. R.L. White, Jr., chapter president for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, unveiled a list of recommendations the group compiled after a December community forum prompted by the shooting. … 'This is of utmost urgency,' said White, speaking at the chapter's Atlanta headquarters. 'The situation that happened last year was only the tip of the iceberg.'" The AP adds, "The NAACP chapter also called on police to require officers to receive sensitivity training, for the Atlanta Police Department to launch a goodwill initiative in the city's low-income, high-crime neighborhoods and for a citizens review board to be created to review incidents like the Nov. 21 shooting. … Kathryn Johnston died and three officers were wounded in the shootout during a no-knock search for drugs in Johnston's northwest Atlanta home. Family members say Johnston was 92 years old; authorities said she was 88. … When officers raided her home without first announcing their presence, police say Johnston fired a handgun before officers returned fire, killing her. … Narcotics officers said they were told by a paid informant that cocaine was being sold from Johnston's home. … No cocaine was found in the home, and a man who claims he was the paid informant later said he was told by officers to lie about buying drugs at the home." The AP notes, "The FBI and Georgia Bureau of investigation are investigating the incident at the request of Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington."

WPost Columnist Decries Anti-Semitism Charge. In a column for the Washington Post (2/6, A17), Richard Cohen writes that "it comes as a surprise that has the force of a mugging to be accused of aiding the very people I so hate -- of being an abettor of something called 'The New Anti-Semitism.' … The accusation comes from the pen of Indiana University's Alvin H. Rosenfeld, whose report ' "Progressive" Jewish Thought and the New Anti-Semitism' was published by the prestigious American Jewish Committee and given great play in the New York Times. Certain prominent American Jews -- the historian Tony Judt, the playwright Tony Kushner, the poet Adrienne Rich and I, among others -- were charged with aiding anti-Semitism with our writings. We were, in other words, enablers. As if that was not bad enough, Shulamit Reinharz, a Brandeis University professor and a columnist for a Jewish weekly, dispensed totally with Rosenfeld's qualification. She told the Boston Globe that all of us mentioned in the AJC report are just plain anti-Semites." Cohen continues, "At times, I have written coldly and provocatively about Israel, maybe once or twice in anger. This, in turn, has angered some readers who knew what I was thinking but not what I was feeling -- that, at bottom, I had a strong emotional attachment to Israel. … But having said that, let me wonder about those American Jews who interpret criticism of Israel as anti-Semitism or something that abets it. The charge has been leveled at Jimmy Carter over his recent book, 'Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid.' I, too, didn't like the book. I, too, found the book hostile, oddly unbalanced and chillingly lacking in historical context -- not just a near-total neglect of the Holocaust but also no mention of pre-1948 Arab pogroms, such as the 1929 murder of 67 Jews in Hebron. Still, Carter's overall point about Israeli occupation of the West Bank is apt, and calling him all sorts of names does not change that. The former president has in effect embraced the current, ahistorical context for Israel. For many, it is no longer the orphaned waif of the Holocaust but the bastard child of Western colonialism." Cohen concludes, "It's sad that the American Jewish Committee commissioned and published Rosenfeld's report. I can't imagine what good will come out of it. Instead, it has given license to the most intolerant and narrow-minded of Israel's defenders so that, as the AJC concedes in my case, any veering from orthodoxy is met with censure or, from someone like Reinharz, the most powerful of all post-Holocaust condemnations -- anti-Semite -- is diluted beyond recognition. The offense here is not just to a handful of relatively unimportant writers, but to memory itself. .. Shame."

DOJ_NMG_0128069

ANTITRUST:

Smithfield Complies With DOJ Request For Information On Premium Deal. The AP (2/6) reports, "Smithfield Foods Inc. said Monday it has complied with a Department of Justice antitrust division request for information related to the pork processor's acquisition of rival Premium Standard Farms Inc." The AP continues, "Smithfield said it plans to acquire the pork producer for $674 million in cash and stock and assume $117 million in debt. … Smithfield said it hopes the antitrust division can complete its review in enough time for the deal to close in the first quarter of 2007." The AP adds, "A Premium Standard Farms shareholders meeting has been scheduled for Feb. 23 to vote on the deal."

Firms Trying To Beat Antitrust Clock Find Mixed Results. The Deal (2/6, Lindell) reports, "Companies trying to hasten the antitrust reviews of their deals are increasingly deciding to hit the reset button on the regulatory clock, a maneuver aimed at saving time and money on government reviews." The Deal continues, "Although the strategy is becoming increasingly popular, it's not a sure thing. … Two recent deals indicate that refiling produces mixed results. … Express Scripts Inc. Wednesday announced it was pulling and refiling its premerger notification, in the hope of evading a second request from the Federal Trade Commission regarding its hostile bid for rival pharmacy benefit manager Caremark Inc. But Genentech Inc., which earlier pulled and refiled its paperwork regarding its purchase of Tanox Inc., announced Monday it will have to comply with a longer, costly review." The Deal adds, "While the government hasn't historically kept track of corporate decisions to pull and refile merger notices, it is starting to, and on Wednesday a Department of Justice official said those corporate moves to pull and refile seem be increasing. About two-thirds of those cases have successfully skirted a government demand for documents and data, known as a second request for information. … The process of notifying the government's antitrust agency of merger plans and getting approval to proceed despite competitive issues has become an increasingly elaborate dance under the rubric of the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antirust Improvements Act of 1976." The Deal notes, "Tom Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the antirust division at DOJ, and FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras have both repeatedly said they are trying to minimize the cost and time burden of the merger review process, and that as a part of that effort, both agencies are aggressively examining deals during the initial 30 days they are permitted to look over a deal before having to issue a second request. … But sometimes, one month just isn't enough for antitrust lawyers to collect, review, deliver and explain the data fast enough. During that same time, staff lawyers at the agencies also need to review information that may include sophisticated economic data, consider the implications and evaluate the merger's competitive impact in industries that may be new, arcane or rapidly evolving. … As a result, the staff decision to issue a second request for information can prolong the review, and dramatically increase the price tag on the merger review process. … But a second request may not mean the government is really interested in blocking the deal. During the past seven years, 265 cases at DOJ received second requests, according to Bob Kramer, a senior staff official, but only 104 of those cases saw enforcement actions, such as consent decrees involving divestitures or licensing agreements. And only four of those cases actually proceeded to trial."

FTC Reaffirms Antitrust Ruling Against Rambus. The AP (2/6) reports, "The Federal Trade Commission made final its ruling that the memory chip designer Rambus violated antitrust laws, imposing limits on the royalties the company can charge." The AP continues, "Wall Street was bracing for a potentially harsher order than the one the commission released Monday, and Rambus stock rose sharply. … Still, the final opinion provides the sharpest criticism to date of Rambus, and legal experts said it would set an important precedent for the broader technology industry." The AP adds, "The order said Rambus violated federal antitrust laws 'by deliberately engaging in a pattern of anticompetitive acts to deceive an industrywide standard-setting organization.' … Thomas R. Lavelle, senior vice president and general counsel for Rambus, said the company was disappointed with the opinion and would appeal." The AP notes, "The case hinges on whether Rambus illegally obtained a monopoly in the 1990s when it secured patents for two popular types of memory used in personal computers. Rambus was accused of failing to disclose to an engineering council that its patents had been incorporated into an industry standard regarding memory technology. … An administrative law judge dismissed the complaint in 2004, but the F.T.C. overturned that ruling in July 2006."

DOJ_NMG_0128070

Market Watch (2/6, Andrejczak) reports, "Rambus, of Los Altos, Calif., said it plans to appeal the ruling that stems from government antitrust charges filed more than four years ago. … However, shares of Rambus surged 24% to $23.50 as the FTC remedy was deemed less severe than investors had expected." Market Watch continues, "The FTC issued its order on a 3-2 vote. Commissioners Pamela Jones Harbour and J. Thomas Rosch disagreed with parts of the remedy. … Importantly, one analyst said, the FTC order doesn't affect second-generation DDR and SDRAM memory-chip designs that Rambus has developed or other memory technologies that it's engineered. The order also didn't invalidate any Rambus patent."

USA Today (2/6, 3B, Iwata) reports, "In a statement, Rambus general counsel Tom Lavelle said the company will appeal the decision 'because we strongly disagree with a number of the commission's determinations.' Lavelle said that the FTC commission 'continues to ignore the extensive findings of fact' made earlier by FTC chief administrative law judge Stephen McGuire."

Beatles, Apple Near Settlement Of iTunes Dispute. The Financial Times (2/6, Waters, Tait, Terazono) reports, "The Beatles on Monday buried their latest trademark dispute with US technology company Apple, removing one of the obstacles to a potential deal that could bring the Fab Four's songs to the iTunes music store." The Times continues, "Bringing The Beatles to iTunes would open up a highly valued catalogue of songs and could represent a significant breakthrough for the entire digital music business, according to analysts. … However, others cautioned that personal and legal complications could still stand in the way of a deal."

The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A7, Clark, Smith) reports, "The companies have long squabbled over the word Apple, with the Beatles' Apple Corps Ltd. objecting to the use of its trademarks by the Silicon Valley company. Under a new agreement announced yesterday, Apple Inc. will take over those trademarks, and license some of them back to Apple Corps, which agreed to drop its trademark-infringement litigation. Financial terms weren't disclosed. … Neither company answered the biggest question for music fans -- whether they will finally be able to buy Beatles recordings from Apple's iTunes music store and transfer those purchases to an iPod music player. The Beatles are the most prominent holdout from iTunes, and the companies have privately discussed licensing deals in the past, but nothing has materialized."

USA Today (2/6, Graham) reports, "The move clears the way to get the Beatles music available as digital downloads on Apple's popular iTunes Store, say Wall Street analysts." USA continues, "The Beatles are the 'most notable iTunes holdout,' says Gene Munster, an analyst at equity firm Piper Jaffray. 'Once the Beatles are in, this will lead to a chain reaction among other bands and movie studios. No one will want to be left out anymore.'" USA notes, "Besides the Beatles, Led Zeppelin, Radiohead, AC/DC, Kid Rock and Garth Brooks have declined to offer their music as digital downloads. Last year, Apple added movies to iTunes with films from Walt Disney and, more recently, Paramount Pictures. Studio holdouts include 20th Century Fox, NBC Universal, Sony Pictures, MGM and Warner Bros. … Munster predicts that Apple Inc. will officially announce the Beatles availability on iTunes within the next three months."

The New York Times (2/6, Flynn) reports, "The new agreement replaces one signed by the companies in 1991, when Apple Corps, which represents Paul McCartney; Ringo Starr; the estate of George Harrison; and Yoko Ono, the widow of John Lennon, moved to ensure that the computer company did not use the apple logo in the music business. The Apple Corps logo is a Granny Smith apple. The logo for Apple Inc. is an apple with a bite taken out of it. … But things changed in 2003 when Apple Computer, as it was known until it dropped 'Computer' from its name last month, began signing deals with record labels to distribute music online through iTunes. … Apple Computer had approached the British company in hopes of distributing the Beatles' music on iTunes, but Apple Corps instead accused the technology company of breaching the 1991 contract, arguing that Apple was essentially entering the music business with its service. … The Beatles are considered the last major holdout from online downloading services like iTunes. Today, Beatles fans can play Beatles music on an iPod only by transferring the songs from a CD." The Times notes, "With the Beatles dispute behind it, Apple Inc. faces still another trademark battle: a lawsuit filed by Cisco Systems, the networking company, over the use of the iPhone brand. Cisco has said the two companies have been unable to reach an agreement over the name after several years of discussion." The Washington Post/AP (2/6, D2) also reports this story.

State Street To Purchase Investors Financial. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, C3, Levitz) reports from Boston, "Bulking up in a bid to stay independent, securities-processing company State Street Corp. said it plans to buy Investors Financial Services Corp. for $4.5 billion in stock to become a big player in the hedge-fund realm." The Journal continues, "For years, State Street has prospered here as a leader in the unglamorous business of offering back-office custody work, such as portfolio accounting and issuing monthly statements to institutional investors such as mutual funds. … But the company, which has in the past faced unwanted takeover interest, now grapples with intensified competition in a rapidly consolidating industry in which big players hope to achieve economies of scale through acquisitions." The Journal adds, "To shore up its position, State Street is buying fast-growing Investors Financial, a smaller Boston neighbor that provides similar investment services to customers, including hedge funds -- lightly regulated private investment partnerships that cater largely to institutions and wealthy people. Financial-services companies are eager to cater to these sophisticated and fast-moving clients that have exploded in popularity. The two companies say the deal will create the No. 1 administrator of hedge-fund assets, in terms of assets under custody."

DOJ_NMG_0128071

Mills Corp. Receives Another Buyout Offer. The Washington Post (2/6, D3, Hedgpeth) reports, "The nation's largest mall owner and a hedge fund yesterday offered to buy the financially troubled Mills Corp. for $1.6 billion, exceeding the $1.35 billion offered by a Canadian company in January." The Post continues, "The latest offer for Mills of Chevy Chase, which owns about 40 malls nationwide, including Potomac Mills and Arundel Mills, was made by Simon Property Group and the hedge fund Farallon Capital Management. Simon is the country's largest real estate investment trust, by market value, and Farallon is Mills's largest shareholder." The Post adds, "Brookfield Asset Management, a Canadian investment company and owner of the World Financial Center in New York, made the earlier offer, which Mills accepted. … Simon, of Indianapolis, owns 285 properties across the country, including Bowie Town Center and Leesburg Corner Premium Outlet. Farallon of San Francisco manages $26 billion of equity capital." The Post notes, "Simon said its cash tender offer would allow Mills shareholders to get their cash as much as six months earlier than they would under Brookfield's deal. … In a statement, Mills said that it would 'promptly consider the proposal' from Simon but that the 'current merger agreement with Brookfield remains in effect.'"

The Washington Times (2/6, Haberkorn) reports, "What makes Mills so valuable, despite recent revelations that executives may have mismanaged funds and that it was running out of money, is its 38 shopping centers across the country. … Locally, it owns Lakeforest Mall in Gaithersburg, Potomac Mills and Potomac Town Center in Prince William County, Marley Station in Glen Burnie, Md., and Arundel Mills in Hanover, Md." The Times adds, "Simon's offer is cash, meaning shareholders could receive payment six months before they would under a Brookfield deal, the company said. … Simon Property Group is an Indianapolis real estate investment trust that owns the Fashion Centre at Pentagon City, Bowie Town Center, Leesburg (Va.) Corner Premium Outlets and St. Charles (Md.) Towne Center. … Simon said its experience would make it most qualified to run the Mills properties."

Icahn Seeks Takeover Of Lear. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (2/6, D02) reports, "Carl C. Icahn, the billionaire activist investor, offered to pay $2.31 billion for the 84 percent of auto-parts maker Lear Corp. that he does not already own." Bloomberg continues, "Lear and Icahn's American Real Estate Partners discussed the proposal over the weekend. Lear said in a regulatory filing yesterday that it was trying to reach an agreement. The cash offer of $36 a share from Icahn, the company's biggest shareholder, was criticized by its third-largest investor as too low. … Richard Pzena, whose New York investment group Pzena Investment Management owned 7.48 million, or 11 percent, of Lear's shares in November, sent a letter to the non-management directors expressing 'alarm' about the offer. 'To claim today that $36 is a fair price is quite disingenuous,' Pzena said in the letter. 'It is our fear that the company's management may have lost sight of the long-term value inherent in the company and that their personal interest in the transaction may create an inherent conflict.' … Pzena said that his staff and Icahn's staff met in November to talk about Icahn's increased stake in Lear and that analysts from both groups agreed on a valuation of $60 a share."

EU Judge To Make Microsoft Ruling By September. The AP (2/6) reports, "The judge due to rule on Microsoft Corp.'s appeal against the European Commission's antitrust order said Monday he hoped to publish his decision before he leaves office in September." The AP continues, "Bo Vesterdorf, the president of the Court of First Instance, refused to give a precise deadline for his ruling. … 'Obviously we would do our very best to get the case out as soon as at all possible,' he told reporters at an Informa legal conference in Brussels. 'It's a very big case.'" The AP adds, "Microsoft is challenging the European Union's 2004 antitrust order, which found the software maker broke competition law and fined it a record 497 million euros ($613 million). … To remedy market harms, the EU ordered the company to offer a version of its Windows computer operating system without Microsoft's media player software. The EU also ordered Microsoft to share communications code and information with rivals to help them develop server software that worked smoothly with the ubiquitous Windows platform."

ENVIRONMENT:

Pelosi, Dingell Reach Agreement On Global Warming Committee. The Hill (2/6, Kaplan) reports, "Ending a three-week long turf war, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) have reached an agreement on the parameters of the select committee on global warming. In a new letter to Pelosi, Dingell wrote that the select committee has no legislative authority and that the panel will expire on Oct. 30, 2008." He "wrote that he has 'assurances' from Pelosi that his committee will get first dibs to call witnesses where there could be potential conflict and that Pelosi will be consulted 'before the exercise of any compulsory powers by the select committee to ensure the appropriate coordination of efforts.'" The Hill adds, "The negotiations between Pelosi and Dingell to establish the panel have overshadowed difficulties Democrats face drafting a comprehensive energy bill. While they have overcome one turf battle, they probably will face many more regional and ideological disputes."

DOJ_NMG_0128072

China, UN Plan Beijing Carbon Trading Exchange. The Financial Times (2/6, Dickie, Harvey) reports China and the UN "are working to set up a carbon trading exchange in Beijing – a move that could establish the Chinese capital as an important centre for the multibillion-dollar global trade in carbon credits, according to the UN's top official in China." If successful, the exchange "would compete with private sector carbon exchanges established in Europe and the US, and would help to open up further the lucrative Chinese market in carbon credits."

WSJournal Blasts California "Nuisance" Suit Against Automakers. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/6, A16, 2.04M) writes that "it ought to be obvious that the absolute last branch of government that should set climate policy is the courts. As usual, California Attorney General Jerry Brown has his own ideas. At issue is a federal lawsuit filed last September by Mr. Brown's predecessor, Bill Lockyer, asking for billions of dollars worth of damages to be levied against six automakers...because their products allegedly create a common-law 'nuisance' by contributing to global warming." Brown "has decided to pursue the case, which he says rests on 'sound legal doctrine.'" There is "scarcely any economic activity imaginable that doesn't somehow affect the balance of greenhouse gases, which is why a 'nuisance' complaint against any single industry doesn't make sense. It's also why the judiciary has so far wisely refused to get drawn into this kind of blame game." The Journal concludes, "If environmentalists want the U.S. political system to do something about CO2 emissions, a good place to start would be convincing a majority of Americans that they are serious people with serious concerns. California's attempt to single out automakers -- which gives a whole new meaning to the term 'junk lawsuit' -- is not helping their case."

Applebaum Says Carbon Tax, Not Kyoto, Is Solution To Climate Change. In her Washington Post (2/6, A17, 690K) column, Anne Applebaum criticizes the Kyoto treaty, writing, "The limiting of fossil fuels cannot be carried out with an unenforceable international regime, using complicated regulations that the United Nations does not have the staff or the mandate to supervise, with the help of a treaty that effectively penalizes those who bother to abide by it." The solution to climate change "is grippingly unoriginal, requires no special knowledge of economics and is easy for any country to implement. It's called a carbon tax, and it should be applied across the board to every industry that uses fossil fuels, every home or building with a heating system, every motorist, and every public transportation system. Immediately, it would produce a wealth of innovations to save fuel, as well as new incentives to conserve." It "would produce a big chunk of money that could be used for other things." And "users of the tax would suddenly find themselves less dependent on Persian Gulf oil or Russian natural gas, too." Moreover, "the successful use of carbon taxes does not require 'American leadership,' or a U.N. committee, or a complicated international effort of any kind. It can be done country by country."

Energy Department Considers Ethanol Reserve. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, Jackson Randall, Heinsohn, 2.04M) reports, "As the U.S. Energy Department looks to expand the nation's emergency oil stockpile, officials are also considering whether it would be beneficial to create an ethanol reserve. 'Perhaps we should be thinking about having an ethanol reserve,' Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman told reporters Monday during a press briefing to discuss DOE's fiscal year 2008 budget proposal." Bodman "said there are several ideas being discussed as the Bush administration moves to expand the strategic petroleum reserve. The plan is to double the size of the oil stockpile, increasing it from its current capacity of 727 million barrels to 1.5 billion barrels in the next two decades. Administration officials are also considering whether there should be storage sites built in areas outside of the Gulf Coast, Mr. Bodman said." The Journal adds, "Aside from considering new locations for SPR sites, another question on the table is 'should we have an expansion in the type of fuel,' Mr. Bodman said, noting that the idea might have merit given the administration's newly announced goal of reducing gasoline use 20% in the next 10 years."

NYTimes Says US Needs To Reduce Appetite For Corn, Oil. The New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The current price of corn is $3.23 a bushel, more than half again what it was a year ago, and beginning to bring to mind the record $5.545 a bushel set in July 1996. There are many reasons for this price spurt. The ethanol boom has created a sharp new demand for corn. The Department of Agriculture revised its estimate of the 2006 corn harvest downward by some 200 million bushels because of weather and other factors. There is also a smaller corn reserve on hand than usual — the smallest in a decade — which parallels shortages around the world." Gratifying our "two major appetites — cheap food and cheap gas — used to seem easy because both corn and oil were abundant. Cheap oil helped keep corn prices low because it cost farmers less to run their tractors and combines." But "no matter how high prices go, what will need to change isn't the amount of corn acreage available or even the size of the enormous harvests we are already getting. What will need to change is the size of our appetites."

DOJ_NMG_0128073

Asarco Claims Mexican Owners Illegally Stripped Company's Assets. The Tacoma (WA) News Tribune (2/6, Blumenthal) reports, "One-time mining giant Asarco, charging that its Mexican owner stole its most valuable asset and left it to face $7 billion worth of environmental and asbestos-related claims, is asking a federal bankruptcy judge to void the transfer of two Peruvian copper mines to Grupo Mexico, S.A. de C.V." The Tribune continues, "The stakes are high for U.S. taxpayers, who would be stuck with the tab for cleaning up nearly 100 contaminated sites nationwide where Asarco once operated. If the court agrees that the mines were 'fraudulently transferred,' Asarco could recover several billion dollars, by some estimates." The Tribune adds, "In a 23-page complaint filed late Friday in a Texas bankruptcy court, Asarco alleged that Grupo Mexico plotted to gain control of Asarco's 54.2 percent interest in the Peruvian mines. The complaint, which one lawyer in the case said reads like a 'legal potboiler,' charges that Grupo Mexico took control of the mines with the "actual intent to hinder, delay and or defraud" Asarco's creditors. … Grupo Mexico is owned by one of Mexico's richest families, the Larreas. The complaint alleges that another of Mexico's super rich, Carlos Slim, who owns and controls Inbursa, a Mexican bank, may have benefited from the deal. The complaint describes Slim as a 'close associate' of the Larrea family." The Tribune notes, "Asarco is assembling a reorganization plan and trying to emerge from bankruptcy. It is still wholly owned by a Grupo Mexico subsidiary, but under federal bankruptcy laws it's now responsible to its creditors rather than to its stockholders. … Asarco, a century-old mining, smelting and refining company that once was listed on the Fortune 500, filed for bankruptcy protection in 2005. It faces about $6 billion in environmental claims filed by the federal government and more than a dozen states. It also faces 95,000 asbestos-related claims that could be worth between $500 million and $1 billion. … The federal Environmental Protection Agency filed a $1.3 billion claim for cleanup of Superfund sites across the country. The federal departments of Agriculture and Interior, along with local governments, several Indian tribes and private parties, have also filed environmental claims. … Asarco has talked with state and federal lawyers about the possibility of settling the environmental claims, though there are no offers in the table."

Extremely Cold Weather Makes News. All three network newscasts last night led their broadcasts with stories about the cold winter weather. ABC World News (2/5, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) said, "Yes, it is February. And, yes, it is supposed to be cold. But this is ridiculous." ABC (Reynolds) said in some places "it's the coldest it's been…this decade. And it's likely that future winters will be compared to this one." The CBS Evening News (2/5, lead story, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "If you've been wondering what happened to winter, chances are you're getting your answer tonight," and NBC Nightly News (1/5, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) said "a kind of cold weather has descended across a large part of this country that is cold enough to now be dangerous."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Visits El Salvador To Coordinate Anti-Gang Activities. KBNT-TV (Univision), San Diego, CA (2/5, 11:18 p.m.) broadcasted (translated from Spanish), "From the US Justice Department, Alberto Gonzales was in El Salvador to meet with president Antonio Saco, and with officials from El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala. The meeting was to coordinate actions in the war against gangs. Gonzales' visit forms a union for Latin America, which includes visits to Argentina and Brazil. Felipe Calderon, president of Mexico, lost all political parties that surpass their differences and arrived to productive agreements for the country.

KWEX-TV, San Antonio, TX (2/5, 10:10 p.m.) and KDTV-TV, in San Francisco, Oakland and San Jose, CA also broadcasted this story.

New Jersey Man Accused Of Leading Multimillion-Dollar Drug Network. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (2/6) reports a New Jersey man "was arrested Jan. 25 as the alleged ringleader of a multimillion-dollar narcotics network." Mohamed Hassanain "allegedly ran the drug ring from his home as well as his business, Lyons Avenue Auto Sales in Newark, said state police in New Jersey." The charges against Hassanain "stem from a six-month investigation led by New Jersey State Police and the Attorney General's Division of Criminal Justice, with assistance from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. The investigation, dubbed 'Operation Pandora,' determined the network allegedly sold 20,000 to 30,000 OxyContin and Percocet pills per week, most going to a distribution ring based in Bronx, N.Y., according to state police Col. Rick Fuentes."

DOJ_NMG_0128074

Authorities Say California Man Attempted To Smuggle Meth Aboard Hawaiian Airlines Flight. In San Jose, the AP (2/6) reports an East Palo Alto man "allegedly tried to smuggle three pounds of methamphetamine in his cargo pants while trying to board a Hawaiian Airlines flight. Michael James Cade, 26, was charged Friday in U.S. District Court in San Jose with possession with intent to distribute at least 50 grams of methamphetamine. … While patting him down, a Transportation Security Administration agent 'felt a large bulk item in the front right pocket of Cade's cargo pants,' Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent Anthony Guzman wrote in a charging document." A test "concluded that the crystal-like substance was methamphetamine, Guzman wrote." The San Diego Union-Tribune used the AP story.

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/5, Lee) reported authorities "said they believe Cade was smuggling the drugs and, since he had only $10 with him, had hoped to be paid for the illicit cargo in his pants. Cade has previous convictions for felony theft, grand theft and narcotics possession, the affidavit said."

In New Jersey, Sentencing Of "Drug Kingpin" Expected Tomorrow. The Newark (NJ) Star-Ledger (2/6, Whelan) reports Hakeem Curry, "convicted by a jury last July of conspiracy, money laundering and drug trafficking, could face 30 years to life in prison under federal sentencing guidelines. … Curry's conviction was one of the most significant for federal law enforcement officials since they began investigating and prosecuting drug gang members as part of ongoing conspiracies. During an investigation that spanned more than a year, Drug Enforcement Administration agents built the case by secretly taping tens of thousands of phone calls of Curry and his associates." Prosecutors "said Curry's criminal organization pumped tens of millions of dollars of cocaine and heroin onto the streets in Essex and Union counties for more than a decade and arranged for the murders of a rival and another government witness slated to testify against one of Curry's allies." The Star-Ledger says Curry is set to be sentenced tomorrow.

South Carolina Judge Refuses To Suppress Evidence In Drug Conspiracy Case. The Spartanburg (SC) Herald Journal (2/6) reports a federal drug conspiracy case "involving hundreds of pounds of marijuana and more than 10 pounds of cocaine is headed to court this week for two men who have pleaded not guilty. Two women and 13 men in the Upstate have already pleaded guilty to charges including weapons violations and conspiracy to distribute cocaine, crack cocaine and marijuana, but none have been sentenced." On Monday in Spartanburg, U.S. District Judge Henry Floyd "refused to suppress evidence gathered using a search warrant at the home of one of the men who will stand trial, Alviero Mesa-Lopez of Greer. While executing the search warrant at Mesa-Lopez's residence…authorities found 1,400 pounds of marijuana, several ounces of crystal methamphetamine [and] one kilogram of cocaine."

Attorneys For Accused Mexican Drug Kingpin May Try To Blame Brother. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/6, Soto) reports, "Defense lawyers for accused Tijuana drug cartel kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix hinted at a defense in court yesterday: His brother Benjamín actually was running the drug organization from a Mexican prison." The Union-Tribune continues, "The lawyers mentioned the theory while asking federal prosecutors to give them any documents that might help prove that in preparation for a trial in less than a year. … Javier Arellano took over as head of the murderous drug-running ring in 2002 after Benjamín was jailed and another brother, Ramón, was killed, prosecutors said in court papers filed last week. … Defense lawyers said they hope to prove that's not the case as they defend Javier from charges that could lead to the death penalty." The Union-Tribune adds, "Prosecutors said they would turn over all their evidence as required by law. … U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is expected to decide whether prosecutors will seek the death penalty. U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns set an Oct. 10 deadline for prosecutors to announce how they plan to proceed. … Burns wants jury selection in the case to begin right after Thanksgiving and witnesses to begin testifying in January. Defense lawyers said that is too soon."

Convicted Officer Testifies In Former ATF Agent's Suit Against Chicago. The Chicago Tribune (2/6, Coen) reports, "Drawing chuckles from jurors for his Chicago mannerisms and colorful language, infamous former Police Officer Joseph Miedzianowski was back in federal court Monday, but only in a videotaped deposition in a case involving a one-time federal agent who is suing the city." The Tribune continues, "Tapes of Miedzianowski being questioned about his dealings with former Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Agent Diane Klipfel were played for the panel. Klipfel and her agent husband are suing Chicago, charging that when they tried to blow the whistle on Miedzianowski in 1992, the city ignored the allegations and Miedzianowski was able to turn the Police Department's internal affairs unit against them." The Tribune adds, "Dressed in prison garb with short hair and a hint of a goatee, Miedzianowski admitted in the video that he doesn't like Klipfel. He called her out of control, a liar and a lunatic. He eventually was arrested in 1998 and later convicted of masterminding a massive Chicago-to-Miami drug ring and was dubbed the most corrupt police officer in Chicago history by federal prosecutors. … 'Lunatic would've been one of the nicer words I would've used on her,' Miedzianowski said." The Tribune notes, "Miedzianowski said Klipfel sowed dissent among agents and officers while she supervised a gang detail of which he was a member, and she made false allegations against him to cover her own questionable conduct. … In her testimony, Klipfel had described an enraged Miedzianowski who kicked her car and threatened her when she confronted him about taking money from the dealer and others. Miedzianowski described calmer meetings called by Klipfel, and he said the matter in dispute was that she wanted to give inventoried cash back to the dealer."

DOJ_NMG_0128075

ATF Agent Tells Of Life Undercover Infiltrating Motorcycle Gang. CNN (2/6, Arena, Bronstein, Spellman) reports from Mesa, AZ, "In a parched, secluded desert, a brutal killing is caught on videotape. A member of the feared and violent Mongol motorcycle gang is shot in the head at close range. His body is dumped in a shallow grave. … That murder was Jay Dobyns' ticket for membership into the Hells Angels motorcycle gang, Dobyns said. … 'I had committed, like the ultimate deed, the ultimate act of loyalty to these guys,' Dobyns said in an exclusive CNN interview." CNN continues, "But that murder was a fake, complete with special effects, cow guts for brains and artificial blood. What's more, Dobyns had a dark secret he was keeping from his fellow Hells Angels gang members: He was actually an agent for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and was infiltrating the gang to help bring them down. (Read about Dobyns' complaints against the ATF) … For nearly two years, from 2001-2003, Dobyns abandoned his old life, his family and his friends to wear the Hells Angels trademark vest and to simultaneously build a case against the most feared motorcycle gang in the world. If he'd been caught, he figured he would be dead. … The undercover plot was elaborate: Dobyns even had to fake a romantic relationship with a fellow biker played by a female agent, so he had an excuse not to sleep with other women. … Dobyns saw what few outsiders have ever seen -- the inner workings of the Hells Angels. He says that included gun and drug trafficking, extortion, rape and even murder. And Dobyns testified about it all in court."

California Officials Offer Reward For Illegal Guns. The Sacramento Bee (2/6, Jewett) reports, "Sacramento law enforcement leaders have announced a new program offering $1,000 rewards to get illegal guns off the street." The Bee continues, "Authorities are turning to YouTube, MySpace.com and text messaging - communication highways for teens - to promote a new program offering $1,000 rewards for information about illegal guns." The Bee adds, "The rewards will go to anonymous callers who provide police with information about an illegal gun or unlawful gun owner - if the information leads to an arrest. In California, felons are not allowed to own guns, and only people with permits can carry loaded firearms. … 'This is one of the things we're doing to try to reduce the level of violence we see on the streets,' Sacramento Police Chief Albert Najera said at a press conference with Sacramento County Sheriff John McGinness and agents from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives."

US Will Not Charge ATF Agents In Arlington Shooting. The Washington Post (2/6, B02, Stockwell) reports, "Arlington County's chief prosecutor has ruled that there will be no charges against the federal agents who exchanged gunfire with a man who then broke into an Arlington home, shot another man and kept police at bay for 10 hours last summer." The Post continues, "Commonwealth's Attorney Richard E. Trodden said an investigation into the July 5 incident found that the three agents acted in self-defense when they fired at Travis Hampton, 24. Hampton had fired several shots at the agents before leading them on a chase that zigzagged through the county's narrow streets, Trodden said. Hampton, of Southeast Washington, later fatally shot himself inside the home he had broken into. … 'We found no grounds for any kind of criminal case,' Trodden said. 'The only real issue here was whether the agents acted properly, and we found they certainly had a right to defend themselves.'" The Post adds, "The incident began as a minor collision at the height of rush hour on Interstate 395 south and evolved into a tense standoff that lasted into the next morning and involved out-of-town agents from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. Moments before the crash, Trodden said, Hampton had robbed a drug dealer of marijuana at gunpoint from inside the car, which belonged to his girlfriend. … ATF spokeswoman Sheree Mixell would not comment on the case and declined to say whether the agents faced any internal action. She referred calls to the civil rights division of the Justice Department, which also reviewed the case. A spokesman there did not a return a message left yesterday."

IMMIGRATION:

Report Highlights Role Of Immigrant Entrepreneurs. The New York Times (2/6, Bernstein, 1.16M) reports as "the flow of immigrants to suburban and small-town America outpaces the growth of bustling ethnic centers in New York, many foreign-born entrepreneurs" are "facing an unfamiliar crossroads. In the city, rising rents and density hamper growth, while swelling ethnic enclaves in the suburbs generate competitors. Yet in other places, opportunity beckons as never before, as immigrants expand the tastes of mainstream America." Whether these businesses "exploit the new chances to break out or succumb to the new perils, the city's economy will feel the effects." Jonathan Bowles, director of the Center for an Urban Future, says, "These are precious and important economic generators for New York City, and there's a risk that we might lose them over the next decade." The Times adds a report published by the center says even in cities like New York, "where immigrant-friendly mayors have promoted programs to help small business…immigrant entrepreneurs have been overlooked in long-term strategies for economic development."

DOJ_NMG_0128076

LATimes Urges Deportation For Convicted Illegal Immigrants. The Los Angeles Times (2/6) editorializes, "Police should not act like immigration agents, nor should landlords. But if there's one place it's wholly appropriate for local officials to crack down on illegal immigrants, it's in county jail." The Times continues, "Two years ago, Los Angeles County kicked off a controversial program to screen the immigration status of jail inmates more carefully. Eight custody assistants with the Sheriff's Department were trained to investigate inmates' backgrounds, and in October, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement doubled the number of agents assigned to local jails. The result, as Times staff writers Patrick McGreevy and Stuart Pfeifer reported Monday, is that the number of inmates flagged for deportation nearly doubled last year, to 5,829." The Times adds, "L.A. jails are facing an overcrowding crisis, and illegal immigrants are part of the problem. Federal officials estimate that as many as 40,000 of the 170,000 inmates who pass through local jails each year are in this country illegally. Deporting them won't solve overcrowding in the short term because they have to serve their sentences before being turned over to the feds, but it will probably reduce crime and the jail population over the long term. Meanwhile, illegal residents will have more incentive to obey the law, without being unduly discouraged from cooperating with police. … The only legitimate fear about the jail program is that cops may bust street thugs they suspect to be illegal immigrants for the tiniest of infractions, knowing that a deportation hearing will follow the punishment. But this is a narrow concern that requires monitoring; it's not a deal-breaker. … There should be a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants, but convicts have forfeited the right to be on it. Send them home."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Presents Budget Plan As Blueprint To Balance Budget Without Raising Taxes. President Bush yesterday unveiled his budget proposal to largely negative media reviews. Reports tend to focus on proposed spending reductions on domestic programs, including Medicare, while casting a skeptical eye on the Administration's claims that its spending blueprint would balance the budget in five years. For example, the Wall Street Journal (2/6, A12, McKinnon, 2.04M), in a story titled "On Deficit Cutting, Skeptics Abound," says Bush "often describes himself as optimistic about the nation's future, and he demonstrated that again with his 2008 budget request to Congress. … Even if the White House is able to persuade Democrats to cut 141 federal programs, squeeze nonsecurity programs to a 1% annual growth rate and make sharp cuts in Medicare, Mr. Bush's projections still don't account for several big potential budget-busters, as budget analysts and Democratic critics were quick to note yesterday."

The Financial Times (2/6, Guha) says the "deficit dynamic" in Bush's plan "is substantially driven by the way the budget accounts for the cost of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan." The White House "set out to show that it is possible to balance the budget by 2012 while making the Bush tax cuts permanent. The budget indeed does this, though the fiscal maths rests on certain assumptions, some of which – like the rapid decline in war costs – look optimistic. The biggest assumption is that it is possible to hold non-security discretionary spending growth to 1 per cent in nominal cash terms."

Likewise, ABC World News (2/5, story 2, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) said Bush's plan shows a balanced budget in 2012 "in part by projecting no war costs at all after 2009, increasing Medicare premiums for seniors with incomes over $80,000" and "reducing Medicaid costs by $12 billion and farm subsidies by $18 billion over five years." The budget also "wants to deeply cut 141 unnamed Federal programs." NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 4, 2:25, Gregory, 9.87M) noted "such proposals have been rejected in the past."

Bush's budget is being described as a reiteration of principles put forth throughout his presidency. The New York Times (2/6, Stolberg, 1.16M) says the budget "made few concessions to the political realities facing Mr. Bush. For a president less than two years from the end of his second term, and with his poll numbers low, it was a defiant statement of the principles he has championed for years." Likewise, the Chicago Tribune (2/6, Silva, 617K) reports Bush's plan "is much like the budgets he has presented for the past six years, averting new taxes and limiting spending in many 'discretionary' areas while boosting defense spending. … What is different is the political environment in which the president is delivering his newest spending plan." In fact, says the AP (2/6, Davis), Bush "asked Congress on Monday to slash taxes by $1.9 trillion over the next decade, cementing his first-term tax cuts while changing the way health insurance is taxed. The lion's share of the president's proposed tax reductions would come from making permanent his signature cuts enacted in 2001 and 2003, at a cost of $1.6 trillion over the next 10 years."

DOJ_NMG_0128077

USA Today (2/6, Jackson, Wolf, 2.27M) says Bush's plan "sets the stage for a series of politically difficult debates over war, taxes and the safety net for poor, elderly and disabled Americans. By laying down his priorities, Bush wooed Democrats with spending proposals they favor and made clear that if they want to raise taxes to pay for more, they will have to propose it themselves." If Democrats "reject those proposals," they "may need to boost taxes in their own budget plan, to be written this spring." The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Simon, 850K) reports "promises of more federal dollars clashed with fiscal reality as a deficit-minded Bush sent his first budget to a Democratic-controlled Congress." The Washington Times (2/6, Dinan, 88K) says Bush is "butting heads with Democrats by calling for Mr. Bush's tax cuts to be made permanent -- at a value of $1.2 trillion over 10 years."

Fox News' Special Report (2/5, Baier) reported, "Senior administration officials call it a budget designed around pro-growth policies that have already proven they can keep the economy moving forward." Rob Portman, head of the Office of Management and Budget, was shown saying, "To increase taxes would to put at risk the economy that has generated the revenues that are largely responsible for putting us in a better fiscal condition."

Roll Call (2/6, Pierce) reports, "As Republicans go, Democrats really like…Portman. It's just too bad for the Office of Management and Budget director that he works for the Bush administration." Senate Budget Chairman Kent Conrad "praised Portman as 'a thoughtful, bright person who is concerned about the long-term unsustainability of our fiscal situation.' So does that mean that Conrad is approaching with an open mind the $2.9 trillion fiscal 2008 budget the White House delivered on Monday? 'The problem is not with the staff. The problem is at the top,' Conrad said." Roll Call adds, "That's the overwhelming sentiment Portman, a former Ohio Congressman, faces over the next few weeks as he teams up with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson to sell…Bush's budget blueprint to a skeptical Democratic majority on Capitol Hill."

The expected partisan clash is another major focus of media reports this morning. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A1, Rogers, 2.04M) reports Bush "put a little of everything in his 2008 budget: high spending, assumptions that the government will collect still-higher revenues, and the promise of a modest surplus in five years, even if his tax cuts remain intact." But "no amount of optimism is expected to head off what is likely to be a continuing series of conflicts in coming months between the White House and lawmakers on priorities ranging from urban housing to farm subsidies and defense spending to investments in child health care and education." Democrats "share the president's goal of erasing the federal budget deficit by 2012, but would take a very different path. The two biggest flash points between the White House and Congress are taxes and the war in Iraq. Conflict over these two issues alone could derail Mr. Bush's promise of a modest surplus in five years -- the first since 2001."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Havemann, Reynolds, 850K) says "the heat flared up immediately Monday as Republicans lined up squarely behind Bush's budget for fiscal 2008, while Democrats castigated it as both heartless and fiscally irresponsible." The "sharp divide seemed to shatter the spirit of bipartisanship that both parties had cultivated since the Democrats captured control of Congress in November's elections."

On NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 4, 2:25, Gregory, 9.87M), Democratic Sen. Kent Conrad was shown saying, "I would characterize this proposal as filled with debt and deception. It is disconnected from reality and it continues to move America in the wrong direction." McClatchy (2/6, Rosen) reports, "The new Democratic chairmen of the congressional budget committees assailed President Bush's spending plan Monday as a fiscal ruse that's based on inflated government revenue projections and understated future war costs." Conrad and Rep. John Spratt "gave caustic reviews to Bush's 2008 fiscal year budget, the first of the annual fiscal proposals he has submitted to a Democratic-controlled Congress. … Spratt accused Bush of using budgetary sleight of hand to buttress his claim that the federal deficit -- projected at $172 billion this year by the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) -- would disappear by 2012 under his plan."

The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A12, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "In his new budget yesterday, Mr. Bush proposed some modest ways to restrain the wealth gap, particularly by offering new tax breaks to help the uninsured buy health insurance, but did little to fundamentally strengthen existing government efforts to alter the distribution of income. Included in his budget also was a proposal to extend his 2001 and 2003 tax cuts, which Democrats say benefit the rich over everyone else. … Rather than using the tax code to redistribute income more than it does already, Mr. Bush's budget looks to address inequality largely by helping people afford health insurance and providing more money for education, including increased Pell grants for college."

Skelton Says Congress May Pare Down Defense Spending. USA Today (2/6, 5A, Brook, 2.27M) reports, "Bush's budget brings Pentagon spending to $623 billion for 2008. It also includes a supplemental request for $99 billion to pay for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan and other costs of the war on terror for the rest of this year." The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A13, Jaffe, Karp, 2.04M) notes Rep. Ike Skelton, "the Missouri Democrat who chairs the House Armed Services Committee, suggested the Democratic-led Congress may move to pare back the defense budget. 'We cannot provide an adequate national defense on the cheap, but neither can we afford to simply ratify the president's request without performing the due diligence and oversight our Constitution requires,' Rep. Skelton said."

DOJ_NMG_0128078

The Washington Post (2/6, A6, Tyson, 690K) says Bush's defense budget request "pushes US defense spending to levels not seen since the Reagan-era buildup of the 1980s." The Washington Times (2/6, Kralev, 88K) runs a similar report. The New York Times (2/6, Cloud, 1.16M) notes "more than a quarter of the money the Bush administration is requesting in the 2008 fiscal year for military operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere would go toward repairing and replacing military equipment, according to budget figures released Monday by the Pentagon. The scale of the request illustrates the toll that years of combat in Iraq and Afghanistan are taking on the military's vehicles, aircraft, weapons and other equipment." But "some budget experts say its size also raises questions about whether the military is using the argument that troops fighting in the field need equipment in top condition to increase purchases of equipment generally."

Rumsfeld Shown In Old Footage Underestimating Cost Of Iraq War. ABC World News (2/5, story 2, 2:25, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "The staggering costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan come through loud and clear in the President's budget: $163 billion this year, and at least $142 billion more estimated for next year. One Democratic Senator pointed out the Administration had at one point claimed the war would cost a fraction of that." Donald Rumsfeld, former Secretary of Defense (from January 19, 2003, appearance on ABC's "This Week"): "Office of Management and Budget estimated that it would be something under $50 billion." George Stephanopoulos: "Our estimates say under $300 billion." Rumsfeld: "Baloney."

Democrats Said To Face Limited Options. The New York Times (2/6, Weisman, 1.16M) reports, "In theory, the budget presents the Democrats their first real opportunity to rewrite the administration's policies, especially on tax cuts, that they have been attacking for six years. But in practice, Democrats know that the only way they can find the revenue to restore the administration's proposed spending cuts would be to cut back on military spending, delay their stated intentions to balance the budget or rescind the Bush tax cuts in future years. They are not especially eager to do any of these." The Times adds, "The most likely result, even some Democrats acknowledge, will be a limited reshaping of the budget by restoring some proposed cuts in a variety of domestic programs, including children's health care, Head Start and home heating assistance for the poor and the elderly."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/6, Grier, Chaddock, 59K) reports, "A president's opponents routinely deride his budget as dead on arrival. Despite this, months of congressional hearings on its details follow. In the end, much of the plan will provide a blueprint for the day-to-day operations of many federal departments and agencies."

Bush Calling For Means Testing, "Deepest Medicare Cuts" Of His Presidency. Much of the coverage emphasizes the budget's spending reductions on healthcare and other social programs. The Financial Times (2/6, Daniel, Guha) reports Bush's budget sets "the stage for a confrontation with Democrats by making greater means-testing for middle-class benefits a central part of his proposals to address entitlement reform. The budget represents a challenge to parts of the system of entitlements enacted as part of the Great Society agenda of the 1960s, with plans to cut Medicare spending, the main publicly funded health insurance programme for those over 65, by raising premiums for wealthier recipients." And in addition, says USA Today (2/6, Appleby, 2.27M), "Higher-income Medicare beneficiaries -- those earning more than $80,000 individually or $160,000 as a couple -- would pay more for the new drug benefit under the president's budget released Monday."

The AP (2/6, Taylor) reports that the proposal "pinches programs cherished by Democrats," while the Washington Post (2/6, A1, Abramowitz, Montgomery, 690K) says "Bush signaled he would attempt to squeeze spending on health care, education, housing and other domestic programs important to the Democratic majority for the duration of his term. Overall domestic spending would be held below the rate of inflation in the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 and frozen thereafter."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports, "The budget…calls for the deepest Medicare cuts of his six years in office and falls short in expanding health coverage to uninsured children -- a top priority for congressional Democrats this year. … Consumer and industry groups -- including AARP, the American Medical Association, the American Cancer Society, the Alzheimer's Association and the California Hospital Association -- roundly criticized Bush's plan, and their opposition signaled that it is unlikely to gain traction." The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A13, Zhang, 2.04M), in a story titled "Medicare Cuts To Be Painful," says "hospitals would bear the brunt of…Bush's proposal to cut Medicare spending by $65.6 billion over five years. … In total, hospitals would see about $30 billion in Medicare payment cuts over the next five years, industry analysts said. Industry lobbyists vowed a fierce fight to block the proposed cuts." The Washington Post (2/6, A7, Lee, 690K) also notes Bush's call for "across-the-board cuts in provider payments if Medicare spending reaches certain levels."

The AP (1/6, Freking) reports "hospitals, nursing homes and other providers say that they can't afford lower payments from the government. They said that the payments won't keep up with the cost of providing health care." The New York Times (2/6, Pérez-Peña, 1.16M) also runs a story on how the Bush budget would affect New York Hospitals. The Times says the Bush budget "includes deep cuts in spending to train young doctors, cuts that would hit New York especially hard, eliminating several hundred million dollars a year in payments to teaching hospitals around the state."

DOJ_NMG_0128079

Budget's "Winners" And "Losers" Noted. In an analysis of the budget, McClatchy (2/6) lists the Defense Department, Veteran Affairs, and the State, Interior and Labor Departments the "winners," while it estimates the biggest "losers" are Amtrak, the Environmental Protection Agency, Low Income Home Energy Assistance, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, the Education Department, the Labor Department's Bureau of International Labor Affairs, the Office of Disability Employment Policy and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The Washington Post (2/6, A7, Hsu, 690K) offers a similar overview of the budget.

In its "Federal Diary," the Washington Post (2/6, D1, Barr, 690K) reports the budget "contains nuggets of good news for federal employees: Their numbers would grow, as would their salaries." But "those retiring after relatively short careers would lose part of the standard health insurance subsidy. And many employees not involved in national and homeland security would see their programs operate with flat or reduced funding in fiscal 2008."

The Washington Post (2/6, B1, Sheridan, MacGillis, 690K) reports the plan "would provide hundreds of millions of dollars for projects in the Washington area, including a new Homeland Security complex in Southeast and improvements to roads and Metro." But "Democratic lawmakers said it does not include enough for homeland security, health care and cleanup of the Chesapeake Bay."

The Washington Post (2/6, C3, Trescott, 690K) also reports, "The federal cultural agencies and museums received solid support yesterday from the White House in the proposed budget for fiscal 2008." The Administration proposed "$678.4 million for the Smithsonian complex, the largest of the cultural accounts. If passed by Congress at that level, the budget would include an increase of more than $20 million for utilities, rents and salaries; $10 million for improvements to a storage facility for anthropological and art collections in Suitland; $9.9 million for planning for the National Museum of African American History and Culture; and $18 million for improvements at the National Zoo, including $9 million for the new elephant habitat."

Budget Shifts $1 Billion To NCLB. The Washington Post (2/6, A7, Paley, 690K) reports, "Bush proposed $56 billion in Education Department funding, level with his proposal for the current fiscal year" and included "$1 billion in new spending related to the landmark No Child Left Behind law. Democrats and education groups attacked Bush's proposal" saying that it would "slash key education programs and fall short of full funding" for NCLB."

The Washington Times (2/6, 88K) reports, "The $2.9 trillion spending blueprint calls for establishing a national expectation that all high school students will graduate on time and be prepared for college or the workplace. Bush is seeking more than a $1 billion increase in Title I grants for students attending high schools in low-income areas and $100 million for reading programs. Some $412 million is being sought to help pay for achievement testing."

National Education Association President Reg Weaver writes in a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (2/6, 2.04M) that school vouchers "would actually reduce attractive choices for most parents" because "most elite private schools charge higher fees than vouchers would provide, they would only serve as a subsidy for students already attending private schools" and "everyone else would be left in public schools with dwindling resources." Instead, "the way to give parents more positive choices is to improve our public schools. The NEA agrees with President Bush that the No Child Left Behind Act should be reauthorized; meantime, we have a positive agenda to improve the law."

Budget Includes Boost In Pell Grant, Cut In Student Loan Subsidy To Banks. USA Today (2/6, 3B, Block, 2.27M) reports, "The budget President Bush proposed Monday would increase federal grants to low-income college students by 33% over five years and pay for it by reducing subsidies to private lenders." The maximum Pell grant "which hasn't been increased since 2003," would be raised "to $5,400 from $4,050 over five years. To offset the cost, the administration proposes reducing interest-rate subsidies to private lenders by half a percentage point." And "news of the plan sparked a sell-off in shares of publicly traded lenders."

The Wall Street Journal (2/6, Godfrey, 2.04M) reports the plan "is substantially more ambitious than one being pursued in Congress, in which lawmakers also reduced lender guarantees, but cut the lender rate subsidy by just 10 basis points."

No Provisions To Build Entire Border Fence Or Reform Social Security, AMT. The Washington Times (2/6, Dinan, Seper, 88K) reports "Bush's new budget would pay for only about half of the 700 miles of US-Mexico border fence he and Congress four months ago promised to build." The plan "makes good on his promise to fund 3,000 new U.S. Border Patrol agents, putting him near his goal of doubling the agency's size" and "asks for $1 billion in new money to build the fence. Even coupled with $1.5 billion appropriated in the past two years, this would not pay for the entire fence called for in a bill Congress passed and the president signed into law in October."

Meanwhile, McClatchy (2/6, Hall) reports, "Bush's budget ducks tough issues such as shoring up Social Security and overhauling the alternative minimum tax, which threatens to punish millions of middle-class taxpayers in coming years. … For several years, Congress has avoided the AMT's impact on middle-class families by passing one-year patches. Bush's budget assumes no more patches after the 2008 tax year. He also assumes that new revenues from the AMT will help him balance the budget by 2012. Congress is unlikely to go along, however." However, says the Wall Street Journal (2/6, D1, Herman, Chaker, 2.04M), "some kind of AMT fix is likely to win congressional approval. Among those already feeling the pinch of the AMT are many people who live in high-tax areas, such as New York City, New Jersey, and California and those with large families."

DOJ_NMG_0128080

Bush Budgets $71.7 Million For Mexico Border Water Treatment. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A12, Paltrow, 2.04M) reports the White House, "stepping into a controversy over cross-border pollution from Mexico, asked Congress for $71.7 million to enhance treatment of sewage drifting from Tijuana to communities in Southern California if a plan to use a private contractor falls through." Until 2000, "the U.S. had planned to expand treatment of sewage from Tijuana at an existing government-owned treatment plant on the border in San Ysidro, Calif. The intent was to help stem pollution from raw sewage causing beach closings and damaging a wildlife estuary on the U.S. side." But "a group of Southern California lawmakers was able to cut off funding for that plan and instead helped a start-up company, Bajagua LLC, a generous contributor to their campaigns, get a no-bid contract to build an entirely new plant on the Mexican side of the border."

Bush Budget Would Close All Public Libraries In Oregon County. The Christian Science Monitor (2/6, Knickerbocker, 59K) reports, "In a corner of southwestern Oregon, a century's worth of American history is bumping up against the politics of federal spending. As a result, all 15 public libraries in Jackson County could be shuttered in a few weeks for loss of federal payments. Washington, Alaska, Montana, and other states would be affected as well. In California, more than 4,500 schools face imminent teacher and administrator layoffs." As "a portion of President Bush's $2.9 trillion budget sent to Congress Monday, not much money is involved: about $800 million or so." But "the cutoff in funding has united lawmakers across the political spectrum – from Sen. Ted Stevens (R) of Alaska on the right to Sen. Barbara Boxer (D) of California on the left. Normally mild-mannered Sen. Gordon Smith (R) of Oregon is threatening to filibuster a $464 billion continuing resolution meant to fund the federal government for the rest of the fiscal year because of what is, in essence, a quirk of history." The county, along with others, have been receiving federal funds to make up for the loss of revenue from the timber harvest, which declined sharply in the late 1990s.

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, 2.04M) editorializes, "Politicians are typically late in picking up trends, so it will be interesting to see how long it takes Washington to acknowledge the big story in the Fiscal 2008 budget that…Bush unveiled yesterday: To wit, with a little spending restraint, Congress could balance the budget in no time. You wouldn't know this from all the garment-rending yesterday in response to Mr. Bush's proposal to spend the not-so-meager sum of $2.9 trillion. Our favorite agonist is Kent Conrad, the Senate Budget Committee Chairman, and he didn't disappoint. 'The President's budget is filled with debt and deception, disconnected from reality, and continues to move America in the wrong direction,' said the Senator who was himself blocked from sneaking nearly $5 billion in 'emergency' farm spending into a military construction bill in the final days of the last Congress. … The news Mr. Conrad won't broadcast is that over the past three years the federal deficit has shrunk by 58%."

The Washington Post (2/6, A16, 690K) says in an editorial that "Bush's balance is more illusory than real. It ignores known costs such as ameliorating the impact of the alternative minimum tax, which would top $90 billion in 2012 alone; the administration, once again, would simply affix a one-year patch for 2008. It assumes the government will collect far more revenue than the Congressional Budget Office projects, amounting to a $150 billion difference in 2012. No one should start spending Mr. Bush's projected surplus." The Post adds, "The more fundamental problem with Mr. Bush's supposedly balanced budget is its fundamentally unbalanced approach. He squeezes social programs while his tax cuts remain untouchable."

The New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) editorializes, "Apart from war costs and personnel increases, this budget slips in more than $40 billion in other spending increases, compared with last year. Since Mr. Bush took office, the Pentagon budget has more than doubled. It is now higher, in real terms, than it has been in the past half-century." Congress "should direct particular attention to the roughly $140 billion in weapons procurement, research and development costs that are not part of the Iraq and Afghanistan section of the budget. Far too many of these programs are products of cold war strategic thinking and have outlived their rationale in a world with no superpower arms race. … This nation can afford to pay for all of its legitimate military needs. What it cannot afford are costly jobs programs disguised as defense and the wasteful weapons projects promoted by an army of well-connected Washington lobbyists."

Steven Rattner, managing principal at the Quadrangle Group, a private investment firm, writes in the New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) that when Bush "sent his new budget to Congress yesterday, he trumpeted a continuing decline in the deficit and projected a swing back into the black by 2012." But "the accounting in the thick volumes issued by his Office of Management and Budget bears about as much similarity to the practices of private sector companies as Sanskrit does to Chinese. For sometimes obscure and sometimes political reasons, the federal government reports its finances in a way that portrays them far more favorably than they deserve. … The Sarbanes-Oxley Act tried to reform misleading private sector practices. The federal government needs a similar effort."

DOJ_NMG_0128081

Administration Plans To Cut "Tax Gap" By $29.5 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, Wells, 2.04M) reports the Bush Administration is "launching an effort to collect an estimated $29.5 billion in uncollected taxes, partly through new reporting requirements on securities sales." The proposals "to close part of the estimated $290 billion tax gap are included in the White House's proposed $2.9 trillion budget plan for the 2008 fiscal year, released Monday." The Bush budget "would require corporations, investors and merchants to report more details of their business dealings to the Internal Revenue Service. This is part of a move to boost the overall compliance rate with the tax code, which was 86% in 2001." A key proposal "in this expanded 'information reporting' includes new reporting requirements for the basis of publicly traded securities, which involves a measure of stock purchase price plus any necessary adjustments."

Bush Proposal Would Revamp FAA Funding. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A12, Matthews, 2.04M) reports President Bush "told Congress he wants to scrap the passenger-ticket taxes used to help fund the air-traffic control system and replace them with user fees for commercial airlines." However, the result "will be some air travelers, commercial airlines and corporate jet owners are likely to end up paying more to fly to pay for a new generation of traffic control technology." The proposed changes "would take effect in 2009 and mark a major shift in how the Federal Aviation Administration is funded."

McConnell To Pressure Democrats On Judicial Nominations. The Hill (2/6, Bolton) reports Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) is "signaling to colleagues that he will take a personal and leading role in pressuring Democrats to confirm President Bush's judicial nominees, an issue that has received little attention since the election." Republican senators "agreed to make judicial nominees one of their top priorities at a one-day retreat held Friday at the Library of Congress before a meeting with Bush at the White House. Other key concerns, which senators designated in questionnaires they submitted to the Republican leadership, are fiscal policy, taxes, budget, healthcare, energy security, immigration reform and national security." While Bush "has said he still wants to push Social Security reform, the senators did not include it in their broad agenda for the next two years, indicating a lack of support for the measure." At the retreat, McConnell "kicked off the private talk on judges and reiterated his expectations of Democrats on judges during a press conference Monday." McConnell said, "Senate Republicans expect that Bush be treated the same way during the last two years of his presidency as each of the last three presidents were treated in the last two years of theirs when the Senate was controlled by the opposition party." McConnell said "that during the last two years of the Reagan, the first Bush, and the Clinton administrations, the Senate confirmed an average of 17 circuit court nominees, adding that conversations with Senate Majority Leader Reid (D-Nev.) have left him optimistic 'that standard will be met.'"

9th Circuit Increases En Banc Reviews. The National Law Journal (2/6, Maclean) reports, "The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals appears bent on reining in potential conflicts between its precedents and those in other circuits before they catch the eye of the U.S. Supreme Court." The Journal continues, "The nation's largest federal appellate court issued 25 orders to rehear appeals by 15-judge en banc panels in 2006, the highest number in decades, with a whopping nine orders in one five-week period between Dec. 21, 2006, and Jan. 23, 2007, according to court records. … The latest spate of nine orders all came in criminal or habeas petitions. … 'This is a noteworthy flurry of activity,' said Arthur Hellman, a professor at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law who has written a book about the circuit and follows it closely. 'One thing it says is the court is being proactive in clarifying its law.'" The Journal adds, "Judge Alex Kozinski, a 9th Circuit judge since 1985 and slated to be chief judge at the end of the year, agreed. 'There seems to be a greater willingness on the part of judges to view the en banc process as a continuing part of our responsibility in shaping circuit law,' he said." The Journal notes, "Circuit rules provide that a majority of the court's 26 active judges may order a full court reconsideration of three-judge panel decisions in a process known as en banc review. Because of the impracticality of all 26 judges sitting for rehearing, the circuit adopted a system of limited en bancs with random selections of 15 judges to rehear cases. … The en banc process is intended to eliminate conflicting panel decisions within the circuit and conflicts with precedents in other circuits. … In three of the nine cases that the court most recently voted to review en banc, the lower court panel had yet to issue a ruling. That generally happens when the three judges find a conflict within the circuit and refer the case to the entire court, according to Kozinski. Under circuit rules, three judges can't resolve the internal split; it must be done by en banc review."

Former Treasury Chief Criticitzes Bush's Insistence On Private Social Security Accounts. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, 2.04M) reports former Treasury Secretary John Snow "said the Bush Administration's first effort to overhaul Social Security failed because the administration was 'intransigent' on private accounts." Snow said the "Administration's insistence that a Social Security fix include private accounts carved out of the program shifted the focus from making the retirement program solvent. It would have been better, he said, to propose private accounts on top of the existing program, as some Democrats suggested."

DOJ_NMG_0128082

"Winners Could Turn Into Losers" Under Bush Healthcare Plan. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, D1, Meckler, 2.04M) reports, "New prescriptions to help the uninsured are proliferating by the day, but some of the proposals would have a big impact on another group -- people who already have health insurance." The Journal assesses several proposals for their effect on consumers, including President Bush's proposal, one by Oregon Sen. John Wyden (D), another by the Health Coverage Coalition for the Uninsured, state proposals, and the Edwards proposal. The Journal reports that under the Bush plan, "[a]mong the winners would be those whose coverage costs less than $15,000 a year -- or about 80% of workers who have job-based insurance, the White House says." However, "winners could turn into losers with time. Even people with policies under the cap could eventually hit the ceiling as health costs rise." The Journal calls the Wyden proposal "the most radical one on the table." The Journal writes, "He would sever the link between employment and insurance altogether and require everyone to buy coverage directly from insurance companies, much like people now buy auto insurance. … Under this plan, people with insurance will have a greater choice of health plans than most get from work today, given that the market is likely to produce more options. But as health costs and insurance premiums rise, families would have to absorb the increase."

Senate Proposal Authorizes Space Intelligence Office. The Washington Times (2/6, Gertz, 88K) reports Congress is "calling for the creation of a new National Space Intelligence Center to better spy on space-based and other threats to U.S. military, intelligence and commercial satellites." A provision "of the Senate intelligence authorization bill for fiscal 2007 would require the Bush administration to set up the new center within the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI). The plan was disclosed in a little-noticed section of committee's report on the bill made public Jan. 24." The report "stated that threats to U.S. satellites are increasing, a fact highlighted by China's recent test of an anti-satellite (ASAT) missile interceptor that destroyed a Chinese weather satellite."

Pelosi Gets Use Of Larger Plane Than Hastert. The Washington Post (2/6, A15, Romano) reports amid "rumblings from conservatives that she is seeking special treatment, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D) will receive use of an Air Force jet larger than the one used by her predecessor, Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, so she can fly nonstop to her home in San Francisco." Since the "Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the speaker, who is next in line for the presidency after the vice president, has been given use of a government plane for security reasons." Yesterday, the House sergeant-at-arms "issued a statement saying that the leadership is awaiting word from the Air Force on the rules for using the plane. It is unclear, for example, who can travel with Pelosi and whether she can return home from a political event on the taxpayer-funded plane."

Evan Thomas Says Reporters' Job Is To "Bash" Bush. The Washington Times (2/6, Harper, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Evan Thomas of Newsweek says it is the job of reporters to 'bash' President Bush. Friday on WETA-TV's 'Inside Washington' program, the topic was 'whether the media's been unfair to President Bush, given his abysmal approval ratings,' Tim Graham reports at www.NewsBusters.org. NPR reporter Nina Totenberg said Bush received a 'free ride' for years, so now the worm has turned and the coverage is fierce." Host Gordon Peterson then "asked for Mr. Thomas' opinion: 'What do you think, Evan? Are the mainstream media bashing the president unfairly?' Mr. Thomas: 'Well, our job is to bash the president; that's what we do almost.' Mr. Peterson: 'But unfairly?' Mr. Thomas: 'Mmmm -- I think when he rebuffed, I think when he just kissed off the Iraq Study Group, the Baker-Hamilton commission, there was a sense then that he was decoupling himself from public opinion and Congress and the mainstream media, going his own way. At that moment, he lost whatever support he had.'"

Parties Seen As Reversing Roles In Senate. Roll Call (2/6, Pierce) reports it "seems that no matter who is in the majority in the Senate, the ruling party bemoans the 'obstructionism' of the minority, while the minority bristles at the majority's efforts to limit the number of amendments and debate time." The "irony of this sudden and wholesale shift in rhetoric" since the 2006 elections "hasn't been completely lost on Senators of both parties, even as they swear they are doing things slightly differently than their predecessors." Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin "defended the new majority, saying, 'I like to think we are taking a more reasonable approach. We want to give them time to amend without allowing them to obstruct.'" Roll Call adds, "Noting that Senate Democrats pulled the same stunt last year on the lobbying and ethics bill, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) defended his party's adoption of the standard minority script." McConnell said, "In fairness to Senate Republicans, to portray an effort to get votes on this bill as something unusual is truly astonishing."

DOJ_NMG_0128083

Roberts Offers Advice To Law Students. The Washington Post (2/6, A15, Barnes, 690K) reports that in remarks to law students and faculty at Northwestern Law School, Chief Justice John Roberts offered "Absolutely free advice on how to make your briefs better-read, your arguments more closely followed, your justices more sympathetic. … First, pretend that you're not always right." Roberts said, "We get hundreds and hundreds of briefs, and they're all the same. Somebody says, 'My client clearly deserves to win, the cases clearly do this, the language clearly reads this,' blah, blah blah. And you pick up the other side and, lo and behold, they think they clearly deserve to win.'" The Post adds, "How about a little recognition that it's a tough job? Roberts asked." After "16 months as a justice, he advised that lawyers try to become more 'attuned' to what judges are asking. 'I would try today to be much more receptive, try to process more effectively, 'Now what does that question tell me about what that judge is thinking?' and respond rapidly rather than trying to stick to my script,' Roberts said."

OTHER NEWS:

Service Sector Continues Expansion. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A2, 2.04M) reports, "The service sector, whose strength fueled the nation's economic growth last year despite a housing slump and higher interest rates, extended its robust performance into 2007." The Institute for Supply Management, "an Arizona-based group of corporate purchasing managers, said its index of nonmanufacturing business activity in the U.S. rose to 59 in January from 56.7 in December. Readings over 50 indicate expansion, and January's surge marked the 46th consecutive month that the service sector, which includes everything from massage therapists to financial planners, has grown." The New York Times/AP (2/6) runs a similar report.

Stocks Finish Mixed. NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 7, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York, stocks finished narrowly mixed. The Dow was up just over 8 points [to close at 12,661.74] on the day. NASDAQ was down more than 5 points [to close at 2,470.60]." The Wall Street Journal (2/6, C1, McKay, 2.04M) notes the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "slipped 0.1%, or 1.40 points, to 1446.99, up 2% on the year." USA Today (2/6, 6B, Krantz, 2.27M) says it was a day of "mixed and unexciting action on Wall Street."

ABA Panel Recommends Diluting Code Of Judicial Conduct. The New York Times (2/6, Liptak, 1.16M) reports a commission of the American Bar Association "has recommended that the group weaken its code of judicial conduct by changing, from a mandatory rule to nonbinding advice, an instruction to judges to 'avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety.'" Supporters of the change "say disciplining judges for violating a concept as vague as 'the appearance of impropriety' is unfair. Opponents denounce any retreat from the longstanding and widely embraced standard, and one critic — Robert H. Tembeckjian, the administrator of the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct — has resigned in protest as an adviser to the A.B.A. commission." The change "is part of what would be the first comprehensive revisions to the association's Model Code of Judicial Conduct since 1990; the revisions now go before the group's House of Delegates, which meets in Miami next week, before they can become formal policy."

Giuliani Files "Statement Of Candidacy" With FEC. The AP (2/6, Sidoti) reports that ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) "suggested Monday that a formal presidential announcement was a matter of when, not if. 'Today we just took another step toward running for president,'" Giuliani "said, hours after filing a so-called 'statement of candidacy' with the Federal Election Commission, which moved him closer to a full-fledged campaign. 'It's a big step, an important one. Quite honestly, we're probably ahead of schedule,' Giuliani told reporters in Long Island while campaigning with a state Senate candidate. 'We still have to think about a formal announcement and how to do it, but this is a pretty strong step.' Later, in an interview on Fox News' 'Hannity & Colmes,' Giuliani was more direct. 'I'm in this to win,' he said. 'My campaign is going to be about the future.' Unlike chief GOP rivals Sen. John McCain and Mitt Romney, Giuliani had thus far been ambiguous about whether he would pursue the Republican nomination, even though he had taken the initial steps." However, "Monday's steps, including eliminating the phrase 'testing the waters,' put Giuliani on the same level legally as McCain and Romney, the other top-tier GOP candidates who have formed regular exploratory committees and filed statements of candidacy."

ABC World News (2/5, story 6, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that "Giuliani took a major step today toward a full-fledged 2008 campaign," filing papers with the FEC "that put his hat very close to the ring." NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 2, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported that Giuliani, "the man who was forced into a new national prominence after 9/11, today filed what is called a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission, not an announcement, but it is this close."

The New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) reports that on FOX News' "Hannity and Colmes," Giuliani "just skirted the line on declaring his candidacy. 'We still have to formally announce it and do a few more things,' he said, but added that yesterday's paperwork 'is about as close as you're going to get.'" Asked if he could defeat New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D), Giuliani "said, 'I'm in this to win.' Then he added, 'You do this because you believe that you can win the nomination of your party, and then you believe that you're the strongest candidate to win the election for your party.'"

DOJ_NMG_0128084

Long Island Newsday (2/6, Gordon, 414K) reports that Giuliani's appearance on "Hannity and Colmes" "was part of a carefully choreographed effort by his campaign to put to rest questions among Republicans about whether he is serious about running. … Three people close to the campaign agreed, with one source saying Giuliani wouldn't have filed the papers if he didn't have every intention of running. 'There will be a time at some point when he makes a formal announcement, but…he's moving in that direction,' said another campaign source, who noted that Giuliani's communications and political staffs started work Monday."

Giuliani Bid Would Face Hurdles In Winning Over Social Conservatives. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (2/6, A1, Balz, Cillizza, 690K) reports that Giuliani "leads the field of declared and prospective Republican presidential candidates in national polls and, with Sen. John McCain of Arizona, ranks either first or second in most of the important early states. But his support for abortion rights and gay rights puts him sharply at odds with the majority of his party, a situation that many GOP strategists think will present a substantial obstacle to his hopes of winning the nomination." The Post notes, "Giuliani's challenge, aides believe, will be to convince Republican primary voters that, despite his disagreements with conservatives, he will not overturn what has been party orthodoxy on many social issues. One way of indicating that has been through his comments about judicial appointments, a topic he returned to last night. 'I think the appointment of judges that I would make would be very similar to, if not exactly the same as, the last two judges that were appointed' to the Supreme Court, he told Hannity."

On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (2/5), Giuliani was asked to respond to criticism that he will not be able to "just explain away the fact that he's consistently taken positions that are completely opposite to the conservative Republican base on issues they hold near and dear." Giuliani said, "I don't think anyone has campaigned much more than I have for Republican candidates, going back to 1998. I mean, I've been in 45 states on behalf of 200 candidates, all Republicans. Sometimes differences on issues here and there, but the same basic philosophy of strong foreign policy, being on offense against terrorism, smaller government, lower taxes. And in my case, those are things that I did."

In a report on the NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 3, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) John Harwood, chief Washington correspondent for CNBC, said, "The question about Giuliani is whether his first day as a candidate will be his best day once primary voters look at his personal life, mayoral record and his stance on social issues. The most important thing that happened today, he began to resolve doubts among Republican voters and donors that he is serious about the race."

In a report on the CBS Evening News (2/5, story 3, 1:20, Couric, 7.66M), anchor Katie Couric discussed a potential Giuliani bid with national political correspondent Gloria Borger. Couric: "Giuliani supports abortion rights, gay rights and gun control. Given the conservative Republican base that comes out during the primary process, does he have a chance?" Borger: "I think that Giuliani candidacy is going to test just how much sway those cultural conservatives will have in the Republican Party. Some of them have already come out and said that Giuliani is completely unacceptable. But I spoke with Giuliani aides today. They tell me that they have answers for conservatives on each of these issues. For example, they're going to tie gun control to crime. They're going to say he was the Mayor of New York city. New York was a mess with a terrible crime problem. He got guns off the street. Therefore, he's a leader."

In a report on the NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 2, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg was quoted as saying of Giuliani, "As the year progresses and he becomes evaluated among conservative primary voters, they are going to have problems with his record." NBC News correspondent Ron Allen added, "He is pro-abortion, pro gun control, pro-gay rights. In recent weeks he supported the troop buildup in Iraq." Giuliani: "The fastest and quickest way to bringing about peace is by remaining on offense and remaining strong and not become weak in a time of pressure." Allen: "And there is also his personal life, two divorces, three marriages, with unflattering details splashed across New York's tabloids. On the other hand, Giuliani supporters will focus on his achievements here. A growing economy, cleaning up the city. Reducing crime. And Giuliani's supporters insist he is the one Republican who can win next November."

The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A4, Cooper, 2.04M) reports that in the 2008 GOP presidential race, "perhaps no candidate faces more trouble in gaining the nomination than Mr. Giuliani, which is ironic, given his early lead in many polls. His long-shot status in the nomination sweepstakes is based on his well-known moderate stances on litmus-test social issues. Such positions, along with his two divorces, won't enamor him to social conservatives." GOP hopefuls "McCain and Romney have had their own run-ins with the conservative wing of the party as well, but none quite as significant as that awaiting Mr. Giuliani. … Indeed, a Giuliani nomination would suggest a sea change has taken place within the Republican Party, where successful nominees traditionally have had to maintain allegiance to certain core social beliefs." Scott Reed, "a Washington Republican who managed Bob Dole's 1996 presidential campaign," said that "Giuliani has the potential to change the race even if he doesn't win the nomination, simply by taking a top share of the media spotlight. Mr. Giuliani 'sucks the air out of the room,' Mr. Reed said, making second-tier candidates compete for notice."

DOJ_NMG_0128085

Giuliani Restates Belief "In A Woman's Right To Choose." On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (2/5), Giuliani was asked about his position on abortion, Giuliani said, "Where I stand on abortion is, I oppose it. I don't like it. I hate it. I think abortion is something that, as a personal matter, I would advise somebody against. However, I believe in a woman's right to choose." But Giuliani added he would appoint judges "very similar to, if not exactly the same as, the last two judges that were appointed. Chief Justice Roberts is somebody I work with, somebody I admire, Justice Alito someone I knew when he was US attorney, also admire."

Morris Suggests Conservatives Appear More Likely To Back Giuliani Than McCain. On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (2/5), Dick Morris said that he recently attended a weekly meeting of conservatives at Grover Norquist's office, "And I said, Show of hands. How many people here think McCain can overcome being against the Bush tax cuts, amnesty for illegal immigrants, McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform, and being in favor of global warming legislation? And three-quarters said he could not overcome that; one-quarter said he could. Then I said, OK, how many people here think Rudy can overcome being pro-choice, pro-gun control, pro-gay rights, pro-immigration? Three- quarters said he could overcome it. So I met with Norquist, who's sort of the leading tax reform person in the country, and I said, 'What, have you guys got religion or something?' And he said, 'No, we understand that we have to beat Hillary.'"

More House Republicans Set To Announce Support for Romney. Roll Call (2/6, Whittington) reports, "House Republicans supporting former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) will hold a Capitol Hill press event today to unveil new additions to their team -- additions that move him ahead of Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) in public Congressional endorsements as the battle for Member support continues at a torrid pace between two of the leading GOP presidential hopefuls." McCain "named his six-person House whip team last week and also announced the support of three Cuban-American Members. Members of Romney's team will appear at an afternoon news conference at the Republican National Committee. About half of Romney's Capitol Hill supporters previously have been announced. Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.), who is Romney's liaison in the House chamber, said the Republicans now on board constitute the former governor's initial whip team. 'We'll be utilizing these 22 Members to bolster support for Romney here on Capitol Hill,' he said. Among the endorsements to be announced today are those of Reps. Rodney Alexander (La.), John Linder (Ga.), Ralph Regula (Ohio), Bill Shuster (Pa.) and Mike Simpson (Idaho)."

Obama, Clinton Could Be No-Shows At Early Debates. Roger Simon writes in The Politico (2/6, Simon), "What if the media-political complex announced a presidential debate…and then the major candidates said: 'Stick it in your ear. We're not coming.' That could happen this year for one good reason: Major candidates are complaining that too many states are planning too many debates too early. Nevada has two forums and three debates scheduled already. … Other states have already announced their own Democratic and Republican debates, but there are two developments that might alter things considerably. First, the Democratic National Committee is soon going to call the campaigns together to try to limit the debates. But that may not work. … More importantly, however, Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton may just say no. They might do the unthinkable and just refuse to show up." Simon, asserting that for "the top tier" presidential candidates, "early debates are a negative, an ordeal, a chance for the rest of the pack to nip them in their rear ends," notes that neither Clinton nor Obama "has accepted any debate or forum invitations as of yet. 'The two people who can blow up the debates are those two,' an adviser to the Obama campaign told me. 'All they have to do is say: 'Debate without me. Go ahead.'" Simon adds that "Obama and Hillary have the perfect excuse for not showing up: They have day jobs."

Eyeing White House, Obama Says He's Trying To Kick His Cigarette Habit. The Chicago Tribune (2/6, Parsons, Brachear, 617K) reports, "After struggling to quit smoking in the past, Sen. Barack Obama is trying a cessation aid not available over the counter: public attention." Obama "resolved to quit his cigarette habit over the winter holidays, just weeks before his expected presidential campaign would make photographers and reporters an even more regular part of his life. He said in a Monday interview that, although he has never been a heavy smoker, he has quit for periods over the last several years but then slipped back into the habit. On the cusp of a potential presidential bid seemed the right time to quit for good, he said. 'I've never been a heavy smoker,' Obama said. 'I've quit periodically over the last several years. I've got an ironclad demand from my wife that in the stresses of the campaign I don't succumb. I've been chewing Nicorette strenuously.' The incentive to quit is great for any office seeker, as increasingly negative attitudes about smoking translate into political pressure not to do it -- or at least not to be caught doing it publicly. At a time when most willing public figures also are expected to serve as role models, those with unhealthy habits face intense pressure to leave them behind."

DOJ_NMG_0128086

Edwards Outlines Healthcare Plan, Says Tax Hike Will Be Needed To Fund Proposal. The AP (2/6, Pickler) reports that Democratic presidential hopeful John Edwards "is embracing a position that has been political suicide in the past -- admitting he would raise taxes." Edwards "is betting that voters will back the idea in exchange for the promise of quality health coverage for all, part of the first major domestic policy initiative from a Democratic White House hopeful. The tax increase would pay for the plan's cost of up to $120 billion a year. Edwards' proposal would require that every business provide health care coverage for employees or help them pay for it and every American has insurance. … The plan would free up money for health care coverage by abolishing President Bush's tax cuts for people who make more than $200,000 a year and by having the government collect more back taxes, Edwards said." Noting Edwards' "plan aims to have universal coverage by 2012," the AP adds that Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) "also has said that is his goal, but" he's "yet to provide more specifics about how he would get there. New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton also has said she will have a universal plan."

The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A4, Lueck, 2.04M) reports, "It remains to be seen whether voters will accept Mr. Edwards's vision of 'shared responsibility,' in which employers would have to help fund their workers' coverage and individuals would be required to purchase insurance, often with the help of new tax credits aimed at low-income and middle-class people. Medicaid and the State Children's Health Insurance Program, or SCHIP, would be expanded to cover more children and low-income parents. New regional 'health markets' would offer comprehensive health-insurance plans to anyone who doesn't get insurance through their jobs or a government program. … Patrick Toomey, president of the Republican antitax group Club for Growth, said Mr. Edwards's plan wouldn't sit well with most voters, who, he said, 'already think taxes are too high.' The idea is 'very good news for the Republican candidate, whoever that may be.'"

Edwards was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (2/5, Blitzer) "if it was a "smart move" to say he would be "raising taxes if you're elected president" to pay for his health care plans. Edwards said, "No one can propose universal health care and say they can pay for it without doing anything to the tax structure. That is not the truth. And I think the American people deserve and are entitled to the truth, that I suspect the will be other Democratic candidates as we go forward who will follow the lead that I've put out there today and will come forward with their own universal health care plan. And if they contend that they can pay for it leaving the tax cuts and the tax structure exactly as it is, I don't believe that's true."

The New York Times (2/6, Broder, 1.16M) reports that Edwards' "plan would be partly financed by eliminating tax cuts for households earning more than $200,000 a year, cuts that Congress approved in the Bush administration. Mr. Edwards said he would also offset the program's cost by using the estimated $15 billion in capital gains taxes that go uncollected each year by requiring brokerage houses to report capital gains from taxpayers' stock sales to the Internal Revenue Service, just as interest and dividend income is reported now." Edwards' "plan would provide tax credits or subsidies to low-income families who cannot afford health insurance, expand Medicare and the federal program of health care for children, and create a federal health insurance agency that could become the basis for a single-payer system that would eventually do away with private health insurance." The Times adds, "One provision of the Edwards proposal certain to draw fire is a requirement that companies provide health insurance for all workers or pay 6 percent of their payrolls into a government fund to buy insurance for them. This type of 'play or pay' program was an element of former President Bill Clinton's failed 1994 health care plan that was shaped in large part by Mrs. Clinton."

The Washington Post (2/6, A3, Balz, 690K) reports that Edwards said his "plan bears some resemblance to the new health-care program enacted in Massachusetts, but he said it would require employers that do not provide health insurance to pay a greater share of their revenue into a government fund to help individuals buy insurance. He called the plan less complicated than that proposed by Bill Clinton and Hillary Rodham Clinton when they were in the White House."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Finnegan, 850K) reports, "Edwards' explicit call for a tax increase to broaden access to healthcare could carry wide appeal among Democratic primary voters. But if he wins the nomination, it risks exposing him to Republican attacks in a general election race, just as Walter Mondale, President Reagan's Democratic challenger in 1984, was pilloried for proposing higher taxes." Edwards, in an interview, "said he did not expect his plan to draw any storm of opposition, as the Clinton White House did with its failed effort, led by Hillary Clinton, to overhaul health coverage in the 1990s. 'I think it's appealing across the ideological and political spectrum,' he said."

Edwards Won't Accept Public Funds For Presidential Bid. USA Today (2/6, Lawrence, Schouten, 2.27M) reports that former Sen. Edwards "on Monday joined New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in saying he will not use public money for the presidential primary campaign or, if he wins his party's nomination, for the general election." His move "is the latest sign of trouble for the public campaign funding system." In an interview yesterday, Edwards said "that he expects major candidates in both parties to raise unlimited private dollars rather than participate in the public system. He said he needs to do the same 'to have the funds to be competitive.'" Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) "is not disclosing his financial plans until after a formal announcement Saturday in Springfield, Ill." On the GOP "side, an aide to former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney said Monday that Romney will not take public money in the primaries. 'Our focus right now is on securing the nomination. Decisions on the general election haven't been made yet,' Kevin Madden said in an e-mail. Two other top GOP prospects, Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, have not said yet whether they will use public money at any stage of the race."

DOJ_NMG_0128087

Edwards, Richardson Wow Democrats At Winter Meeting. In his Washington Post column (2/6, A17), David Broder says, "The good news for the nation's Democrats is that neither of the supposed front-runners for the party's 2008 presidential nomination, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama, stole the show when all 10 of the likely contenders spoke last weekend to the Democratic National Committee." Clinton and Obama "got good receptions from the crowd at the Washington Hilton, having filled many of the spectator seats with their young supporters. But they didn't blow away the field." The "stars of the weekend, judging from reactions in the ballroom and the lobby, were not Obama and Clinton but former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico." Both "played to the antiwar sentiments of this liberal-leaning audience by demanding that those now in Congress do more than pass resolutions decrying President Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq." Their view, "which was echoed by former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, left Obama, Clinton and Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware -- who have to deal with the realities of a 51-49 Senate where nothing can pass without significant Republican support -- in the uncomfortable position of seeming to be less fervent about the war. Only Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut and Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, among those with votes to cast, joined the call for early withdrawal." One of the "losers in the weekend oratorical marathon was retired Gen. Wesley Clark, who repeatedly invoked the West Point motto of 'Duty, Honor, Country,' forgetting that few in this particular audience have much experience with, or sympathy for, the military."

Biden's "Backpedaling" Examined. In a New York Times guest column (2/6), Stacy Schiff says, "Football season is over, but there is no cause for despair. We are smack in the middle of an all-star backpedaling tournament. Last week Joe Biden announced his candidacy with that loaded line about Barack Obama, 'the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy.' Forget what Mr. Biden really meant to say. Think instead about where he went next, which was where Michael Richards and Mel Gibson had gone before him. Not only did Mr. Obama understand what he meant, insisted Mr. Biden, but 'I have no doubt that Jesse Jackson and every other black leader — Al Sharpton and the rest — will know exactly what I meant.' Indeed they did. The day ended with Mr. Sharpton assuring Mr. Biden that he bathed regularly. Rehabilitation came that evening on Jon Stewart; this is why television was invented."

Labor Groups Hopeful For Measure To Ease Union Membership. The Washington Times (2/6, Lengell, 88K) reports labor groups "are hoping that the new Democratic majority in Congress will push through a measure that would make it easier for workers to join unions." The bill, "scheduled to be introduced today by Rep. George Miller, California Democrat, is prompting labor activists and union foes to square off in an intense and high-profile lobbying campaign." The Employee Free Choice Act "would allow workers to unionize by simply signing a card or petition stating their interest in joining the union, as opposed to the decades-old practice of secret-ballot elections. If a majority of employees sign, the employer would be required by law to recognize and bargain with the workers' union." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "will introduce the Senate version of the act later this year, his office said yesterday." Labor activists "say the bill is crucial for helping defend them from anti-union companies and lawmakers, which they blame in part for decades of decline. Overall union membership was 12 percent nationally last year -- down from 12.5 percent in 2005."

Texas Plan For HPV Vaccination For School Girls Generates Controversy. NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 10, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Now to a story that continues to generate talk in Texas. The Governor's executive order that all girls entering sixth grade must receive a new vaccine to protect them against cervical cancer. Today one of the allies spoke for many outraged citizens who want the Governor to rescind this unusual order." NBC (Teague) added, "The state of Texas will soon require girls entering the sixth grade to be immunized against HPV, a sexually transmitted virus that causes cervical cancer." In "mandating the vaccine which families can opt out of, he bypassed the state legislature and sidestepped public hearings." But "opponents insist the vaccine will encourage promiscuity. Some question Perry's ties to Merck, which makes the vaccine. Merck donated to Perry's re-election campaign and stands to make billions in the vaccine is mandated nationwide. But while many parents here in Texas are angered give the Governor's decision, some experts say the HPV vaccine should be mandatory in every state."

NYTimes Praises Texas For Requiring HPV Vaccination. The New York Times (2/6, 1.16M) praises the Texas decision, saying, "Congratulations to Texas for becoming the first state to require vaccinating young schoolgirls — ages 11 and 12 — against a sexually transmitted virus that causes cervical cancer and genital warts. Other states would be wise to follow the same path." There is "no doubt that Merck's vaccine against the human papillomavirus, given in three shots over eight months, is highly effective." Many parents "are appalled at the notion of vaccinating such young girls against a sexually transmitted disease. But the medical reality is that the vaccine will generally not work after a woman has been infected, so it is best for girls to be vaccinated well before they become sexually active."

DOJ_NMG_0128088

Studies Showing Wealth Concentration Critiqued. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (2/6, A17), Alan Reynolds of the Cato Institute and David Henderson of the Hoover Institution say, "Is the share of income of the top 1% in the United States high and rising? Those who say it is usually base their belief on statistics from one of two sources. One, a paper by Thomas Piketty and Emmanuel Saez, was discussed by Alan Reynolds in the Journal on Dec. 14, 2006. The other source is the Congressional Budget Office (CBO). It, too, is wrong." But at the IRS Statistics of Income (SOI) division, Barry Johnson and Brian Raub "examined 28,000 estate tax returns to calculate wealth shares. 'In 2001,' they noted, '1.0% of the U.S. adult population [2.1 million people] . . . owned approximately 22.3% of total U.S. individual wealth, a 1.0% decrease since 1998 but virtually identical to the shares of wealth held in 1995 and 1992.'"

Mecca Talks Seen As "Last Chance" To Avoid Palestinian Civil War. The AP (2/6, Daraghmeh) reports, "For the rival Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah, a reconciliation meeting this week in Saudi Arabia may be a last chance to avoid civil war. If Saudi prestige, money and discussions" in Mecca today "don't produce a power-sharing agreement, it's unlikely anything will, analysts said." In recent months, Egypt, Syria and Qatar have "tried in vain" to end the power struggle between the two groups. The clashes, writes the AP, have "deepened resentment and suspicion between the sides, making agreement on a coalition government seem more elusive than ever. But the fighting also served as a reminder that neither side can win by force without causing massive destruction, and that failure in Mecca could be followed by an even deadlier round of violence." At the same time, the "gaps" between the two sides "are small," with the "underlying" problem appearing to be "deep mistrust and an unwillingness to share power." However, both sides "might have a hard time saying no to the Saudis, particularly in a venue heavy with religious symbolism."

Saudi Arabia Takes On Central Role As Regional Violence Looms. On its front page, the New York Times (2/6, A1, Slackman, Fattah, 1.16M) reports, "With the prospect of three civil wars looming over the Middle East -- and Iran poised to gain from them all -- Saudi Arabia has abandoned its behind-the-scenes checkbook diplomacy and taken on a central, aggressive role in reshaping the region's conflicts." In recent months, the kingdom has increased its involvement in the Palestinian talks, in Iraq and its support of the Sunni-led government in Lebanon. The process is "shaping up as a counteroffensive to efforts by Iran to establish itself as the regional superpower, according to diplomats, analysts and officials here and throughout the region." Some even say that the "recent Saudi commitment to temper the price of oil is aimed at undermining Iran's economy, although officials here deny that." The Times notes that the "shift is occurring with encouragement from the Bush administration," yet Riyadh's goals "may not always be in alignment with those of the White House, and could complicate American interests." Nonetheless, both Washington and Riyadh believe that "one important way to block Iran and calm the many fires in the region is to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict -- or at least appear to be trying to."

In a similar report, the AP (2/6, Faramarzi, Abu-Nasr) writes, "Relations between Iran and Saudi Arabia are bumpy at the best of times, but violence between Shiites and Sunnis in Lebanon and Iraq is prompting the two Mideast heavyweights to engage in new talks seeking to head off a regional crisis." The "clearest sign of the new diplomacy" has been in Lebanon, where "a joint Saudi-Iranian effort defused a general strike called by the pro-Iranian Shiite militant group Hezbollah after the country erupted into violence two weeks ago." The two sides have also engaged in a series of recent high-profile meetings involving former Ambassador in Washington, Prince Bandar, and Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani. One Saudi official told the AP last week that Iran "asked the kingdom to get Washington to tone down its verbal attacks on Iran."

Qatar Seeks Greater Regional Role. The Christian Science Monitor (2/6, Harman, 59K) reports, "Until 1995, Qatar did not have a distinguishable foreign policy to speak of, and instead took cues from Saudi Arabia and stayed on the sidelines of world affairs. But ever since reformist Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani deposed his father in 1995, Qatar has been charting an increasingly distinctive path." US Ambassador to Qatar, Chase Untermeyer, told the Monitor, "Qatar is a player now." Qatar "seems to be involved in everything lately," from funding Al Jazeera to being the "only Gulf country to maintain any sort of official relations" with Israel. It has also become involved in the Israeli-Palestinian crisis, providing funds to Hamas while remaining "closely allied with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas's Fatah Party."

DOJ_NMG_0128089

US Officials Says Pyongyang Prepared To Negotiate. The AP (2/6, Tabuchi) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill Monday said Pyongyang "must get out of the nuclear business if it wants energy or economic aid," adding he believed the North "was prepared to negotiate at the coming arms talks in Beijing." However, he "refused to speak on news reports that Pyongyang is prepared to freeze a key reactor and accept inspectors in exchange for 500,000 tons of heavy oil and other conditions." Hill was in Tokyo meeting with Japanese officials before leaving for Beijing on Wednesday. For its part, Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Tokyo would "not consider giving North Korea energy aid unless the communist also came clean on its past abduction of Japanese nationals."

The Washington Times (2/6, Sands, 88K) also reports on Hill's comments.

Pyongyang Seeks To Improve Clinton-Era Deal. The Washington Post (2/6, A12, Kessler, 690K) reports Pyongyang North Korea "has set tough terms for a freeze of one of its nuclear facilities, demanding that the United States exceed commitments made under a Clinton-era deal that the Bush administration previously derided as inadequate." According to the Post, North Korea's top nuclear negotiator, Kim Gye Gwan, "and other officials outlined Pyongyang's position in meetings last week with two American nuclear experts, saying they would be presented when six-nation disarmament talks resume in Beijing on Thursday." In exchange for "a freeze of the Yongbyon facility and a return of international inspectors," Pyongyang wants "a substantial supply of heavy fuel oil, an end to a Treasury Department action that froze North Korean accounts at a Macau bank, an international commitment to build civilian nuclear reactors in North Korea and, most important, normalization of relations with Washington."

US Embassy Warns Of Terrorist Threat In Sudan. The AP (2/6, De Montesquiou) reports the US Embassy in Khartoum warned Americans Monday "of a heightened terrorist threat against Westerners in Sudan." In a message, the US Embassy said it has received "new information that an extremist group based in the country is likely to target Western interests." The US message followed "a similar warning that the United Nations sent its staff in Sudan last week," said a UN official.

US, Malaysia Resume Trade Talks. The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/6) reports the US and Malaysia Monday began "a fresh round of free-trade talks, bogged down by differences over opening two tightly protected sectors, and a controversy over a major gas deal with Iran." The latest round is "crucial to determine if negotiators can bridge differences and conclude the pact before a July 1 deadline," officials said. Deputy US Trade Representative Karan Bhatia "warned last week that the proposed pact may falter if negotiators fail to make firm progress this week over opening up Malaysia's services and government contracts -- two top hurdles to a deal."

Indonesia Withholding Bird Flu Data. The Financial Times (2/6, Aglionby, Jack) reports Indonesia, the country worst hit by the deadly H5N1 bird flu virus, "has stopped sharing human genetic samples of the highly pathogenic illness with foreign laboratories, raising fears it could slow international efforts to prepare for a pandemic." Officials say Indonesia stopped providing samples internationally last month, "hindering efforts to confirm whether the virus killing its citizens is H5N1 and limiting production of vaccines to help prevent its spread." Dr Triono Soendoro, director-general of Indonesia's National Institute of Health Research and Development, said the step to withhold samples was taken "because the government wanted to keep control of the intellectual property rights of the deadly strain of the virus."

India Walks "Tightrope" In Washington Talks. The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Chu, 850K) reports, "Amid mounting tension between Washington and Tehran, Indian and Iranian officials plan to meet today for their second round of high-level talks in less than three months, signaling the eagerness of the two countries to patch up differences that recently have clouded their historically close ties." Despite American "misgivings" over the relationship, Indian Foreign Minister Pranab Mukherjee is expected to land in Tehran for discussions on Iran's nuclear program and on boosting cooperation over energy issues. As India's economy continues to boom, the Indian government is "increasingly preoccupied with securing reliable sources of energy," including access to Iran's natural gas reserves. But its relations with Tehran have put New Delhi "in a delicate position" with the US.

US Firms Push For End To Cuban Embargo. The Hill (2/6, Swanson) reports congressional supporters of "easing restrictions on travel and agricultural trade to Cuba say business supporters need to offer stronger backing for several measures introduced this year if they are to become law." With Democrats in control of the House, Reps. Jeff Flake (R-AZ) and Sam Farr (D-CA.) said Cuba legislation has "a great chance of moving this year," but Farr emphasized that the business community "must become more engaged." At a rally for USA Engage, an anti-embargo group, Flake "said business and farm groups should talk to more members about how lifting trade and travel restrictions will help the US and Cuba," an idea once considered "a lost cause given the Bush administration's active efforts to tighten Cuba trade and travel bans."

DOJ_NMG_0128090

Former Ambassador Urges "Opening Doors" To Cuba. Ambassador Vicki Huddleston, former director of the State Department's Office of Cuban Affairs, writes in the Washington Times (2/6, 88K) that "very little change will take place in Cuba as long as the Cuban people are isolated from their loved ones and from the ideas and influences of the outside world." To "start the ball rolling," she says President Bush "should reinstitute the 'People-to-People' program and the annual Cuban American family visits that were in place during the first two years of his administration." However, the ambassador insists that "more needs to be done, it isn't all up to Mr. Bush. Congress will have to act if the president is to have the flexibility he needs in the coming months and years to respond to the challenges and opportunities Fidel Castro's death and Raul Castro's succession will bring."

US Urges Nicaragua To Destroy Missiles. The AP (2/6, Aleman) reports Washington "insisted Monday that Nicaragua destroy hundreds of Soviet-made surface-to-air missiles after President Daniel Ortega said the weapons were needed for the country's defense." Ortega said Friday it would be "absurd" to destroy Nicaragua's SAM-7 missiles "while neighboring Honduras is adding US planes to its military fleet." In response, the US Embassy said in a statement released Monday that Honduras is buying eight small planes from the US to be used "in the fight against drug trafficking and not offensive military aircraft," while stressing that the US government "expects that Nicaragua will continue its already established path of disarmament and destruction of all SAM-7 missiles."

Ban Faces Criticism Over Appointments, Slow Pace. The New York Times (2/6, A9, Hoge, 1.16M) reports new U.N. chief Ban Ki-moon "returned to his headquarters on Monday after a two-week working trip to Africa and Europe and ran into dissension over restructuring changes he has proposed and concern at the slow pace of his appointing top officials since taking office on Jan. 1." At issue are Ban's "proposals to divide peacekeeping, the fastest growing activity at the United Nations, into two departments, and to reshape the disarmament department in a way that many envoys believe downgrades it." While the changes "would strike a layman as bureaucratic nuance," the Times says at the United Nations," they fuel a continuing competition between the great powers….and the General Assembly, where the developing world feels its authority is threatened when its elaborate deliberative procedures are not respected."

The Los Angeles Times (2/6, Farley, 850K) adds, Ban "faced one of his first tests Monday when developing nations sent him back to the drawing board with his plan to restructure the U.N.'s peacekeeping department." The "setback could foretell troubles for the new secretary-general," who faces the task of reforming the U.N. at a time when its peacekeeping demands are growing in nations such as Sudan and perhaps Somalia.

China Cracks Down On Corruption In Shanghai. The Wall Street Journal (2/6, A1, Areddy, 2.04M) reports on its front page that "underneath the boom and glitter" in Shanghai, Communist Party leaders in Beijing "say, lay a secret: massive corruption." Last fall, the party fired Chen Liangyu, who "not only ran the city but sat in China's ruling Politburo," alleging "mismanagement and theft at a city pension fund, influence peddling and other misdeeds." The fall of Mr. Chen was China's "biggest political shakeup in a generation. But more than the ouster of one official, it amounted to an indictment of the business model known as Shanghai Inc." The crackdown, the Journal writes, is also "a reminder that China's system leaves great power in the hands of local Communist leaders, whose decisions can ripple unchecked through the economy. Now that the party has stepped in to take its Shanghai leader out of action, approval for the flashy big development projects for which Shanghai is famed has slowed to a crawl."

Expert Says Chinese Reform Must Come From "Below." Ross Terrill, an author and research associate at Harvard's Fairbank Center, writes in a Wall Street Journal (2/6, A17, 2.04M) op-ed, "As President Hu Jintao tries to transcend communism forward to 'market Leninism,' Mao [Zedong], now dead for 30 years, transcends communism backward to Chinese folk history." However, "Today, young pro-market Chinese who devour Hayek's 'Road to Serfdom' and books on American business are embracing an anti-state Chinese tradition (best known in the West through Taoism). They would like -- but will not get -- a China without politics. A new public philosophy, when it comes, as it must, will come from gestation below, not as a diktat from a father-figure or a paternalistic Communist Party."

Russia Brings New Charges Against Khodorkovsky. The New York Times (2/6, Chivers, 1.16M) reports, "Russian prosecutors brought new charges Monday against the imprisoned founder of the Yukos oil company and one of his business partners, opening a new line of legal attack against a Kremlin opponent. The former executive, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, and his partner, Platon A. Lebedev, were charged with embezzlement and money laundering." The two men's "lawyers said they had potentially qualified for parole late this year, when they would have served half of their sentences. The new charges, which accused the men of embezzling about $20 billion in Yukos revenues, appeared to destroy that possibility and opened a new chapter in the long saga of Yukos's legal troubles." The lawyers said the charges "were a means to keep Mr. Khodorkovsky and Mr. Lebedev in prison beyond Russia's presidential election in early 2008 and throughout the remainder of the liquidation of Yukos."

DOJ_NMG_0128091

Charges Likely To Tighten Moscow's Grip On Energy Industry. In an analysis, the New York Times (2/6, Kramer, 1.16M) says the new charges "are likely to ease what remains of [Yukos] into state hands, strengthening the Kremlin's control over the industry, analysts and company officials said. In this sense, the Yukos affair is ending as it began — in an opaque mixture of criminal prosecution and Russian energy nationalism, where it is far from clear where one ends and the other begins." The Times adds, "State-owned companies already control a third of the oil production in Russia, one of the world's largest producing nations. Now, both of Russia's large state energy companies are expressing interest in buying Yukos oil fields and refineries, assets that critics say were expropriated by the government but that could look more like the spinoff from a corporate tax and accounting scandal if the new charges stick, as expected."

LATimes Welcomes Mexico's Lifting Of Avocado Tariff. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/6, 850K) says "free trade has never tasted so good" as it did February 1st when Mexico lifted its barrier on avocadoes. Mexican President Felipe Calderon, it notes, decided that Mexico "would rather send its avocados to the US than send its avocado farmers. So it's good news for everyone."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Intrepid Armchair Explorers."
"High stakes for young test takers."
"Bottom Line For Bush's '08 Budget: Contention."
"GOP Bats Down Resolution Debate."
"A Union Boss With Some A-list Clout."
"Astronaut Arrested In Kidnap Attempt."

USA Today:
"Evacuee Camp Kids Worry Schools Chief."
"U.S. Advisers Find Joint Patrols With Iraqis Don't Go As Planned."
"Vote On Iraq Is Blocked By GOP."
"Wal-Mart To Launch Video Downloads."

New York Times:
"G.O.P. Senators Block Debate On Iraq Policy."
"Bush Releases Budget Aimed To Erase Deficit."
"S.E.C. Is Looking At Stock Trading."
"In Public View, Saudis Counter Iran In Region."
"A New Problem For Farmers: Few Veterinarians."
"Immigrant Entrepreneurs Shape A New Economy."
"Drawing Lines Across The Sand, Between Classes."

Washington Post:
"GOP Stalls Debate On Troop Increase."
"'It Was Just Shockingly Cold'."
"Bush Plan Reins In Domestic Spending."
"Overachieving Students Told to Lighten Up."
"U.S. Unit Walks 'A Fine Line' In Iraqi Capital."
"Giuliani Announces He's In '08 Presidential Race."

Washington Times:
"Bush Submits 'Staggering' $2.8 Trillion Budget."
"Senate GOP Blocks Iraq Resolution."
"House Bill Eases Union Sign-Ups."
"Anti-Violence Push Begins In Baghdad."
"National Driver's License Hits A Bump."
"Baseball A Hit In Ghana."

Detroit Free Press:
"Jefferson Plant Due For Huge Face-Lift."
"Family Stands By Mom Charged In Deaths'To The Deep Ends Of Hell'."
"Kids get Another Day Off For Cold."
"Bush's Budget Offers More For Plug-In Autos Research."
"Michiganders Favors Cuts Over Taxes."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Tech Puts Touch On Fans."
Dalai lama named As Emory Professor."
"Senate Vote On troops Buildup Blocked."
"Turner Pomes Up $2 Million To Ease Boston's Panic Pain."

Houston Chronicle:
"Vaccine Uproar Perry Not Budging."
"Astronaunt Arrested In Romantic Feud."
"A Small Texas Town Buries One Of Its Own."
"Houston Could Benefit Under Budget Proposal."
"Man Won't Face New Trial In Assault."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Winter Weather-Chicago; Bush Budget; Senate Filibuster; President Assad Interview; Abortion Debate; Giuliani Presidential Bid; Teen Suicide Rate; Super Bowl Aftermath.
CBS: Winter Weather; FL Tornadoes; Giuliani-'08; Senate-Iraq Resolution; Iraq WMD Claims; Kalamazoo Scholarship Program; Ambush Porn; Unhealthy Models.
NBC: Winter Weather-Chicago; Giuliani Presidential Bid; Giuliani Presidential Run-Analysis; Bush Budget; Securing Baghdad; Securing Baghdad; Turner Pays Compensation; Stock Market; Rebuilding The Gulf Coast; Missouri Kidnapping Case; HPV Vaccine-Texas Debate; FL-Tornados-Warning.

DOJ_NMG_0128092

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Senate-Iraq Resolution Debate Blocked; US-Cold Weather; FL-NASA Astronaut Arrested; New Orleans Residents Requesting Katrina Investigation; Jakarta-Flooding; Giuliani Files Statement Of Candidacy; Parade For Super Bowl Champs.

CBS: FL-NASA Astronaut Arrested; Senate-Iraq Resolution Debate Blocked; WA-Lt. Ehren Watada's Military Trial For Refusing To Fight In Iraq; US-Cold Weather; Heating Oil, Crude Oil And Gasoline Prices Up; Giuliani Files Statement Of Candidacy; Research Shows Elderly Can Suffer Physiological Damage From Isolation.

NPR: US-Cold Weather; Senate-Iraq Resolution Debate Blocked; President Bush's Budget-State And Local Law Enforcement; Giuliani Files Statement Of Candidacy; Jakarta-Flooding; UN-Problems In Central African Republic; Tokyo Stock Exchange.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Makes remarks on fiscal responsibility, Micron Technology, Manassas.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 defense budget and the FY07 war supplemental request. Defense Secretary Gates, Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on ``Preserving Prosecutorial Independence: Is the Department of Justice Politicizing the Hiring and Firing of U.S. Attorneys?" Paul J. McNulty, deputy attorney general; Mary Jo White, partner, Debevoise and Plimpton, New York; Laurie L. Levenson, Loyola Law School, Los Angeles; Stuart M. Gerson, partner, Epstein Becker and Green. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the costs of the Iraq war. Steven Kosiak, Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments; Gordon Adams, Wilson International Center for Scholars; Michael Gilmore, CBO. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

10 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing on recent EPA actions. Location: Room 406, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on stabilization, reconstruction and counter-terrorism strategy for Somalia. Jendayi Frazer, assistant secretary of State for African affairs; Michael Hess, USAID; David Shinn, George Washington University; Ken Menkhaus, Davidson College, Davidson, N.C . Location: Room 628, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearing on judicial nominations. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committgee. Closed. Hearing on Iran. Location: Room 219, Hart.

2:45 p.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget. Treasury Secretary Paulson. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10:30 a.m. Meets for morning hour and at noon for legislative business.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Homeland Security Subcommittee. Hearing on management challenges in the DHS. Location: Room 2362A, Rayburn.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget. OMB Director Rob Portman. Location: Room 210, Cannon.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 HHS budget. Secretary Leavitt. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on Gulf Coast rebuilding housing needs and the federal response. Deputy HUD Secretary Roy A. Bernardi; David Garratt, Acting Director of Recovery, FEMA; Walter Leger, Chairman, Housing and Redevelopment Task Force, Louisiana Recovery Authority; Gray Swoope, Executive Director, Mississippi Development Authority; Sheila Crowley, President, National Low Income Housing Coalition; Kirk H. Tate, Chief Executive Office, Orion Real Estate Services; Ghebre Selassie Mehreteab, Co-Chairman & CEO, NHP Foundation; James H. Perry, Executive Director, Greater New Orleans Fair Housing Action Center; Edgar Bright, III, President, Standard Mortgage Corporation (New Orleans); James A. Richardson, Louisiana State University; Doris Koo, President & CEO, Enterprise Community Partners; Derrick Johnson, President, Mississippi State Conference NAACP; Mr. James R. Kelly, Chief Executive Officer, Catholic Charities Archdiocese of New Orleans; Margery Austin Turner, Urban Institute; Judith A. Browne, Co-Director, Advancement Project; Martha J. Kegel, UNITY of Greater New Orleans; Rep. William J. Jefferson, D-La. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Transportation Security and Infrastructure Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on federal rail and public transportation security efforts. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on wasate, fraud and abuse dealing with Iraqi reconstruction. L. Paul Bremer, former head, Coalition Provisional Authority; Stuart W. Bowen Jr., special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction; Timothy Carney, coordinator, Economic Transition in Iraq, State

DOJ_NMG_0128093

Department; David Oliver, former adviser, Iraq Ministry of Finance and former director, Management and Budget, Coalition Provisional Authority. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASATRUCTURE _ Economic Development, Public Buildings and Emergency Management Subcommittee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

10 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget. Treasury Secretary Paulson. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

Other:

INDEPENDENT COLLEGES _ The National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities holds its 2007 meeting, ``Charting Our Course." Highlights: 9 a.m. Rep. Louie Gohmert, R-Texas. 9:45 a.m. Historian and author Michael Beschloss speaks on ``Great Presidents, Past and Present." Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW.

COAL TECHNOLOGY _ The Education Electric Institute, Electric Power Research Institute and the Coal Utilization Council hold a conference, ``The Power of Technology: Ensuring the Global Future of Coal." Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Keynote address: Rep. Rich Boucher. 12 p.m. Luncheon address - Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW.

FEDERAL BUDGET BRIEFINGS _ Highlights: 1 p.m. The DOE's National Nuclear Security Administration holds a media roundtable to discuss its FY08 budget request. 1000 Independence Ave. SW. Contact: 202-586-7371. Media must RSVP. Credentialed media only. 3 p.m. GSA Administrator Lurita Doan holds a telephone briefing on the FY08 budget for the General Services Administration. Call Deborah Ruiz, 202-208-0861 no later than 5 p.m. Monday for phone number and passcode.

FEDERAL BUDGET-RELATED EVENTS _ Highlights: 9:30 a.m. Assistant Secretary for Energy Efficiency & Renewable Energy Andy Karsner participates in a teleconference on the FC'08 budget request. Dial-in : (888) 529-1867. Conference ID : 8481873. 1 p.m. Acting Under Secretary for the National Nuclear Security Administration Tom DAgostino holds a teleconference to react to the FY'08 budget request.Call 202-586-7371 for more information. 4:15 p.m. Assistant Secretary for Nuclear Energy Dennis Spurgeon holds a teleconference to recat to the FY'08 budget request. Dial-in 888- 529-1867. Conference ID : 8482683.

SHOW BUSINESS _ The Motion Picture Association of America holds a symposium, The Business of Show Business. Highlights: 8 a.m. Video Address: California Govenor Arnold Schwarzenegger. Welcome: Dan Glickman, Chairman and CEO, MPAA. Remarks: Representative Charlie Rangel, Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means. Keynote: Actor Will Smith. Presentation: Why I Am a Filmmaker, Rob Meyer, Sayeeda Clarke, Alrick Brown, Graduate Film Division, Kanbar Institute of Film & Television, Tisch School of the Arts, New York University. 9:30 a.m. - 10:45 a.m. Panel 1: The Art and Economics of Show Business and Intellectual Property: How a Movie Gets Made. Participants include: Opening Remarks: Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif.; by Ron Grover, Los Angeles bureau chief, Business Week, others. 12:30 p.m. - 2 p.m. Directors' luncheon. Welcome: Dan Glickman, Chairman and CEO, MPAA. Opening Address: Barry Meyer, Chairman & Chief Executive Officer of Warner Bros. Remarks: Sen. Patrick Leahy, Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate. Keynote: Michael Apted, President, of the Directors Guild of America. Director Luncheon.This event at the Hotel Monaco, 700 F Street NW, Second Floor, Paris Ballroom. NOTE: Luncheon is FULL. 2:15 p.m. Panel 3: The Future of Show Business: Entertainment in the Digital Age. Opening Remarks: Senattor Gordon Smith. Session is moderated by Bob Dowling, Former Editor-in-Chief and Publisher, The Hollywood Reporter; Founder, The Bob Dowling Group. Participants include: Reed Hastings, Founder and Chief Executive Officer, Netflix; and John Fithian, President, National Association of Theatre Owners. 5:30 p.m. The Chairmans Dinner, honoring Clint Eastwood, Recipient of the Jack Valenti Humanitarian Award. Note: Red Carpet Photo-Op at the Donald W. Reynolds Center, 8th and G Streets NW entrance. Media set-up/arrival at 5:30 p.m. Red Carpet at 6 p.m. Those wishing to participate in the photo-op must notify Cara Duckworth at cduckworthmpaa.org or 202-378-9144 to be assigned a credential. Credentials will be available on-site.Dinner is not open to the media, however, a pool camera will be available on-site.

HOMELAND SECURITY _ American Military University holds a two-day conference, ``Homeland Security: The Ripple Effect." Highlights: 8:15 a.m. Rep. Bennie Thompson. 9 a.m. Panel discussion on mass fatality management during a pandemic flu event. 12 p.m. Luncheon address - Mayor Patrick McCrory, of Charlotte, N.C., and member of the President's Homeland Security Advisory Council. 3:30 p.m. Panel discussion on local, state and national cooperation, with FEMA Director David Paulison, others. Location: National Press Club.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 9 a.m. Meeting of the House Republican Conference. Closed press. Location: Room HC-9, Capitol. Notes: Media availability with the GOP leadership, HC-9, Capitol, at about 10 a.m.

KATRINA _ 9 a.m. New Orleans public housing residents, others hold a news conference to call on the public and politicians to support their right to return to their homes damaged by Hurricane Katrina. Location: Room HC-8, Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0128094

QUAD DEFICITS _ 9 a.m. The Johns Hopkins Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS) will hold a forum, ``The Quad Deficits: Why They Matter and What We Can Do About Them." Participants: Peter G. Peterson, senior chairman and co-founder of the Blackstone Group; David Wighton, New York City bureau chief of the Financial Times; and Robert Guttman, CPFR director. Location: Room 500, Bernstein-Offit Building, 1717 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IMMIGRATION _ 9 a.m. - 11 a.m. The Migration Policy Institute holds a news conference to announce the launch of a National Center on Immigrant Integration Policy. Briefers include: Michael Fix, MPI Vice President and Director of Studies and Co-Director, National Center on Immigrant Integration Policy; Margie McHugh, Co-Director, National Center on Immigrant Integration Policy; and Demetrios Papademetriou, MPI President. Location: Migration Policy Institute Conference Room, 1400 16th St. NW, Suite 300, third floor.

CHINA-MILITARY _ 9:30 a.m. - 11 a.m. The Carnegie Endowment hosts a panel discussion on Chinas military modernization as the third in series ``Carnegie Debates: Reframing China Policy, regarding the most pressing issues in U.S.-China relations. Participants: Ambassador J. Stapelton Roy, Carnegie Endowment Board of Trustees; Dr. David Finkelstein, Director of Project Asia and the China Studies Center at The CNA Corporation; and Dr. Larry Wortzel, US-China Economic and Security Review Commission. Location: Room 562, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

IRAQ _ 10:15 a.m. Sen. Barack Obama, and Reps. Mike Thompson and Patrick Murphy hold a press conference on Iraq. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

ABU-GHRAIB-JORDAN _ 10:30 a.m. Hearing on defense motion to dismiss charges against Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan for alleged crimes at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. Location: Fort McNair, 4th and P Sts. SW.

HOYER _ 11 a.m. House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing on the FY08 budget. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

PEACE-NONVIOLENCE _ 11 a.m. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, others, hold a news conference to announce reintroduction of a bill to create the Department of Peace and Nonviolence. Location: Cannon Terrace. Rain site: HC-7, Capitol.

EMPLOYEE CHOICE _ 11:15 a.m. AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, Rep. George Miller, Sen. Edward Kennedy, others, hold a news conference to introduce the Employee Free Choice Act to restore workers' ability to form unions and bargain with employers. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

CRIME AGENDA _ 11:30 a.m. Reps. Lamar Smith and J. Randy Forbes hold a news conference on the antiviolence crime agenda. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

GLOBALIZATION _ 12 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations hosts a panel, ``Has Globalization Passed Its Peak?" Panelists: Adam Segal, Maurice R. Greenberg Senior Fellow for China Studies, Council on Foreign Relationsl Rawi Abdelal, Associate Professor, Harvard Business School; and Marco Vicenzino, Founder and Director, Global Strategy Project. Location: World Bank J Building- J1- 050, 701 18th St. NW.

DEMOCRATIC LEADERSHIP _ 1 p.m. The House Democratic leadership hold a media availability. Participants: Majority Leader Steny Hoyer; Majority Whip James E. Clyburn; Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel; Caucus Vice Chairman John Larson; and Budget Committee Chairman John Spratt. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

PARK SERVICE _ 2 p.m. Secretary of the Interior Dirk Kempthorne, National Park Service (NPS) Director Mary Bomar, NPS Regional Directors, and several NPS Superintendents will be available to the media to discuss the recently announced budget and NPS Centennial Initiative. Notes: Media should call 888-566-5778. Pass Code: 2230.

TURKEY _ 2 p.m. Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul holds a news conference to discuss U.S.-Turkish relations. Location: NPC Broadcast Operations Center, Suite 480, National Press Club.

SENATE-IRAQ _ 2:30 p.m. There will be a closed Senate briefing by members of the intelligence community on Iraq. Location: Room S-407, Capitol.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 3 p.m. House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam and Whip Roy Blunt hold a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room HC-9, Capitol.

SOCIAL SECURITY _ 3 p.m. Reps. Howard Berman, Howard McKeon, and Lloyd Doggett hold a news conference with others on the Social Security Fairness Act. Location: Room 2261, Rayburn.

INFLUENZA PANDEMIC _ 4 p.m. Assistant Labor Secretary Edwin Foulke Jr. holds a telphone media briefing on OSHA's ``Guidance on Preparing Workplaces for an Influenza Pandemic," guidance prepared by DOL and HHS support of President Bush's National Strategy for Pandemic Influenza Implementation Plan. Notes: Callin number: 800-475-8421; passcode: Pandemic Flu; leader: Kevin Ropp. Note: Callers will need both the passcode and leader's name to join the conference.

US-TAIWAN _ 5:30 p.m. The Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office, others, hold a reception marking the 5th anniversary of the Congressional Taiwan Caucus. Location: Room 2200, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0128095

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, February 6, 2007 8:33 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, February 06, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070206.pdf; dojclips070206.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Bush Seeks $7.2M More For Guantánamo Cases (MH).....4
Surveillance Budget For Court Gets A Boost (USNEWS).....5
Bush Seeks Spending Increases In Research, Surveillance (CNET).....6
Man Convicted In Terror Training Case (AP).....7
VIRGINIA BRIEFING (WP).....8
Congress Listens In On Wiretapping (LAT).....8

Homeland Response:

Man Pleads Guilty To Possessing Ricin (FINDLAW/AP).....9
Evacuee Camp Kids Worry Schools Chief (USAT).....10
A 'Road Home' To Lunacy (column) (WP).....10

War News:

Republicans In Senate Block Debate On Iraq Resolution (LAT).....12
Republicans Block Senate Debate On Iraq (AP).....12
Vote On Iraq Is Blocked By GOP (USAT).....13
G.O.P. Senators Thwart Debate On Iraq Policy (NYT).....14
GOP Stalls Debate On Troop Increase (WP).....16
Senate GOP Blocks Iraq Resolution (WT).....17
Senate Debate On Iraq Stalls (MCT).....19
Democrats To Launch PR Blitz On Iraq Vote (RC).....19
The Upshot Of The Debate: No Debate (WP).....20
President Bush Sends $2.9 Trillion Spending Plan To Congress; Giuliani Takes One More Step Toward Presidential Run (CNN).....22
War Debate Goes To Heart Of Bush's Power (FT).....35
Half Of Democratic Senators Regret Iraq Vote (POL).....36
A Detached Debate (WP).....39
To Help Iraq, Let It Fend For Itself (NYT).....40
The War To Save The Surge (WP).....41
Democrats To Question Bremer On Iraq Contracts (USAT).....42
House To Probe Management Of Iraq, Health Care Programs (WT).....43
As New 'Cop On The Beat,' Congressman Starts Patrol (NYT).....44
The Politico Interviews Bremer Prior To Testimony (POL).....46
Back On Capitol Hill, Bremer Is Facing A Cooler Reception (WP).....47
Dozens Killed As Baghdad Crackdown Nears (AP).....49
U.S. Unit Walks 'A Fine Line' In Iraqi Capital (WP).....51
Anti-violence Push Begins In Baghdad (WT/AP).....53
US Prepares For Baghdad Crackdown (FT).....54
U.S. Advisers Find Joint Patrols With Iraqis Don't Go As Planned (USAT).....55
Troops In Iraq Kill Official Who Worked For Shiite Cleric (NYT).....58
2 Key Members Of Mahdi Army Killed (AP).....58
Security Crackdown In Capital Takes Shape As Attacks Kill Dozens (WP).....58
US Eases Tone On Iran's Role In Iraq (CSM).....60
Iranian Diplomat Kidnapped In Baghdad By Iraqis With Official ID (NYT).....61
U.S. May Seek Sanctions Against Iran (AP).....62
Defying U.N., Iran Installs Centrifuges (WP/AP).....62
Time To Act On Iran Is Now (USAT).....63
As U.S. Confronts Iran, Cold War Offers Lessons (USAT).....63
Syria Urges Talks On Iraq (WT/AP).....64
Iraqi Shiite Calls For U.S.-Iran Talks (NYT).....65
Iraq Allies Dawdle On Aid For Rebuilding (WT).....66
US Sets Up Task Force On Iraqi Refugees (AFP).....67
100th British Soldier Killed In Action In Iraq (AFP).....67
Trial Starts For Officer Who Refused To Go To Iraq (NYT).....68
The Taliban In Pakistan (WSJ).....69

DOJ:

Turnover In US Attorneys 'Disruptive' (FT).....70
Justice IT Funding Appears Flat (GCN).....71
Budget Proposal Includes 2.6 Percent Increase For IT (GOVEXEC).....71

Analysis: Bush's Federal Budget Proposal (FRESBEE) 72
Attorney General Speaks To Law Students (SMUDC) 73

Corporate Scandals:

Proposed SEC Budget Edges Up (AP)..... 74
Banks Appeal Ruling Allowing Enron Investors To Sue As Class (NYT)..... 75
S.E.C. Is Looking At Stock Trading (NYT)..... 75
Hyundai Motor Chief Gets Three Year Jail Term (FT)..... 77
Fannie Mae's Former Chief Wants Earlier Hearing Date (WP) 78
Probe Amplifies Conflict-of-Interest Questions For Chamber Of Commerce Chief (WP) 78

Criminal Law:

FBI Acknowledges Gaps In Notes On Libby (USAT) 80
Libby's Grand Jury Tapes Are Heard In Court (NYT)..... 81
Jurors Listen To Libby's Grand Jury Tapes (WP) 82
Court Hears Grand Jury Testimony (LAT)..... 83
News Media Cheer Ruling On Libby Tapes (AP)..... 84
Mr. Cheney, Tear Down This Wall (NYT) 85
Difference Between Classified And Secret At Heart Of Libby Trial (ABC)..... 86
Miller Tied To '92 Conflict-of-interest Fine (HILL) 87
Fumo Strikes First (PHI)..... 88
Pa. Senator Says He'll Be Indicted (NSDY/AP)..... 90
Fumo's Defense: A Strong Offense (PHI) 91
FUMO'S COATTAILS ARE LONG (PHI)..... 92
Corruption Trial Begins Today (MH)..... 92
Belleville Woman To Be Sentenced In Hurricane Katrina Fraud (AP)..... 93
Gulfport Woman Pleads Guilty To Katrina Fraud (BSH)..... 94
Suspect In 2 Boys' Abduction Charged With Molestation (USAT)..... 94
The Police Lineup Is Becoming Suspect Practice (CSM)..... 94
Jail Record Near For Videographer Who Resisted Grand Jury (NYT)..... 96
Child Pornography Suspect Pleads Guilty (TRENT)..... 97
Fifth Worker At Frontier Accused Of Sex Crime (BUFFNEWS) 97
Teacher, Scout Leader Accused Of Soliciting Sex With Minor (NSDY/AP)..... 98
Identity Fraud Has Dropped Since 2003, Survey Shows (NYT) 99
Homicides Weigh On Confirmation For Chief Lanier (WT) .100
Marion Barry Faces Possible Prison Time (WP)..... 101
With Probation At Risk, Barry To Meet Attorney (WT)..... 102

Civil Law:

Jury Finds FBI Retaliated Against Agent, Awards Her $565,000 (AP)..... 103
Ex-agent Wins Lawsuit Against FBI (MINNST)..... 103
Trial Starts In Collins' Air Crash (CHIT)..... 104

Civil Rights:

Voting Rights Expert Won't Testify In Noxubee County Election Dispute Case (JCL)..... 105
FBI To Share Progress On Race Crimes, Including Moore's Ford (ATHBH) 106
White Supremacist Activity In US Flourishes, Fueled By Anti-immigrant Sentiments (FINDLAW/AP)..... 106
U.S. Civil Rights Group Calls For Warrant Limits After Police Kill Elderly Woman (FINDLAW/AP)..... 107
Cheapening A Fight Against Hatred (WP)..... 108

Antitrust:

Smithfield Foods Answers DOJ Query (AP) 109
Companies Are Trying To Beat The Antitrust Clock (DEAL) 109
F.T.C. Reaffirms Rambus Antitrust Ruling (AP)..... 110
Rambus Shares Surge After FTC's Antitrust Order (MRKTWTCH)..... 111
Rambus Stock Soars 24% After Antitrust Ruling By FTC (USAT)..... 112
Beatles End Trademark Dispute With Apple (FT) 113
Apple, Beatles Make Some Peace (WSJ) 113
Expect Beatles Downloads Soon, Media Watchers Say (USAT)..... 114
After Long Dispute, Two Apples Work It Out (NYT)..... 115
Apple And The Beatles Make Peace Over Their Logos (WP/AP)..... 116
Seeking Heft, State Street To Add Investors Financial (WSJ)117
Mills Receives Another Buyout Offer (WP)..... 117
$1.56 Billion Offered For Mills Corp. Sale (WT)..... 118
Icahn Launches Takeover For Lear (BLOOM)..... 119
EU Microsoft Judge: Ruling By September (AP) 119

Environment:

Pelosi, Dingell Reach Deal (HILL)..... 120
China And UN Plan Carbon Trading Exchange (FT)..... 121
Legal Hot Air (WSJ) 122
Global Warming's Simple Remedy (WP)..... 123
U.S. Officials Mull Ethanol Reserve Amid Bush Plans To Increase SPR (WSJ) 124
The Price Of Corn (NYT)..... 124
Asarco Accuses Mexican Owners Of Illegally Stripping The Company Of Assets (TACNT)..... 125

DOJ_NMG_0128099

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Connellsville Investor Faces Drug Charges (PTR) 126
S.J. Airport Screeners Nab Alleged Meth Smuggler (AP)..... 127
E. Palo Alto Man Tried To Smuggle Meth Onto Airplane, Court Records Say (SFC) 128
Lawmen: Drug Lord Marked Witness For Death (NSL)..... 128
Men Plead Not Guilty To Federal Drug Charges (SHJ) 130
Arellano's Lawyers May Put Blame On Brother (SDUT)..... 130
Convict-cop Labels ATF Accuser 'Liar' (CHIT) 131
ATF Agent Says He Faked Murder To Get Into Hells Angels (CNN)..... 132
Illegal Guns Targeted With $1,000 Rewards (SACBEE)..... 132
ATF Agents Who Shot At Gunman Won't Be Charged (WP). 133

Immigration:

Immigrant Entrepreneurs Shape A New Economy (NYT)..... 133
Send Convicted Illegal Immigrants Home (LAT) 136

Congress-Administration:

On Deficit Cutting, Skeptics Abound (WSJ) 136
White House Sees End To Deficit (FT) 138
Bush Releases Budget Aimed To Erase Deficit (NYT) 139
Bush's Budget Beefs Up Defense (CHIT)..... 140
Bush Budget Cements Expiring Tax Cuts (AP) 142
Plan Calls For No Tax Hikes; Dems Say It's 'Disconnected From Reality' (USAT)..... 143
Bush Budget Trims From Energy Spending (LAT) 144
Bush Submits 'Staggering' $2.9 Trillion Budget (WT) 145
Portman Changes Tone, At Least, In Budget Debate (RC) .. 147
Bush Budget Sets Stage For Clashes With Congress (WSJ) 148
Bottom Line For Bush's '08 Budget: Contention (LAT) 150
Democratic Budget Chairs Blast Bush Plan (MCT)..... 152
Addressing Wealth Gap (WSJ) 153
$623B Marked For Pentagon Spending (USAT) 155
Defense Spending Is Set For Sharp Rise (WSJ)..... 156
Bush's Defense Budget Biggest Since Reagan Era (WP)..... 157
Bush Budget Gives Boost To Defense (WT) 158
Bush's 2008 Budget Request Doubles Spending On Replacing Military Equipment (NYT) 159
Democrats Face Limits In Changing Bush's Budget (NYT). 160
The Bush Budget: What's In $2.9 Trillion? (CSM)..... 162
Bush Wants To Means-test Middle-class Benefits (FT) 163
New Drug Benefit Could Have Higher Price For Some (USAT)..... 163
Bush Budget Pinches Domestic Spending (AP)..... 164
Bush Plan Reins In Domestic Spending (WP) 166
Bush's Austere Health Proposal Draws Complaints (LAT) ... 168
How Plans To Expand Health Coverage Could Affect Insured (WSJ)..... 169
Slow Growth In Health (WP)..... 171
Health Industry Cool To Bush Budget Cuts (AP) 171
Bush's And Spitzer's Budgets Hit New York Hospitals Hard (NYT)..... 173
A Look At Winners, Losers In The President's Proposed Budget (MCT) 174
A Closer Look At Where The Money Will Go (WP)..... 175
Budget Winners And Losers (WP) 175
Democrats See Holes In President's Budget Plan (WP)..... 176
Cultural Agencies See Boost From Bush Budget (WP) 178
New Spending For No Child Left Behind (WP)..... 178
Bush Seeks Renewal Of No Child Law (WT) 179
Letters To The Editor (WSJ)..... 179
Bush Plan Would Raise Grants To Low-income Students (USAT)..... 181
Bush Budget Proposes Cut In Student-Lender Subsidy (WSJ) 182
Bush '08 Budget Falls Short On Money For Border Fence (WT) 183
Bush Plan Leaves Alternative Minimum Tax Untouched (MCT) 184
The Budget Battle And Your Wallet (WSJ) 185
Funding For Treating Sewage At Mexican Border Is Sought (WSJ)..... 186
A Budget Ax Over 'Harry Potter Crowd' (CSM)..... 187
Fiscal Revelation (WSJ) 188
Mr. Bush's Deficit Dance (WP)..... 189
The Other Defense Budget (NYT) 190
Fudging The Budget (NYT)..... 190
Tax-Law Crackdown To Raise $29.5 Billion (WSJ)..... 192
Bush Proposes Change In How FAA Is Funded (WSJ) 193
McConnell Focuses On Judges As GOP Defines Top Priorities (HILL) 194
9th Circuit Steps Up En Banc Reviews (LAW) 195
Snow Faults Bush Stand On Private Accounts (WSJ) 196
Senate Seeks Intelligence Hub To Shield Satellites (WT) ... 197
Pelosi Catches Nonstop Flights Home (WP) 198
Inside Politics (WT) 198
In Senate, Flip-flops Come Easy For Both Parties (RC) 200
Chief Justice Counsels Humility (WP) 201

Other News:

Service Sector Extends Advance But Signals Pace Might Slow (WSJ)..... 202
Expansion In Services Sector Set Strong Pace In January (NYT/AP)..... 203

Dow Edges Higher On H-P But Microsoft Hampers Rise (WSJ) 203
Mixed News Produces Mixed Results (USAT) 204
A.B.A. Panel Would Weaken Code Governing Judges' Conduct (NYT) 205
Giuliani Nearing Full-fledged Candidacy (AP) 206
Giuliani Steps Closer To A Run In 2008 (NYT) 207
Rudy Ready To Run (NSDY) 207
Giuliani Announces He's In '08 Presidential Race (WP) 208
Giuliani Run Poses Conundrum (WSJ) 209
Romney To Add Names (RC) 210
Obama, Clinton May Skip Early Debates (Pol) 211
Obama Trying To Quit Smoking—again (CHIT) 214
Edwards Risks Tax Hike For Health Plan (AP) 215
Opening Bid On Health Care (WSJ) 216
Battle Over President's Budget Begins Today; Interview With John Edwards (CNN) 217
Edwards Details His Health Care Proposal (NYT) 229
Edwards Introduces Plan For Health-Care Coverage (WP) 230
Edwards' Stiff Healthcare Medicine: Taxes (LAT) 230
Edwards Latest To Decline Public Funds For Presidential Campaign (USAT) 231
The Other Democrats Weigh In (WP) 232
Slip Sliding Away (NYT) 233
House Bill Eases Union Sign-ups (WT) 234
A Vaccine To Save Women's Lives (NYT) 235
Can The CBO Spell IRA? (WSJ) 236
Experts: Mideast Meeting Key For Peace (AP) 237
In Public View, Saudis Counter Iran In Region (NYT) 238
Rivals Iran And Saudi Arabia Now Talking (AP) 240
Tiny Qatar Vies For Big Regional Role (CSM) 242
U.S. Says North Korea Must Abandon Nukes (AP) 243
U.S. Calls For End To 'Nuclear Business' (WT) 244
N. Korea Aims To Improve On Clinton-Era Nuclear Deal (WP) 244
U.S. Embassy Warns Of Sudan Threats (AP) 246
U.S., Malaysia Resume Trade Talks (WSJ/AP) 246
Indonesia Withholds Vital Bird Flu Data (FT) 247
India Steps Onto Tightrope As Talks Resume With Iran (LAT) 247
Companies Urged To Push For Easing Cuba Restrictions (HILL) 248
Post-Fidel Cuba (WT) 250
U.S. Wants Nicaragua Missiles Destroyed (AP) 251
U.N. Chief Returns To Headquarters, Where Battles Await Him (NYT) 251
Ban's U.N. Peacekeeping Reforms Rejected (LAT) 252
FLASH POINT Corruption Crackdown Targets Shanghai Inc. (WSJ) 253
Market Leninism (WSJ) 256
New Charges In Russia Against Oil Executives (NYT) 257
Criminal Case Likely To Put All Of Yukos In State Hands (NYT) 259
Bienvenidos To Mexican Avocados (LAT) 260

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Seeks $7.2M More For Guantánamo Cases (MH)

By Carol Rosenberg
The Miami Herald, February 6, 2007

President Bush's budget request published today includes plans to spend $7.2 million on salaries and expenses for civilian lawyers -- to both fend off legal challenges at home and help prosecute terrorist suspects at the war-crimes court at Guantánamo.

Until release of the budget, the military commissions had been described as a military function -- handled by the Defense Department and soon to be supervised by a former Pentagon inspector general.

But an annex of the budget released by the White House today lists a supplemental request of $1,736,000 for the government's National Security Division, part of the Justice Department run by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

DOJ_NMG_0128101

"This request would provide the National Security Division $2 million to support the Department of Defense's prosecution of high-value detainees at Guantánamo via the process established by the military commission," the 2007 supplemental request released today says.

Bush announced in September that he had ordered the CIA to transfer 14 so-called high-value captives to the U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba, effectively putting them under Pentagon control.

They include Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, and a captive known as Hambali, who was allegedly an Islamic militant in Indonesia.

The budget request said the Justice Department's National Security Division ``will support the [Pentagon] effort by providing experienced assistant United States attorneys and paralegals."

A Justice Department fact sheet explaining the supplemental budget request said the federal prosecutors, who are civilian lawyers, will get their assignments ``as soon as possible."

The assignments, it said, "will last a year or longer." High-value prosecutions are expected to be more complex. The captives were held at so-called CIA "black sites," out of reach of the International Committee of the Red Cross.

"Maybe they don't have the firepower," said Carl W. Tobias, a constitutional law professor at the University of Richmond.

He predicted the larger war-on-terror trials to touch on a range of issues from military law to international law to human rights questions.

"There is so much at stake, and there's so much uncharted territory," said Tobias, ``I think they really want some kind of specialized expertise that DOD [the Department of Defense] just doesn't have."

The Pentagon had no immediate comment Monday on whatcivilian Justice Department lawyers might do at the trials.

Nor could a spokesman say whether the budget and supplemental included any other Guantánamo related funding.

Defense officials have a proposal to build a legal compound in which to stage the trials at Guantánamo that could cost up to $125 million.

But the Pentagon shelved an earlier plan to fund them without explicit Congressional approval; it was not immediately clear Monday whether the funds were included in either the 2008 budget or the 2007 supplemental.

In the meantime, the chief Pentagon prosecutor for the tribunals, Air Force Col. Morris Davis, on Friday swore out new charges against three long-held captives at Guantánamo -- David Hicks, 31, of Australia; Salim Hamdan, 36, of Yemen, and Omar Khadr, 19, of Canada.

Separately, the Justice Department is seeking an additional $5.5 million for its civil division to fend off lawsuits filed by Guantánamo captives in the federal courts.

Civilian lawyers have filed habeas corpus petitions in U.S. District Court in Washington on behalf of several hundred captives -- and the Justice Department has been challenging them for years.

Then, late last year the Republican-led Congress stripped so-called "enemy combatants" of the traditional right to challenge their detention. So Justice Department attorneys have been working in the courts to get the captives' cases closed.

Now, the 2008 budget seeks $5.5 million for 30 attorneys and six other staff "to defend the government in Guantánamo Bay detainee litigation," according to a Justice Department fact sheet published today.

The justification for the expense said that, since 9/11, the Bush administration has adopted "numerous counterterrorism strategies" to disrupt attacks and weaken ``global terrorist networks."

But the strategies have "drawn legal challenges in courts," it said, ``including hundreds of lawsuits filed on behalf of alien enemy combatants held at Guantánamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba."

Surveillance Budget For Court Gets A Boost (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, February 6, 2007

With the Bush administration's revelation that it will replace the controversial warrantless surveillance program conducted by the National Security Agency with a plan approved by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court, the fiscal 2007 budget includes a $3.1 million increase to address what is expected to be a spike in FISA applications.

FISA, the secret court that issues wiretap orders from Justice Department requests to conduct electronic surveillance and physical searches of suspected international terrorists or spies, already has had an increased workload since 9/11.

A senior justice official told U.S. News that the department's newly retooled National Security Division has streamlined the FISA application process dramatically, and the increased funds along with the quicker processing will allow the department to handle the new surveillance workload.

But "it will mean more work for our office," the official said.

Bush Seeks Spending Increases In Research, Surveillance (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, February 6, 2007

Proposed $2.9 trillion budget includes millions for science and tech studies, traveler screening programs--and a few cutbacks.

President Bush's proposed $2.9 trillion budget for next year calls for increases in some scientific research funding, along with boosts for counterterrorism surveillance and screening programs.

The proposal, unveiled Monday, seeks a balanced budget by 2012 while increasing spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. That means curbing so-called "mandatory" spending by domestic agencies, including slashing the "growth rate" of the government's Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security programs by $96 billion.

"My formula for a balanced budget reflects the priorities of our country at this moment in its history: protecting the homeland and fighting terrorism, keeping the economy strong with low taxes, and keeping spending under control while making federal programs more effective," Bush said in a message accompanying his proposal.

The budget, however, is only a nonbinding request from the Bush administration to a Democrat-controlled Congress, which has already suggested it will be radically reshaped.

The president's plan includes beefing up spending for his American Competitiveness Initiative, which aims to ensure that the United States keeps up with its global competitors in the science and technology realm.

Under the proposed budget, the National Science Foundation would receive $6.4 billion in funding, a 6.8 percent boost from last year. Of that amount, about $5.1 billion would go to "research and related activities," which in the past "has contributed to the development of the Internet and Internet search engines, fiber optics, color plasma displays, magnetic resonance imaging, and other advances that now help each of us in our daily lives," according to the president's budget breakdown for that agency.

That number includes $390 million--an increase of 4.5 percent from last year--for NSF's nanotechnology research arm, and $994 million--a 10 percent boost--for its Networking and Information Technology Research and Development program.

Some tech-centric agencies could experience cuts. The National Institute of Standards and Technology, for instance, saw an increase in budget levels for its core research activities. But its Advanced Technology Program, which is designed to explore "unproven, early stage technologies," appears to be on the way out. Its proposed funding plummeted from about $79 billion this year to zero dollars for the next fiscal year. NIST representatives did not respond immediately to requests for clarification.

As outlined during his State of the Union address last month, Bush asked Congress to set aside hundreds of millions of dollars for research on alternative energy technologies including solar photovoltaic, biofuels, and advanced battery hybrid and "plug-in" vehicle research. The largest chunk, at $385 billion, would go to coal research initiatives, closely followed by $309 million for hydrogen fuel studies.

The overall budgets for the U.S. Departments of Justice and Homeland Security also saw slight boosts, with an emphasis on government screening and surveillance programs.

Within the Homeland Security department, the president proposed $1 billion for the so-called Secure Border Initiative, which includes plans for a "virtual fence" composed of motion sensors, infrared cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles, or UAVs, that the administration hopes will help keep better tabs on illicit entrants.

Homeland Security also would receive a $21.9 million increase in funding for its Science and Technology Office of Innovation, which hopes to develop technologies that would create a more resilient electric grid and detect tunnels along the border, among other things. Overall funding levels for the Science and Technology directorate under Bush's proposal, however, would drop from $848 million for fiscal year 2007 to $799 million for the upcoming year.

DOJ_NMG_0128103

Traveler screening projects, some of which have proven controversial, would also receive increased funding. Secure Flight, an airline passenger profiling system that was plagued by privacy concerns, would receive a $38 million boost in funding for the next fiscal year. The president requested $146.2 million for implementation of a system that would allow U.S. authorities to record and screen all 10 fingerprints of foreign entrants to the country, as opposed to the two prints that are currently required.

Under the banner of "preventing and combating terrorism," the president called for an additional $227 million for various Justice Department programs in that realm. Among those requests: an extra $37.8 million "to address the demand for secure interception of data from public and private networks" and $22.8 million for investigators engaged in computer analysis and digital forensics. Those requests mark significant boosts from last year, when those activities received $17.9 million and $19.7 million respectively.

The Justice Department's budget also includes more than $25 million in program increases--up from $93.7 million last year--for investigations involving child pornography and obscenity, particularly tracking convicted sex offenders and apprehending "online child pornographers and molesters."

For the fourth straight year, the president plans to allow the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to keep all the fees it collects, which are expected to be around $1.9 billion. The agency said Monday that it hopes to use its funds to hire 1,200 new patent examiners in the next fiscal year.

With opposition to the budget already emanating from the Democrat-controlled Congress, it's unlikely the proposal will be enacted as is.

"Today's budget from the president is just more of the same fiscal irresponsibility and misplaced priorities," U.S. House of Representatives Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said in a statement. "It takes our country in the wrong direction."

What remains to be seen is how the science- and technology-related provisions will hold up.

For instance, while the president requested $17.3 billion--a 3.1 percent increase over his request for the previous year--for NASA's fiscal year 2008 budget, the agency doesn't expect to get that from Congress. For 2007, Congress appropriated $400 million less than the president's requested $16.8 billion. NASA administrator Michael Griffin warned in a press conference Monday that continual NASA budget cuts may cause U.S. astronauts to be grounded for as long as five years and force cutbacks in science programs and lunar robotic explorations.

Rep. Bart Gordon (D-Tenn.), chairman of the House Science and Technology Committee, said the funding increases were helpful, but the plan overall "lacks the priorities and consistency to ensure our competitiveness now and in the long run."

CNET News.com's Candace Lombardi and Declan McCullagh contributed to this report.

Man Convicted In Terror Training Case (AP)

By Matthew Barakat, The Associated Press

AP, February 6, 2007

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (AP) — A Virginia man was convicted Monday of lying to a federal grand jury about his training with a Pakistani militant group, three years after he was acquitted of giving aid to the Taliban as part of a group that trained with paintball games.

A jury in U.S. District Court convicted Sabri Benkahla, 31, of four felony counts including perjury and obstruction of justice. He faces a maximum of 25 years in prison when he is sentenced April 27.

Benkahla told a grand jury in 2004 that he had never engaged in combat training during a 1999 trip to Pakistan, but the government contended that he trained with a militant group called Lashkar-e-Taiba to use rocket-propelled grenades and automatic weapons.

The defense argued that prosecutors, stung by Benkahla's 2004 acquittal, laid a perjury trap by summoning him before the grand jury and asking questions that had no bearing on the panel's terrorism investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0128104

An FBI agent testified that Benkahla's testimony was important needed because the bureau was investigating his links to suspected terrorists including Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, another U.S. citizen from Falls Church who was subsequently convicted of joining al-Qaida and plotting to assassinate President Bush.

Benkahla was one of two defendants acquitted in the government's prosecution of a dozen Muslim men who participated in what the government called a "Virginia jihad network" that used paintball games in the Virginia woods in 2000 and 2001 as a means to train for holy war around the globe.

VIRGINIA BRIEFING (WP)

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

TERRORISM

Falls Church Man Convicted of Lying About Training

A Falls Church man was convicted yesterday of lying when he told a grand jury that he had never attended a terrorist training camp overseas.

Sabri Benkahla, 31, had been acquitted in 2004 of being a member of a "Virginia jihad network" but appeared before the grand jury later that year. Prosecutors said his denial that he had received terrorist training hindered the grand jury's investigation into who was being trained in weapons and explosives use at camps in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

Benkahla was indicted again last year on charges that included perjury and obstruction of justice. A federal jury in Alexandria convicted him yesterday on those and other counts. He faces up to 25 years in prison when he is sentenced April 27.

-- Jerry Markon

ARLINGTON COUNTY

Board Chairman Will Seek Job as Clerk of Court

Arlington County Board Chairman Paul Ferguson (D) announced yesterday that he will not seek another term in office in November because he wants to run for election as the clerk of the Arlington County Circuit Court. David Bell, the court's longtime clerk, said last week that he would not seek reelection.

Ferguson, 41, has served on the County Board since 1996. He recently drew widespread attention for a major initiative to reduce the county's greenhouse gas emissions.

-- Annie Gowen

Woman Escapes Knife-Wielding Abductor

Arlington County police are investigating the abduction of a woman who was walking alone Friday evening in the 1500 block of South George Mason Drive. Police said a man with a knife pulled the 23-year-old woman into some bushes, but she fought him off. The attacker ran from the scene, police said. The woman was treated for cuts on her face.

Police said the 8 p.m. incident might be related to a sexual assault that took place last month. On Jan. 11, police said, a 27-year-old woman who was walking in the 4200 block of South Four Mile Run was grabbed from behind by a man who threatened her with a knife. The man forced the woman to walk to a nearby grassy area, where he sexually assaulted her, police said.

-- Jamie Stockwell

ALEXANDRIA

SmarTrip Cards Now Work on DASH Buses

Riders on Alexandria's DASH buses now can use SmarTrip farecards when they transfer from Metrorail or Metrobus, officials said yesterday.

New fareboxes on the 57 DASH buses also allow customers to add up to $20 to their SmarTrip cards on the bus.

To encourage use of the blue-and-green cards beyond Metrobus and Metrorail, Metro officials have been trying to install equipment so the cards can be used on nine regional bus systems. But the process has been delayed repeatedly because of incompatible software, officials said. Other local bus systems are supposed to accept the cards by July.

-- Lena H. Sun

Congress Listens In On Wiretapping (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

SLOWLY BUT surely, the National Security Agency's eavesdropping on Americans suspected of ties with foreign terrorists is being brought under the rule of law. But the Bush administration still owes not just Congress but the country some straight answers about the program.

Last week, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales agreed to provide Congress details of the program's new arrangement for being monitored by a special court set up by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Gonzales' latest concession comes a few weeks after the administration abruptly reversed itself and said that it could, after all, conduct surveillance of international calls and e-mails under the court's supervision.

But the administration has still refused to spell out whether the court will approve individual requests for wiretapping authority — as it traditionally has done — or just sign off on more general requests. This is the crucial question.

A Justice Department official said last month that the new court orders are not "cookie-cutter" and were more specific than an "advisory opinion" on the overall program. That sounds encouraging, but the public deserves to know whether the administration is providing the court with probable cause about specific U.S. citizens.

Perhaps the answer to that question is in the documents Gonzales is turning over to Congress. If so, it should be shared with the public.

No one suggests that investigators should publicize the names or locations of people under suspicion or the technology being used to capture their communications. But it shouldn't be a state secret whether the NSA is getting case-by-case approval for surveillance of Americans or engaging in some less discriminate "data mining."

Two realities strengthen the hand of Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and other lawmakers who want to bring oversight to the program: the new Democratic-controlled Congress and a lawsuit that reached a federal appeals court in Cincinnati last week. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), who succeeded Specter as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is threatening new legislation if the documents suggest the administration hasn't achieved the "proper balance" between privacy and security. Last week, two of three judges on a panel of the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati reacted skeptically to the suggestion that a legal challenge to the original program was moot.

The attacks of 9/11 changed a lot of things in the United States — but not the meaning of the 4th Amendment or the need for congressional oversight of the executive branch. The administration can show its respect for these principles by being more forthcoming with the American people about its activities.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Pleads Guilty To Possessing Ricin (FINDLAW/AP)

By Beth Rucker, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 6, 2007

(AP) - NASHVILLE, Tennessee-A man pleaded guilty Monday to federal charges of possessing the potentially deadly poison ricin, firearms silencers and explosives.

William Matthews entered his plea in a deal with prosecutors that calls for a prison term of 7 years and 3 months when he is sentenced April 27.

The ricin charge could have been punished by up to life in prison, and the weapons charges each carried a maximum sentence of 10 years.

"Mr. Matthews, I think, chose this (deal) as the best of the available options," his lawyer, public defender Sumter Camp, said after court.

Neither the defendant nor the authorities explained why Matthews had the ricin, which is illegal to possess except for research, and the silencers and explosives, which are legal but were not properly registered.

A prosecutor declined to comment following the plea hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0128106

Matthews was charged after a tip from his estranged wife led police and federal agents to search his property May 31. They found the ricin in a sealed baby jar, two functional pipe bombs, five gun silencers, three blasting caps and bomb-making materials.

As little as 500 micrograms of the protein ricin, roughly the amount that fits on the head of a pin, is enough to kill an adult, according to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

In his plea, the defendant acknowledged possessing 5.68 grams of the substance, which he had made from castor beans.

Matthews, 56, was already in a Davidson County jail serving a nine-month sentence for violating orders of protection taken out by his wife when he was charged with ricin possession. He has remained in custody since then.

Matthews, who worked as a Davidson County sheriff's officer and at the city's drug court before he left amid a sexual harassment investigation, testified that in the 1960s he was diagnosed with schizophrenia and bipolar disorder and received treatment then.

In February 2004, ricin was found in the office of then Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. Dozens of Capitol employees were quarantined briefly and decontaminated, but none of them got sick. Authorities said at the time that Matthews was not believed to be connected to the incident.

Evacuee Camp Kids Worry Schools Chief (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 6, 2007

BATON ROUGE — The leader of Louisiana's largest school system says she believes that up to 200 children in the state's biggest hurricane evacuee camp are not registered in local schools. And she says the U.S. government — citing privacy laws — is doing little to help officials identify the youths.

East Baton Rouge Parish School Superintendent Charlotte Placide says the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) has refused to give school officials direct access to information about youths in Renaissance Village, a trailer park for families where 1,200-2,000 people live.

"The law requires students to be in school," Placide says. "We have families in the FEMA trailer park who concern me greatly."

She says schools have reached out to parents at Renaissance Village and registered about 200 youths, at least temporarily, until their families can find permanent homes. However, Placide — citing the trailer park's size, its designation as a place for families and her observations of daily life there — says it appears 200 or so more youths aren't in school.

Placide and state social service authorities say some households remain so unsettled that youths likely have jobs to help their families. Other kids might be staying home to watch their families' possessions when their parents are at work, she says.

Placide says officials' efforts to locate children would be much easier if FEMA would give the state more details about the families in Renaissance Village. But FEMA has declined to do so, she says, citing privacy laws that restrict the information the federal agency can release about benefit recipients.

FEMA spokesman James McIntyre says the agency's authority "doesn't include ensuring that kids are registered in schools. There comes a time when parents have to take responsibility."

McIntyre says FEMA has given information about evacuees receiving federal aid to the Louisiana Family Recovery Corps (LFRC), a state agency that helps families displaced by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. FEMA officials hoped LFRC would share the information with social service agencies and schools.

However, Raymond Jetson, LFRC's chief executive officer, says the information from FEMA lacks key details about Renaissance Village, such as youths' ages. "I understand the quagmire FEMA is in, attempting to respect the privacy of people. But it's becoming far too difficult to do the right thing."

LFRC's Kim Landry says the state lacks the personnel to assign truancy officers to the trailer park. She thinks the issue has not gotten much attention locally because many kids from the park would need special attention, and some residents are wary about placing more burdens on an already crowded 48,465-student system.

A 'Road Home' To Lunacy (column) (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0128107

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, February 5, 2007

NEW ORLEANS -- It's beyond frustrating to hear well-meaning bureaucrats cite all the reasons that so little has been done to rebuild this ruined city and the rest of the Gulf Coast -- why, for example, out of more than 100,000 Louisiana households that have applied to the state government for their share of $7 billion in federal reconstruction funds, fewer than 400 have received their money.

That's no misprint, and I'm being generous. As of last week, when I attended a Senate Homeland Security Committee hearing at the Louisiana Supreme Court building in the historic French Quarter, the actual number of homeowners who had gotten reconstruction money from this program, called Road Home, was 331. My hopeful assumption is that a few more checks have trickled out since then.

The three senators who flew down to conduct the hearing -- committee Chairman Joseph Lieberman (I-Conn.), home-state champion Mary Landrieu (D-La.) and presidential hopeful Barack Obama (D-Ill.) -- were remarkably focused and patient, given the circumstances. I got so exasperated that I had to let my mind wander, and it settled on Brownian motion.

That's not a reference to Michael Brown, the ridiculous former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Brownian motion is a natural phenomenon that bewildered 19th-century physicists. Looking through their microscopes, they could see that a tiny particle suspended in a fluid -- a mote of dust, say -- didn't just float in place. It did a jittery little dance, abruptly jerking left and right and forward and back, always in motion.

It took Albert Einstein to figure out what was going on. Einstein explained that the infinitesimal molecules of the fluid, randomly zooming to and fro, are colliding with the relatively gargantuan piece of dust. If, at a given instant, more molecules hit it from the right than from the left, it moves left. The next instant, if more molecules hit it from the south than from the north, it moves north. The buffeted particle just zigzags aimlessly, never really getting anywhere.

That's where the recovery of New Orleans stands, or floats. Factors such as subparagraph-level provisions of federal programs, fine-print details of a contract signed by the state government and shifting alliances in municipal politics -- minuscule things, compared with the size of the job that must be done -- push from all sides, and the result is a frenzied stasis.

One example: Almost a year ago, Congress appropriated $10.4 billion in special housing funds for reconstruction in Louisiana. Federal bureaucrats at the hearing last week were at pains to tell the senators why the requirement that the state ante up 10 percent of that total in matching funds was being enforced, since this statutory provision was waived in other recent disasters such as the Sept. 11 attacks and several Florida hurricanes.

And no one even tried to explain why Washington won't just let Louisiana write a check for its 10 percent share, and instead wants the state to write, justify and track a separate 10 percent check for each individual rebuilding project -- thousands upon thousands of checks.

Everyone knows this is insanity. Nobody does anything about it.

Another example: Remember those lucky homeowners who have gotten their Road Home checks? The first thing they're being required to do is pay back, in full, any loans they previously received under a special Small Business Administration rebuilding program. Anything else we can do for you?

Washington complains that the state and local governments were painfully slow to develop their reconstruction plans -- and that's true. State and local officials respond that it took months to understand and comply with all the federal rules their projects must follow to qualify for funding -- and that's true, too.

Donald E. Powell, the Texas banker whom President Bush appointed to coordinate the federal post-Katrina recovery effort, was the committee hearing's opening witness. When Obama asked in plain language what the prospects were for an ordinary homeowner who wanted to rebuild and come home, Powell said thoughtfully, "That's a tough question . . . a complex question." Then he spoke about new tax incentives, which he is certain will persuade developers to build affordable housing.

Tax incentives? With most of the city still in ruins? Hello?

To escape the death dance of Brownian motion, New Orleans needs force applied in one coherent direction. I have an idea: If Gen. David H. Petraeus is as smart and tough as the president says he is, if he's good enough to save Baghdad, the president should immediately send him to New Orleans instead -- or explain why policing a civil war in Iraq takes priority over resurrecting a great American city.

DOJ_NMG_0128108

WAR NEWS:

Republicans In Senate Block Debate On Iraq Resolution (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Republican Senate leaders succeeded today in blocking debate on a proposed resolution criticizing President Bush's plan to boost troop levels in Iraq. Democrats vowed to return to the issue soon.

"They may stop us temporarily," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. Vowing to return to the Iraq war in future debates over the 9/11 Commission's recommendations and on a supplemental appropriations bill, Reid said, "This does not end the debate on Iraq."

On a procedural vote, Senate Democrats mustered 49 votes -- far short of the 60 votes needed.

Republicans complained that Reid was giving preferential treatment to a resolution by Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) to require benchmarks for Iraqi progress. The GOP asked for similar consideration for a measure by Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), saying Congress would not cut funding for troops in the field.

"We are, in effect, being denied a fair process for this extremely important debate," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who before the vote accused the Democratic majority of blocking consideration of alternatives to the critical amendment.

Democratic leaders, who have offered votes on several Republicans amendments, fired back that the GOP was using procedurals tactics to stifle debate on the most important issue confronting the country.

"The Republican leadership can't take 'yes' for an answer," said Reid earlier. "They have been given all they've asked for. It is clear their actions are not driven by getting votes on Republican proposals. They are driven by a desire to provide political cover for President Bush."

Over the past several weeks, senior Democrats in the Senate have been working with a handful of Republicans to craft a resolution opposing the president's plans to boost troop levels in Iraq by 21,500.

The Bush administration and its congressional allies have been fighting ferociously to stop the nonbinding resolution, which would mark an embarrassing rebuke for the White House.

As senators took to the floor this afternoon to assail each other's positions on the war, McConnell and Reid continued to confer. In the end the clock — and the slim margin of the Democrats' control over the Senate — doomed the effort.

Republicans Block Senate Debate On Iraq (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 6, 2007

Republicans blocked a full-fledged Senate debate over Iraq on Monday, but Democrats vowed they would eventually find a way to force President Bush to change course in a war that has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 U.S. troops.

"We must heed the results of the November elections and the wishes of the American people," said Majority Leader Harry Reid.

Reid, D-Nev., spoke moments before a vote that sidetracked a nonbinding measure expressing disagreement with Bush's plan to deploy an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. The 49-47 vote was 11 short of the 60 needed to go ahead with debate, and left the fate of the measure uncertain.

Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky described the test vote as merely a "bump in the road" that could possibly be overcome within hours. GOP lawmakers "welcome the debate and are happy to have it," he said, adding they were insisting on equal treatment for an alternative measure expected to draw strong support.

DOJ_NMG_0128109

The proposal, by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., says Congress should neither cut nor eliminate funding for troops in the field. That measure takes no position on the war or the president's decision to deploy additional forces.

The political jockeying unfolded as bombings and mortar attacks killed dozens across Baghdad amid indications that a much-awaited operation to restore peace to the capital is gearing up. Bush announced last month he would beef up U.S. troop deployments to work alongside Iraqi units in an attempt to quell sectarian violence.

Democrats sought passage of a measure, supported by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., that is critical of the administration's new Iraq policy. It was the first time Democrats had scheduled a sustained debate on the war since they won control over Congress in last fall's midterm elections.

"The American people do not support escalation. Last November, voters made it clear they want a change of course, not more of the same," said Reid. "The president must hear from Congress, so he knows he stands in the wrong place, alone."

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat, echoed Reid. "If the Republicans want to stand by their president and his policy, they shouldn't run from this debate. If they believe we should send thousands of our young soldiers into the maws of this wretched civil war, they should at least have the courage to stand and defend their position," he said.

But Gregg differed with them. "We should not take action once soldiers have been sent into the field and are putting their lives at risk," he said. "We should not be saying to them through a resolution, which is nonbinding, that we don't think the mission you're on makes sense and we don't want you to do it."

Republican Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota sided with Democrats on the vote. Reid switched sides at the end, a step that allows him to call for a new roll call at his discretion. Otherwise, Democrats voted to go ahead with debate and Republicans voted not to; Sens. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., Mary Landrieu, D-La., Mel Martinez, R-Fla., and John McCain, R-Ariz., did not vote.

The war has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 U.S. military personnel so far, and costs are counted in the hundreds of billions of dollars. The administration has asked Congress for $245 billion more to cover the costs of the conflict through 2008.

Political maneuvering surrounding the issue has been intense, and White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said the administration supports "Sen. McConnell's and the Republicans' right to be able to offer the amendments they want to offer."

Behind the procedural quarrel lay uncertainty about the verdict the Senate would ultimately reach on Bush's decision to send 21,500 additional troops.

Democrats hoped to gain enough Republican votes to pass the measure expressing disagreement with Bush's decision, and to send the commander in chief an extraordinary wartime rebuke on a bipartisan vote.

It was an outcome that the White House and Senate Republican leadership hoped to avoid. They concentrated on a relatively small number of swing votes, many of them belonging to GOP senators expected to be on the ballot in 2008.

Gregg's alternative said Congress should not take "any action that will endanger United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds for troops in the field, as such an action with respect to funding would undermine their safety or harm their effectiveness in pursuing their assigned missions."

The measure advanced by Democrats and Warner said the same thing, but it also said the Senate "disagrees with the `plan' to augment our forces by 21,500 and urges the president instead to consider all options and alternatives."

Republicans and Democrats carried out their clash as 10 members of "Code Pink," an anti-war group, were arrested and charged with disorderly conduct during a protest in front of McCain's office in a building across the street from the Capitol. "They were absolutely compliant, peaceful," Sgt. Kimberly Schneider said of the protesters.

McCain, a likely Republican presidential candidate, opposes the measure expressing disagreement with the increase in troops.

Vote On Iraq Is Blocked By GOP (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Republicans blocked the Senate from delivering a politically embarrassing rebuke of President Bush's Iraq policy Monday in a maneuver that could have implications for the conduct of the war and for next year's elections.

DOJ_NMG_0128110

Both parties immediately moved to gain political advantage from the impasse.

SENATE ROLL CALL: How they voted

Democrats said Republicans are trying to muzzle growing public opposition to the war in Iraq. "They are not permitting debate on the most pressing issue facing America," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Republicans accused Democrats of trying to unfairly limit the debate on Iraq by refusing to agree on certain ground rules. "We're not trying to stop this debate," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "We're trying to structure it in a way that's fair to competing voices."

The high political stakes were evident in hours of negotiations over three non-binding but politically significant resolutions:

• One opposes the president's plan to increase troop numbers in Iraq.

• A second offers qualified support for the increase.

• A third opposes cutting funds for troops.

Democrats needed 60 votes to begin debating the resolution opposing the troop increase but could muster only 49. All three Republican co-sponsors of the resolution opposed it in the 49-47 vote. The only Republicans voting for that resolution were Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Susan Collins of Maine, both of whom face potentially difficult re-election bids next year.

McConnell said he's willing to allow a vote on that resolution provided he wins two concessions: a requirement that it get 60 votes to pass, and a vote on the resolution opposing cuts in funding for troops. That resolution is sponsored by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H.

Reid objected because McConnell's demands set up the possibility that the Senate would have been on record as opposing cuts in funding for the troops, but not the president's policy.

That would "divert attention" from a Senate vote on the troop buildup, Reid said.

Democrats want to keep the focus on Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 "to demonstrate to him that his policy has little or no support," Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., said.

Supporters of Bush's plan said a Senate vote against it could undercut America's last chance for preventing a catastrophic implosion in Iraq. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who calls himself an "independent Democrat," sided with Republicans to forestall debate on the resolution of disapproval. "Its passage would compromise America's security," he said.

Reid vowed that Democrats will find other ways to oppose the president's policies. "You can run, but you can't hide," he said. "We are going to debate Iraq."

Sens. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., Mary Landrieu, D-La., Mel Martinez, R-Fla., and John McCain, R-Ariz., did not vote.

G.O.P. Senators Thwart Debate On Iraq Policy (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — Republicans on Monday blocked Senate debate on a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, leaving in doubt whether the Senate would render a judgment on what lawmakers of both parties described as the paramount issue of the day.

The decision short-circuited what had been building as the first major Congressional challenge to President Bush over his handling of the war since Democrats took control of Congress last month, and left each party blaming the other for frustrating debate on a topic that is likely to influence the 2008 presidential and Congressional races.

At issue is a compromise resolution drawn up chiefly by Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, that says the Senate disagrees with President Bush's plan to build up troops and calls for American forces to be kept out of sectarian violence in Iraq.

The deadlock came after Democrats refused a proposal by Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, that would have cleared the way for a floor fight on the Warner resolution in return for votes on two competing Republican alternatives that were more supportive of the president.

DOJ_NMG_0128111

One of those alternatives, by Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, would declare that Congress should not cut off any funds for forces in the field. That vote was seen as problematic for Democrats because many of them opposed any move to curtail spending, raising the prospect that it could have attracted the broadest support in the Senate.

The procedural vote, which divided mostly along party lines, left the Democratic leadership 11 votes short of the 60 needed to begin debate on the bipartisan resolution. Forty-seven Democrats and two Republicans voted to open debate on the resolution; 45 Republicans and one independent were opposed.

The Republicans run a risk with their resistance in the event Democrats are able to persuade the public that Mr. Bush's allies are stonewalling in the Senate and shielding the president from criticism over an unpopular war. But their show of unity, with war critics including Mr. Warner of Virginia and Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska, siding with the leadership, lent some credibility to Republican claims that Democrats were being unfair. "I am confident that somehow this matter will be worked out," Mr. Warner said.

But Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, said that "time was tenuous" and that he would not guarantee that Democrats would try again to bring up the resolution. He did promise that there would be more clashes over Iraq policy as the Senate turned to measures like the president's request for $100 billion in emergency Iraq spending.

"You can run but you can't hide," Mr. Reid told his Republican colleagues on the floor. "We are going to debate Iraq."

The results left the future of the Iraq fight unsettled, though Senate leaders indicated that they would continue to negotiate over ways to restart the debate. Lawmakers on all sides of the issue said they anticipated that the Senate would ultimately approve a resolution of some kind because of intense public interest in the issue. Mr. Reid changed his vote and sided with Republicans at the end, a procedural move to allow him the option to reopen the issue.

Still, as they jousted over the terms of debate, senators provided a taste of what a floor fight over the resolution would look like as they traded tough words about the meaning of a resolution challenging Mr. Bush and what would happen if Congress remained silent.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, the independent who sided with Republicans in agreeing not to take up the resolution, called the proposal "a resolution of irresolution," saying it criticized the president's plan but did nothing concrete to stop it. He goaded colleagues who opposed the buildup to take more definitive action if that was their view. "Have the courage of your convictions to accept the consequences of your convictions," he said.

Senator Ben Nelson of Nebraska, a Democratic co-author of the resolution who typically promotes comity in the Senate, accused Republicans of stalling. "If not now, when?" he said. "If not now, do we wait for more troops to die before we oppose the president's plan?"

In addition to the resolution introduced by Mr. Gregg, declaring that Congress should not cut off financing for forces in Iraq, Republican leaders had sought a Democratic commitment for a vote on another alternative, one introduced by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona. That measure would set 11 conditions for the Iraqi government if it wanted to retain American support. The Republican approach would need 60 votes for passage.

Democrats said that the Gregg initiative was meant as a distraction and that they wanted to focus on the question of whether senators supported Mr. Bush's plan or opposed it. "We are witnessing the spectacle of a White House and Republican senators unwilling even to engage in a debate on a war that claims at least one American life every day and at least $2.5 billion dollars a week," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat.

Some Republicans admitted that they were unsure how long the unity would last and whether Republicans could continue to make a case against the resolution on procedural grounds. And two Republicans facing re-election in 2008, Senators Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, joined Democrats in voting to begin the debate.

Democrats tried to immediately pounce on the vote, with Mr. Reid saying Republicans had given Mr. Bush the green light to begin his buildup. They also warned of political consequences for Republicans given public frustration with the war.

"Senator McConnell led his Republican troops off the cliff," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0128112

The White House welcomed the Senate vote. “All sides have a right to be heard in this debate, and we support Senator McConnell’s and the Republicans’ right to be able to offer the amendments they want to offer,” said a spokeswoman, Dana Perino.

Senator John Sununu, a Republican of New Hampshire who is also up for re-election next year, acknowledged that voters were likely to be unhappy with the procedural wrangling over an issue as grave as Iraq.

Mr. Sununu, who sided with Republicans, but declined to say whether he would ultimately vote to oppose the Iraq plan, said, “It may come as a surprise to my colleagues, but most voting members of the American public think that the Senate spends all too much time talking and not enough time casting votes.”

GOP Stalls Debate On Troop Increase (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

A long-awaited Senate showdown on the war in Iraq was shut down before it even started yesterday, when nearly all Republicans voted to stop the Senate from considering a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 additional combat troops into battle.

A day of posturing, finger-pointing and backroom wrangling came to nothing when Democratic and Republican leaders could not reach agreement on which nonbinding resolutions would be debated and allowed to come to a vote. The Senate's 49 to 47 vote last night to proceed to debate on Bush's new war policy fell 11 votes short of the 60 needed to break the logjam. Just two Republicans, Norm Coleman (Minn.) and Susan Collins (Maine), voted with the Democrats to proceed with the debate. Both are considered among the most vulnerable senators standing for reelection in 2008.

Republicans insisted that the impasse will soon be broken. But the leaders of the two parties appeared to be far from a compromise last night, and the White House has worked hard to block action on a resolution disapproving of the president's decision to boost troop levels.

"What you just saw was Republicans giving the president the green light to escalate in Iraq," Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said after the vote. Reid contended that Republicans "are trying to avoid a debate on this matter."

Republicans said they have no desire to avoid a debate, asserting that they simply want a fair hearing on their proposals.

"We are ready and anxious to have this debate this week," said Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.).

Reid and McConnell were expected to resume negotiations today after conferring with lawmakers. With the tremendous national interest and media buildup to this week's confrontation, it would be extraordinary if the two sides did not reach an agreement on ground rules. But regardless of the outcome of the talks, Congress is certain to be consumed with Iraq in the months ahead.

A huge budget bill for the remainder of the current fiscal year comes before the Senate tomorrow, and Reid promised war amendments to that debate. Bush has requested $245 billion in funding for the war, to cover this year and next year, and that legislation is certain to become a magnet for Iraq concerns.

Next week, the Democratic-led House is expected to move forward with its version of the nonbinding resolutions stuck in the Senate.

"You can run, but you can't hide," Reid said. "We are going to debate Iraq."

At issue are four separate measures. The main resolution, worked out by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), would put the Senate on record as opposing the additional troop deployment while calling for a diplomatic initiative to settle the conflict. It would oppose a cutoff of funds for troops in the field of battle.

The Republican leadership's alternative, drafted by John McCain (R-Ariz.), Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), would establish tough new benchmarks for the Iraqi government to achieve but would not oppose the planned deployment.

Two other versions appear at the heart of the impasse. The first, drafted by Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), would staunchly back the White House and the president's decision to boost troop strength in Iraq. It recognizes the power of the president to deploy troops and the "responsibility" of Congress to fund them -- before stating that "Congress should not take any action that will endanger United States military forces in the field, including the elimination or reduction of funds."

DOJ_NMG_0128113

The other proposed resolution, hastily written by Democrats, would simply oppose Bush's plan and insist that all troops are properly protected with body armor and other material.

Gregg appeared to struggle to define the purpose of his proposal, insisting at one point that it is vital to protecting U.S. troops but then acknowledging that none of the resolutions under consideration would have any impact. He added that he may offer his language in binding legislative form during the upcoming debate on war spending.

The Democratic leadership gave Republicans a choice: Allow all four versions to come to a vote, with a simple majority needed for passing any of them, or debate and vote on the Warner and McCain resolutions, with both needing 60 votes to pass.

McConnell wanted all four resolutions to meet a 60-vote threshold, for a simple reason: Both Democrats and Republicans think the only measure that could attract 60 votes is Gregg's, because Democrats would be concerned about the political ramifications of appearing to take action that might harm troops in battle.

"If Republicans cannot swallow the thin soup of the Warner resolution, how are they going to stomach a real debate on Iraq?" asked Senate Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.).

Republicans struck a less combative tone. Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (Miss.) dismissed Democratic charges as "a bunch of show and tell," and McConnell called the dispute nothing more than "a bump in the road."

The White House worked closely with Senate Republican leaders on strategy while conducting an aggressive outreach that involved assurances from military leaders to wary GOP senators, in addition to personal interventions by Bush.

On Friday, Republican senators met with Bush on a variety of issues, including Iraq. The president walked the lawmakers through his reasoning for the troop increase and asked for their support.

"He wanted us to clearly understand this was not just, he woke up on Thursday and decided this is what he was going to do," said Sen. Lisa Murkowski (Alaska), who has been critical of the escalation but is undecided on the resolutions. Murkowski also met with Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new U.S. commander in Iraq.

The White House gave a measured response to yesterday's vote. "All sides have a right to be heard in this debate, and we support Senator McConnell's and the Republicans' right to be able to offer the amendments they want to offer," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

Sen. John Cornyn, a Texas Republican who helped to rally his colleagues against moving ahead, said the vote was partly symbolic. "This is more of the principle that we're going to be a relevant minority and assert our rights to a fair process," he said. "They were either going to establish that they could roll us or that we'd be relevant in the process."

But Democrats believe Republicans may be losing politically, by defying what they perceive as a growing public desire for a robust war debate. Some Democratic senators were surprised that two Republican allies of Warner -- Collins and Coleman -- parted ways with their caucus and with Warner himself on the procedural vote.

After the vote, Collins issued a statement saying: "Since I returned from my third visit to Iraq in December, I have been convinced that it would be a mistake to send additional troops to Iraq. I believe that this is one of the most important issues facing our nation and that it is important for the Senate to go on record in opposition to the president's plan."

Collins continued: "It is my hope that the leadership will soon work out an agreement that will allow us to have a vote as soon as possible."

According to one senior Democratic aide, Reid left the Capitol last night confident that he is holding a winning hand. Negotiations between party leaders are expected to continue today, and Reid promised that the Senate will return to Iraq over and over until Democrats get a clean vote.

"Today, Senator McConnell led his Republican troops off a cliff," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the primary architect of the Democrats' takeover of the Senate in November.

Senate GOP Blocks Iraq Resolution (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0128114

Senate Republicans yesterday blocked a resolution that would have condemned President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

On a 49-47 vote that largely followed partisan lines, Democrats fell 11 "ayes" short of the 60 needed to bring about a vote on the resolution, which is nonbinding but is widely viewed as a declaration of no confidence in the continued mission of the Iraq war and Mr. Bush's handling of it.

Among those who voted against last night's motion was Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, who wrote the resolution but joined other Republicans in opposition to holding a vote because the new Democratic majority is not allowing votes on other war resolutions.

Only two Republicans -- Sens. Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota -- backed voting on the resolution, and there was opposition from only two members of the Democratic caucus -- independent Joe Lieberman of Connecticut and, in a parliamentary maneuver that gives him the right to bring the resolution back up for debate, Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

Mr. Lieberman voted "no" because, he said, the resolution is meaningless.

"This resolution is not about Congress taking responsibility," said Mr. Lieberman, who was among the broad, bipartisan majority in Congress who in 2002 voted to go to war. "It is the opposite. It is a resolution of irresolution."

Before and after the vote, Democrats accused Republicans of trying to dodge a debate on the increasingly unpopular war.

"You can run, but you can't hide," declared Mr. Reid, a 2002 war supporter. "We are going to debate Iraq."

He promised that the resolution would resurface again during debates and votes on other matters.

Last night's "cloture motion," which Democrats supported, was a parliamentary procedure to end debate so that a final vote can be taken. Republicans accused Mr. Reid of restricting debate on the Iraq war.

"Senate Republicans are ready to proceed with a full and open debate on the president's strategy in Iraq," Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican, said after the vote. "But we want a full debate on all the various resolutions, not just one that was handpicked by the Democratic leadership."

Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky said Republicans will not allow a vote on the Warner resolution unless it is accompanied by at least two others.

Sen. Judd Gregg of New Hampshire has a resolution that promises not to cut funding for the war. Sen. John McCain also has a resolution in support of Mr. Bush's "surge" plan, but also setting benchmarks for Iraqi self-governance.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, called Mr. Reid's squelching of resolutions "an effort to short-circuit debate."

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, said a vote on cutting funds is not necessary.

"We don't want to withhold funds from the troops in the field," he said, referring to nonbinding resolution. "We want to change this policy."

But even as the rhetoric over the resolution escalated yesterday, there was agreement from all sides that the nonbinding resolution bore no legal consequences. While it condemns Mr. Bush's plan to increase troop levels, it doesn't withhold any money for doing so.

"The resolution before us, its sponsors concede, will not stop the new strategy from going forward," Mr. Lieberman said. "Instead, its sponsors say it will send a message of rebuke from the Senate to the president, from one end of Pennsylvania Avenue to the other. But there is a world beyond Pennsylvania Avenue that is watching and listening."

Sen. Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, said the resolution was all "sound and fury ..."

"Signifying nothing," interrupted Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, who was among the 23 senators who voted against war in 2002.

But, Mr. Lieberman warned yesterday, the nonbinding resolution could have far-reaching implications abroad.

"For the Senate to take up a symbolic vote of no confidence on the eve of a decisive battle is unprecedented, but it is not inconsequential," he said. "It is an act which I fear will discourage our troops, hearten our enemies and showcase our disunity."

Mr. Lieberman chided the Democrats with whom he still caucuses for pushing a toothless resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0128115

"If you believe that this new strategy is flawed or that our cause is hopeless in Iraq, then you should vote to stop it," he said. "Vote to cut off funds. Vote for a binding timeline for American withdrawal. If that is where your convictions lie, then have the courage of your convictions to accept the consequences of your convictions. That would be a resolution."

Four senators did not vote -- Republicans Mr. McCain and Mel Martinez of Florida and Democrats Tim Johnson of South Dakota and Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana.

Senate Debate On Iraq Stalls (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - Republicans blocked the Senate from beginning debate Monday on the Iraq war, a move that's expected to delay but not prevent a vote on a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's planned buildup of 21,500 troops.

The 49-47 procedural vote fell well short of the 60 votes that the Democrats needed to move to debate under Senate rules.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said Republicans were prepared to begin debate this week if Democrats agreed to allow debate on a proposal by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H. His resolution takes no position on the troop buildup but rejects the notion of cutting off money for ground operations. "There's not a single Republican senator seeking to avoid this debate," McConnell said.

Democrats shot back that they'll go beyond nonbinding resolutions against the troop buildup in the months ahead, including efforts to attach strings to war appropriations.

"You can run but you can't hide," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "They can maybe stop us temporarily from debating the escalation. They're not going to stop us from debating Iraq."

Democratic leaders had hoped to confine debate this week to two measures, one a bipartisan resolution to oppose the buildup led by Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich., the other a resolution by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., that supports the president.

Republicans say Democrats are afraid that many in their own caucus would sign on to Gregg's plan. Such a vote might reveal Democrats' divisions over the idea of cutting off money for troops. It also might be the only resolution that can pass, if the Warner-Levin plan falls short of the 60-vote threshold needed to avoid a filibuster.

Democrats accused Republicans of teaming up with the White House to derail a debate that could embarrass the administration. They said the purpose of Gregg's plan was to muddy the waters and predicted that Republicans would keep making additional demands if they won on this one.

"Iraq dominates our national life. It's on the mind of tens of millions of Americans," said Joseph Biden, D-Del., the Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman. Not voting on what course to pursue "would be a total forfeiture of our responsibility," he said.

Senate Republican Whip Trent Lott of Mississippi said, "This is all show and tell about nothing, because it's not binding. Let's stop questioning each other's motives. Let's work this out. This is all a whole lot of sound and fury signifying nothing, because the real debate will come on the supplemental or future appropriations" legislation.

The showdown over war powers came as a budget deadline approaches that also could force the war debate to be postponed. The Senate must pass a continuing budget resolution by Feb. 15 to avoid a federal government shutdown, because Republicans failed last year to pass spending bills for the current fiscal year.

While leaders were confident that a shutdown would be averted, they acknowledged that they'd probably need to put aside the war debate if it spills into next week. The week after that, Congress is in recess for Presidents Day.

Senate Majority Whip Richard Durbin, D-Ill., accused McConnell of trying to run out the clock until March.

"Senator McConnell is not new to the Senate," Durbin said. "If he can delay this matter for three days or four days, we'll reach a point where we can't reach it before the presidential break recess. That's their strategy."

McClatchy Newspapers correspondent Renee Schoof contributed to this report.

Democrats To Launch PR Blitz On Iraq Vote (RC)

By John Stanton

DOJ_NMG_0128116

Roll Call, February 6, 2007

Following Republicans' successful filibuster of a resolution opposing President Bush's handling of the Iraq War, Senate Democrats are launching a national public relations campaign aimed at tying GOP moderates and incumbents facing difficult 2008 re-election races to Bush in the public's mind, Democratic leadership aides said Monday.

As expected, Reid failed Monday to overcome the GOP filibuster. However, the final vote was something of a surprise, with 49 Members — including GOP Sens. Susan Collins (Maine) and Norm Coleman (Minn.) — voting to begin debate. Sen. Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) joined 46 Republicans in filibustering the bill.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said a vote against beginning debate was a "green light to George Bush to continue down the same failed course. A no vote is an endorsement of escalation. ... We must heed the results of the November elections and the wishes of the American people. We must change course. That starts with this next vote."

With neither Reid nor Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) inclined to give in on the issue, the Senate likely will remain at a standstill at least until Wednesday when Reid has said he will take up a continuing resolution to fund the government through fiscal 2007.

The defections of Collins and Coleman could represent a major setback for McConnell, who, just a few hours before, had confidently predicted at a press conference that all 49 Republicans would vote to block the debate. A Democratic aide said Democrats had not targeted either lawmaker prior to the vote, adding, "We're not going to now, either."

Hoping to increase defections, a senior leadership aide said Reid is closely coordinating his counteroffensive with other national leaders and Democratic Party organs, including Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the Democratic National Committee, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and the 50 state-party chairmen.

Specifically, this aide said, Democrats will look to cast the filibuster not only as a blocking tactic against debating the Iraq War, but also as an endorsement of Bush's policies.

Reid lambasted Republicans following the vote Monday evening, arguing that "the minority can't rubber-stamp the White House so they've decided to stamp out debate," while DSCC Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) warned that "Sen. McConnell today led his troops off a cliff ... it was lack of debate that got us in to this huge mess."

Likewise, Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) warned that "these [GOP] Senators will have to answer for their votes." Democrats will target both the 20 Members up for re-election in 2008 as well as Republicans like Sen. Olympia Snowe (Maine) who has backed a resolution opposing the troop "surge" proposal but who voted to filibuster the start of the debate, Democrats said.

A Senate Democratic aide said Pelosi has arranged to have Members use their one-minute morning speeches today to criticize Republican opposition to the resolution, and that Reid and the DSCC will be working with Democratic Party leaders in states of vulnerable Republican incumbents.

Additionally, leaders in the Senate are pushing their members to "amplify the issue" by doing radio and television interviews in their home states, while Reid and other leaders are working with the party's network of independent blogs, one source said.

And, although neither Reid's operation nor the DSCC is planning to delve into the paid media world at this point, one source noted that the activist group VoteVets ran an ad opposing the war during the Super Bowl and that MoveOn.org also is expected to play a role in the debate.

The Upshot Of The Debate: No Debate (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

Perhaps too much was expected of an organization that began its "Morning Business" yesterday at 2 in the afternoon.

Still, the U.S. Senate set a new standard for procrastination last night when lawmakers decided, after nearly four years of war in Iraq, that they were not quite ready to have a debate about the conflict. Among those who voted against having this modest discussion was Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), the sponsor of the resolution that was to be debated.

Like arms negotiators in years past bickering about the shape of the table, the senators dedicated themselves to fighting about the terms of the debate. They spent the better part of an hour just quibbling over the speaking order.

DOJ_NMG_0128117

"I'd like to inquire: At what point can other senators speak?" Warner queried.

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) asked that "I have 10 minutes to be followed by the time that Senator Byrd has."

But Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) wanted to give an hour-long speech before Lott spoke.

"You want the full hour in one block?" asked the presiding officer, Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.).

"Of course!" Byrd shot back. "An hour is an hour."

Laughter rippled through the gallery. Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.) smiled. "If I could suggest, to speed this up, instead of taking the five minutes Senator Durbin was going to yield to me, I would defer to let Senator Lott speak for five minutes," he offered.

The matter was resolved. Byrd took the floor and spoke for 44 minutes -- about coal mining.

Those waiting for the much-anticipated Iraq debate in the Senate will have to wait a while longer. Republican leaders, eager to avoid a public airing of views on the unpopular war, raised procedural objections. Democratic leaders, figuring that public pressure would force Republicans to capitulate, refused to meet their demand that all resolutions on the Iraq war get 60 votes to pass. And each side got tangled up in talking points as it tried to blame the other for preventing a discussion.

"We are, in effect, being denied a fair process here for this extremely important debate," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) declared at a news conference in his office.

But this assertion of importance was quickly contradicted by McConnell's deputy, Lott, who was sitting next to him. "We're going to produce, if anything, a nonbinding resolution that has no force in fact," he said.

McConnell took his act to the Senate floor, where Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was wielding a 30-inch pointing stick, with which he had been jabbing a poster. When he spied McConnell, Reid began to thrust the pointer in the direction of the minority leader.

"Is there anyone who believes the Senate should remain silent on the most pressing issue facing the country today?" Reid demanded. "Unfortunately, Mr. President, the answer is 'yes.' According to the Republican leader, all Republican senators will vote not to proceed."

McConnell parried Reid's thrust. "Make no mistake about it," he said. "This vote at 5 o'clock" -- the one that scuttled the Iraq debate -- "doesn't have anything whatsoever to do with scuttling the Iraq debate. We welcome the debate. . . . But the minority will insist on fair treatment."

"Fairness?" Reid sputtered. "You start throwing the 60-vote number around when you have something to hide or stall." Reid knew that, because he has thrown the 60-vote number around to block some of President Bush's judicial nominees.

The Reid tirade temporarily got McConnell off his talking points. "Let me just say there are many members on my side who would argue that we shouldn't be having this debate this week at all," he admitted. "I hope none of those watching this on C-SPAN or any people up in the gallery are confused."

Why would anybody be confused?

It was already tense in the chamber, but Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) hadn't had his turn yet. "If the Republicans in the Senate cannot swallow the thin soup of the Warner resolution, how will they ever stomach a real debate on the war in Iraq?" he taunted.

Republican leaders were having some trouble with such questions, so Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), sponsor of an Iraq resolution celebrating the troops, called a news conference. "I think we ought to have a debate," he said, "but I'm not sure we should be passing resolutions with no impact." Gregg could not explain why he made an exception for his own nonbinding resolution.

Out on the Senate floor, Warner was similarly tangled. "No matter how strongly I feel about my resolution, I shall vote with my leader," he announced, explaining why he was opposing debate on his own legislation.

A few lawmakers took the novel tack of addressing the merits of the resolutions themselves. Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), the only member of the Democratic caucus to side with Republicans, said the Warner resolution, which objects to Bush's troop increase in Iraq, would "hearten our enemies." Quoting Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg, Lieberman argued passionately that "what we say here is heard . . . by al-Qaeda terrorists eager for evidence that America's will is breaking."

But the argument quickly turned back to the debate about the debate. "They are trying to avoid a debate on this matter," charged Reid.

DOJ_NMG_0128118

"The Republican side of the aisle is ready for this debate," vowed McConnell.

Minutes later, all but two Republicans voted against allowing the debate. And, as the hour approached 6 p.m., the Senate returned to morning business. "I'd like to speak about two issues that have been in the news lately," announced Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa). "The tax gap and the minimum-wage bill."

President Bush Sends $2.9 Trillion Spending Plan To Congress; Giuliani Takes One More Step Toward Presidential Run (CNN)

CNN THE SITUATION ROOM, February 6, 2007

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: And happening right now, what can you get for a few trillion dollars?

President Bush has his wish list. He sent it to Congress. His $2.9 trillion spending plan covering items like tax cuts and health insurance. But it's getting a chilly reception from some in Congress, with one Democrat saying it's "filled with debt and deception." The budget also requests billions more for the war in Iraq.

But money and the military might have not yet been able to stop Iraq from exploding with violence. Right now, Iraqi and U.S. military officials are stepping up their plan to try to stop that bloodshed, at least in Baghdad.

And an explorer takes yet another step toward a presidential run. Rudy Giuliani -- we're going to tell you just what he's doing right now.

I'm Wolf Blitzer.

You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

$2.9 trillion from you, with Congress' approval, of course. Today, the president unveiled his $2.9 trillion spending plan for the fiscal year 2008. It covers spending on items like health care, education, tax cuts, the war -- money that would come from the pockets of American taxpayers.

We've measured this current budget against previous government budgets and even when adjusted for the value of the dollar in the year 2000, it's the biggest budget request ever.

By comparison, in 1978, the government spent just over $1 trillion. In 1988, it spent over $1.4 trillion, and in 1998, the government spent over $1.7 trillion. Again, those dollars adjusted for the year 2000.

Joining us now for more on this presidential budget request, our White House correspondent, Suzanne Malveaux -- Suzanne.

SUZANNE MALVEAUX, CNN WHITE HOUSE CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, as you mentioned, of course, this is our money that the government is talking about spending. And it really is hard to imagine what this figure means. But if you crunch all the numbers today looking at the budget, there is really one number that stands out, and that is $800 billion, the total estimated cost of the wars in Afghanistan as well as Iraq. It will reach that level within two years or so.

Now, today, we've heard from the president. He justified the cost of the war, saying, indeed, that the country can afford these increases while, at the same time, balancing the budget.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Today we submitted a budget to the United States Congress which shows we can balancing the budget in five years without raising taxes. Our economy is strong because of good policy and because the entrepreneurial spirit is strong. By keeping taxes down, we actually generate strong revenues to the treasury.

And I appreciate Director Portman helping us devise a plan that sets priorities and, at the same time emphasizes fiscal restraint.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

MALVEAUX: Now, how is he going to do all of this, Wolf?

Well, the president, as well as his top economic advisers, laying out a plan here, saying that what they're going to do is really look for savings in the tune of $95 billion over the next five years or so. They are going to together more than 140 government programs to either reduce or eliminate and they are also going to together Medicaid and Medicare.

As you know, Wolf, this is a very controversial budget, a very controversial proposal and so far the Democrats have dismissed this. We know that this battle over the budget has really just begun -- Wolf.

DOJ_NMG_0128119

BLITZER: Some suggesting it's dead on arrival on Capitol Hill, but we'll see what happens in the course of the legislative process.

Suzanne, thank you.

Some members of Congress, as Suzanne says, are either skeptical or outright blasting the president's budget and its priorities.

The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, says she wants more details.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REP. NANCY PELOSI (D-CA), SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE: We'll have to take a look at what's in the budget, as we have discussed before. We'll put it to some scrutiny and see what it is. The day of the blank check for the president in the war is over.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: The Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, is not holding his tongue. Today he said -- and let me quote right now -- he said: "The budget uses deception to hide a massive increase in debt and its priorities are disconnected from the needs of middle class Americans." Meanwhile, there are new developments happening right now regarding a proposed resolution opposing President Bush's troop increase in Iraq.

Let's get the very latest from our Congressional correspondent, Dana Bash -- Dana, what is the latest?

DANA BASH, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, there is intense debate going on right now on the floor of the United States Senate on Iraq. But it's not on the substance of the war, it's not over the president's plan there. Instead, it's over process, whether and how specific Iraq resolutions are even going to come up for a vote.

Now, what's going on is Republican senators, even those who oppose the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq, have united in order to make it clear that they will not vote for that unless two other Republican measures are given votes by Democrats.

Now, Democrats are getting their first real taste of what it's like to be in the majority there, with a razor thin majority. Meanwhile, they are calling this obstructionism. Republicans say it's a matter of fairness.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. HARRY REID (D-NV), MAJORITY LEADER: Their actions aren't driven by getting votes on Republican proposals. They're not being driven by votes on Republican proposals. They're driven by a desire to provide political cover.

The minority can't rubber stamp the president's policies on Iraq anymore, so they've decided to stamp out debate and let the president's actions in Iraq proceed unchecked.

SEN. MITCH MCCONNELL (R-KY), MINORITY LEADER: This vote this afternoon should not be misunderstood. This is a fairness vote. This vote this afternoon is a vote to insist that the minority have a fair process in going forward to this very important debate.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BASH: Now, it sounds like a lot of parliamentary maneuvering. But, Wolf, as you know, in the Senate, politics equals process -- Wolf.

BLITZER: What's driving these Senate Republicans right now in this debate?

BASH: Well, what's driving them, the bottom line is they're trying to prevent an embarrassing vote that repudiates the president on the war. And here's how they're doing it. Take a look. There are three resolutions that are in play right now.

First of all, one that Democrats and some Republicans support, which says explicitly the Senate disagrees with this plan to send more troops to Iraq. There's one Republican measure that supports the plan, but says that there should be benchmarks for Iraqis and another Republican measure that makes clear that funding for troops won't be cut.

So what GOP leaders want is a 60 vote threshold on all three of those measures. What the -- what's at play there behind-the-scenes is that they are doing the math and they think, really, the only thing that would pass is something that senators are loathe to vote for, and that is a cut for -- for funding for -- cutting funding for troops in Iraq.

So Democrats are saying what Republicans are trying to do is demand a filibuster. And what they also say is that Republicans are simply trying to run out the clock because, Wolf, there's a limited amount of time that they can talk about this on the floor, because there's something else that's very important that's coming, and that is the Congress, the United States Senate, has to pass a resolution that continues to fund the government. That's left over from the last Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0128120

BLITZER: All right, the rules of the Senate pretty complex. We're not going to get into all of them.

Dana will be watching this story for us.

Dana Bash and Suzanne Malveaux are part of the best political team on television.

And remember, for the latest political news at any time, check out our Political Ticker at cnn.com/ticker.

Another week. Jack Cafferty standing by with The Cafferty File -- Jack, the rules in the Senate, as you well know, and a lot of our viewers know, they are mind numbing.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, this whole thing is just stupid. And I'm going to talk about it, I think, in the next hour. But in the meantime the American public made their feelings on this war pretty clear in November and these morons in the Congress so far seem to be tone deaf to what was registered at the ballot box a month or two ago.

John Edwards wants universal health care for every American, but to do it, he's calling for a tax increase. The Democratic presidential candidate is out with the first detailed health care plan offered up by a Democrat running for the White House.

Other candidates are expected to come out with their own ideas about to help solve the health care crisis in this country.

Edwards' plan, which does address the 47 million uninsured Americans, aims for universal health care coverage by 2012. It's a combination of things, his program, including requiring all businesses to provide insurance.

Edwards says he'd free up $120 billion a year to pay for his plan by abolishing President Bush's tax cuts for people who make more than $200,000 a year and by having the government collect more back taxes.

So the question is this -- can John Edwards be elected president by advocating raising taxes?

E-mail your thoughts on that to caffertyfile@cnn.com or go to cnn.com/caffertyfile.

It's all in the semantics, I suppose, Wolf, but canceling tax cuts for people who have been living with tax cuts is a tax increase for those people. So that's the way we worded it.

BLITZER: And he's about acknowledging that himself. And we're going to be speaking with him about this and the war in Iraq in the next hour here in THE SITUATION ROOM. He's down in North Carolina. But he'll be explaining his stands on all of these issues.

Thanks very much, Jack Cafferty.

Coming up, the man known as America's mayor takes another step toward running for the White House. We're going to tell you what Rudy Giuliani did today, in the past few hours. That's coming up.

Also, a very deadly day in Iraq following a horrific weekend of violence. Our Arwa Damon has a report from Baghdad. That's coming up next.

And much more on the battle in Congress over the war in Iraq. The number two Republican in the Senate, Trent Lott of Mississippi, he's standing by to join us live right here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: It's a badly needed boost that's coming not a moment too soon. The plan to secure Baghdad expected, expected to intensify in the coming days. U.S. military officials say they're ramping up their efforts to stop the killings and the chaos. A drumbeat of violence that unfortunately continues today.

CNN's Arwa Damon is in Baghdad with more -- Arwa.

ARWA DAMON, CNN INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, in the span of just five hours in the capital, Baghdad, more than two dozen Iraqis were killed, more than 100 wounded in a number of attacks, ranging from car bombs placed outside of automobile repair shops, car bombs once again placed on busy, crowded commercial streets and, disturbingly, even a car bomb placed near to a children's hospital.

Mortar attacks in a number of neighborhoods in the capital, some even landing next to Baghdad University. And small arms fire and drive-by shootings also targeting mainly Iraqi civilians.

All of this coming ATN is still trying to recovery from the weekend's devastating bombing, the single deadliest bombing to take place in the country since this war began, that killed over 120 Iraqis when a suicide truck bomber plowed into a busy central

DOJ_NMG_0128121

Baghdad marketplace. Many Iraqis amongst the civilian population and amongst the Iraqi government now increasingly critical of this new Baghdad security plan put forward by the Iraqi government, even criticizing the U.S. administration for not sending American troops to this capital faster -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Arwa Damon in Baghdad for us.

Arwa, thank you.

Meanwhile, in the race for 2008, one explorer takes yet another step in the direction of the White House. That would be Rudy Giuliani.

Today, the former mayor of New York filed a statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission. That, according to a Giuliani spokeswoman. Giuliani already has filed paperwork for an exploratory committee. He did that back in November.

Let's get some analysis now on what's going on from our senior political correspondent, Candy Crowley.

He filed the initial paperwork back in November. He didn't really do much immediately thereafter. But in the last two weeks, there's been a spurt of Giuliani activity. He's been to Iowa -- excuse me -- New Hampshire, South Carolina.

What's going on?

CANDY CROWLEY, SENIOR POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT: Well, you know, he is the master of the micro step, as you know. The mayor is pretty good at moving along at a very slow pace. And so what this does is it keeps us talking. I mean even the campaign itself says this is adjusting the paperwork.

What Giuliani has done is what everybody else has already done, which is mostly when you file your exploratory papers, you also file your statement of candidacy.

So what Giuliani is doing at this point is now keeping it -- catching up with the paperwork of the others, but he's also keeping his name out there. As you know, there have been a spate of stories about is he serious, is he not serious. And these now new stories say he's doing this and he's doing that. And so he's keeping his place on the page.

BLITZER: Let's take a look at some of the latest numbers, the poll numbers, involving Rudy Giuliani. In our most recent CNN/Opinion Research Corporation poll, just like a lot of other polls, national polls, registered Republicans, Giuliani comes out with 32 percent, John McCain at 26 percent. Everybody else in single digits.

But let's take a look at some other recent polls in Iowa, in New Hampshire, among registered Republicans. Giuliani in Iowa is ahead of McCain 27 to 22 percent; Newt Gingrich down at 16 percent. And in New Hampshire, in this ARG poll, McCain has got -- he's slightly ahead, 27 percent. Romney and Giuliani basically tied, both at 20 percent. Gingrich down at 11 percent.

It's very early in the process. Name recognition is always a key factor. But he does remarkably well, Rudy Giuliani, among these registered Republicans.

CROWLEY: He really does. And you wonder once he gets out there and they begin to look at his record exactly how these Republicans will feel. I don't think it's all that surprising that he would trail in New Hampshire, the one place where Giuliani seems to be trailing McCain, because McCain has a history of being very popular in New Hampshire. Obviously, he won that over George Bush in 2000.

So, I mean what's been happening here is that people like the Giuliani name. You know, it has a cachet. He was Mr. 9/11. He was the tough mayor of New York.

Now, here's the question. Are these social conservatives, most of whom vote in the primaries, going to take a gun who is pro-gun licensing, who is pro-choice, although he says he's personally against abortion, and who is pro-Gingrich?

I mean this is the huge question here.

But as you know, Wolf, in the end, what it all gets down to is who Republicans and, for that matter, who Democrats think is actually going to win. And if they believe Rudy Giuliani is the guy that's going to beat whoever the Democratic candidate is, that's who they'll go for.

BLITZER: He may be personally against abortion as an issue, but he's always supported a woman's right in the United States to have an abortion.

CROWLEY: Absolutely. Absolutely. And that's what he says. He's been down South explaining that presentation, trying to sort of draw the sting.

But obviously, South Carolina a really important primary. And that's where these social issues come to bear the most.

BLITZER: All right, Candy, we'll watch Rudy Giuliani and all of the other presidential candidates -- and there's a lot of them out there -- with you.

CROWLEY: There are.

BLITZER: Thank you.

Still ahead, we'll have much more on Rudy Giuliani. If he officially jumps in, will his past baggage actually hurt him?

James Carville and Terry Jeffrey -- they're standing by live for today's Strategy Session.

Plus, it's the trial that could rock the White House.

Will new audiotapes of "Scooter" Libby actually help or hurt his defense?

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Our Carol Costello is monitoring the wires. She's keeping an eye on all of the video feeds coming into THE SITUATION ROOM from around the world.

She's joining us now from New York with a closer look at some other important stories making news right now -- Carol, I understand that just within the past few minutes, there has been some developments on that kidnapping case out in Missouri.

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Yes, there was just a news conference held and prosecutors in St. Louis County, Missouri now have filed 71 more charges against kidnapping suspect Michael Devlin. They include kidnapping and forcible sodomy. He already faces kidnapping charges for allegedly abducting two young boys, Shawn Hornbeck and Ben Ownby, and has pleaded not guilty. Both youngsters were found and reunited with their families last month. Hornbeck had been missing four years.

Prosecutors, as I said, held a news conference just about an hour ago.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ROBERT MCCULLOCH, ST. LOUIS COUNTY PROSECUTOR: A little while ago, we filed a total of 71 counts against Michael Devlin. The first 18 counts involve one count of kidnapping and 17 counts of forcible sodomy relating to an abduction that occurred in January of this year.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Devlin could get life in prison if he is convicted.

The court-martial of an Army officer who refused to deploy to Iraq is underway at Fort Lewis, Washington. First Lieutenant Ehren Watada could get five years in jail if he's convicted. He says he refused to ship out because the Iraq War is illegal and immoral. An Army prosecutor says he betrayed his fellow soldiers. We'll have much more on this story in THE SITUATION ROOM in our 5:00 p.m. Eastern hour.

If you've been outside today, oh, man, is it cold, really cold. From the Northern Plains to the Northeast, a bone chilling Arctic blast has closed hundreds of schools. The mercury plunging to 38 below zero in Hallock, Minnesota. Whoo. And along with frigid temperatures, Upstate New York got two feet of snow. Amtrak had to shut down passenger train service in some areas.

Prosecutors have scored several victories in former White House aide Louis "Scooter" Libby's perjury and obstruction of justice trial. The judge says jurists can see newspaper articles on the fallout over the leaking of a CIA officer's identity. Despite defense objections, the judge also said grand jury tapes of Libby testifying about when he learned of Valerie Plame's identity will be made public after the jury hears them. Prosecutors could wrap up their case tomorrow.

Take a look at the headlines right now -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, we're going to watch this week. It's an important week in that trial.

Thank you, Carol.

Our Internet reporter, Abbi Tatton, is standing by.

She's got some more details on the audiotapes of "Scooter" Libby's grand jury testimony -- Abbi.

ABBI TATTON, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, the jury in this trial has just started listening to those audiotapes just in the last hour following this morning's ruling. And they haven't been released to the public just yet. They will be.

Right now, it's the bloggers who have been credentialed for this trial who are rapidly, on their Web sites, trying to keep up of just what the jury is hearing.

After the jury has heard what could be several hours, up to eight hours of this grand jury testimony recordings, they will be available for download on this, the Web site of the office of the special counsel. And this is where we've been seeing all kinds of trial exhibits appearing, from documents to video, as well. And this is where we are going to be seeing those audiotapes posted after the jury is through hearing them -- Wolf.

BLITZER: All right, we'll be watching together with you.

Thank you.

Up next, the Republicans' number two man in the United States Senate, Trent Lott.

What does he think about the president's plan to send more forces into Iraq.

And as the Senate debates a resolution on Iraq, what's the GOP's strategy?

Senator Trent Lott standing by live to join us next in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Also, the Rudy Giuliani factor.

Is he running for the White House? And how does a moderate Republican from the Northeast win the hearts and minds of conservative GOP voters?

That's coming up in our Strategy Session.

We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Happening right now, Rudy Giuliani takes a key step toward a run for the White House. The former New York mayor filed a statement of candidacy, as it's called, with the Federal Election Commission just a little while ago. But he could face conservative opposition over his pro-abortion and gay rights stands.

Britain tells its citizens don't panic. The country's largest poultry producer is destroying thousands of turkeys to stop Europe's biggest outbreak yet of the deadly bird flu virus.

And tough words from Arnold Schwarzenegger. In a newly released audio -- set of audiotapes, the California governor calls the Democratic assembly speaker a passionless political operator. He also suggests Republican lawmakers were unrealistic about past pushing through a public works package.

I'm Wolf Blitzer. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

Let's get some more now on one of our top stories, a Senate resolution opposing President Bush's troop increase plan for Iraq.

Joining us now from Capitol Hill is the Senate minority whip, the number two Republican in the Senate, Trent Lott of Mississippi.

Senator, thanks very much for coming in.

SEN. TRENT LOTT (R-MS), MINORITY WHIP: Glad to be with you, Wolf.

BLITZER: I know you have concerns about this troop increase going forward in Iraq. But I just want you to spell out what your concerns are.

LOTT: The vote this afternoon in the Senate is just a procedural vote that will set up a process that determines how we go forward and have a full debate on this issue. And hopefully we'll have a series of votes, three or four votes, on different options, because different senators have different ideas about how we should go into the future.

Here's my concern.

First of all, these are non-binding resolutions so they don't mean anything. When we get through, we will not have bound anybody to do anything.

BLITZER: They may not mean anything, Senator, but they do send a powerful message to constituents.

And, as you know, there are 20 Republican senators who are up for reelection in 2008. And a lot of them really don't want to be on the record voting on one of these resolutions, the so-called Levin-Warner, or Warner-Levin, resolution, which opposes a troop increase.

DOJ_NMG_0128124

LOTT: It also sends messages to our allies around the world and our enemies about what the United States is prepared to do here.

I have some concerns about how we're going to go forward. But here is the point. We have to change the status quo in Iraq. We can't just summarily pull out. Nobody wants that. We have to support our troops that are there or are headed there. I think, broadly, people support that.

Then, the question is: What do we do? You know, the president has a proposal, a plan. Maybe it's not, you know, a perfect plan. I don't deny that. But he -- he has made some recommendations. And we should look at that. I think we should give it a chance.

I realize it's -- it's a leap to expect things to really turn around there. But we have to move forward in a positive way. And I think this is the beginning of that process.

BLITZER: Is it -- is it -- the bottom -- the bottom line is this. Given the -- the arcane, very complex procedures in the United States Senate, what you're trying to do -- and correct me if I'm wrong -- is to avoid a formal vote, up-or-down vote, on the -- on the Warner-Levin resolution, which opposes this so-called surge the president has put forward?

LOTT: In the Senate, rightly or wrongly, over the years, it takes 60 votes out of 100, not 50, to take an action, because any one senator can stand up and say: I don't agree with this, and I'm going to filibuster it.

Then, you have to get 60 votes to cut off that senator or group of senators. So, that is the process that is under way. What will the votes be on? And, of course, any of them would probably have to have 60 votes, unless there was prior unanimous consent agreement not to do that. But it all gets too procedural.

BLITZER: Because I -- because, yesterday, when I spoke to Democratic Senator Dianne Feinstein, she -- she basically says, you're -- this is obstructor-ism. You're -- you're -- you're preventing the Senate from doing what everybody does in schools and neighborhoods around the country. They debate whether or not this policy the president has put forward is good or bad.

LOTT: Does anybody believe that we're not ready to have a full debate on this you, that you would oppose having a full debate?

The question is, what do you vote on at the end of the debate? We can work this out. And we should work it out. And I assume we will. We are going to have a debate, sooner or later, on this subject, probably more than once. So, the idea that we're trying to delay or obstruct a debate is just not credible.

The -- we do need to get an understanding of what the votes are going to be on. I think a lot of senators want to vote, showing their support for funds or the troops. I think that would have an overwhelming vote. And that is one of the things we have got to make sure we have an opportunity to vote on. BLITZER: So, what you're basically saying is, the Democrats could have their votes, as long as all the resolutions that are out there -- there are three major resolutions -- that all of them are allowed to come up for a vote?

LOTT: Well, as a matter of fact, Mitch McConnell has even agreed to a reduction.

Now, actually, we had some other senators that had some resolutions that had some good aspects to them. We had at least four or five. He has agreed to back that down to three.

Now, if the Democrats want to say, well, we want some balance, we want to add another one, maybe you could do that, too.

But I think that -- that, once again, this is a lot of sound and fury, signifying nothing. We will get some sort of agreement how to proceed, and we will have a full debate.

BLITZER: Do you have all 49 Republicans united on this procedural...

LOTT: Republicans...

BLITZER: ... issue?

LOTT: Republicans united against a procedure that's not fair, that would cut off a legislate alternative being debated and voted on.

That's not to say that they support what the president is planning to do or what he is doing. But they want to make sure that, when we go forward, there is a fair process. How -- everybody is for that. And I think it can be worked out.

BLITZER: We have got to leave it there, Senator. Thanks very much.

LOTT: OK.

DOJ_NMG_0128125

BLITZER: Good luck.

I know you understand the process. A lot of other people don't necessarily...

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: ... understand it. But you did a good job explaining it.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: Thank you.

LOTT: Thanks, Wolf.

BLITZER: Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi. There's a story happening right now.

I want to bring in Carol Costello. She's watching it.

This is what we call good news, Carol.

CAROL COSTELLO, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Oh, it's great news.

The Indianapolis Colts have arrived home. They're just getting...

(LAUGHTER)

COSTELLO: ... off the plane now.

And you can imagine the reception they're getting, after they just annihilated the Chicago Bears in the Super Bowl last night. They won 29-17. They're -- I expected to see jubilation and celebration. But this is a long shot of the airport.

You can see the Indianapolis Colts getting off the plane. I can't see close enough to see if the MVP, Peyton Manning, is getting off the plane right now. But, of course, he was the MVP. He received a call from President Bush earlier this morning congratulating him on a big win.

A parade is set for the city of Indianapolis at 5:00 p.m. this afternoon. And, then, after that, there will be this big celebration with fans in the RCA Dome. And, hopefully, we will have pictures from that and we can show even more celebration in Indianapolis this afternoon -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Very happy for Peyton Manning and all of the Indianapolis Colts. I know you are as well.

Carol, thank you.

Coming up: We're a year away from Super Tuesday, the day many analysts think the race for the White House actually will be set. Bill Schneider is standing. He will take a closer look at the front- loaded electoral calendar.

And, in our "Strategy Session" today: the Nader factor, among other things. Will Ralph Nader mount a run for the White House again? He had some tough words yesterday for Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton. We will tell you what he is saying.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Candidates clamoring, contentious contests -- it must be the race for the White House. There's a flurry of activity, as presidential prospects jockey for your attention.

Let's get some more from our senior political analyst, Bill Schneider -- Bill.

WILLIAM SCHNEIDER, CNN SENIOR POLITICAL ANALYST: Wolf, tired already of the 2008 presidential campaign? Here is some good news. Exactly one year from today, this could all be over.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SCHNEIDER (voice-over): February 5, 2008, could be even bigger than Super Tuesday. It could be super-duper Tuesday.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. ARLEN SPECTER (R), PENNSYLVANIA: You say super-duper?

JUDGE SAMUEL ALITO, SUPREME COURT JUSTICE NOMINEE: Right.

SPECTER: Good.

ALITO: Any sort of categorization like that.

SPECTER: I like that.

ALITO: It sort of reminds me of the size of laundry detergent in the -- in the supermarket.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

SCHNEIDER: Look at the nominating calendar, as it currently stands.

DOJ_NMG_0128126

January 14, 2008, the Iowa caucuses open the race. Five days later, Nevada Democrats hold their caucuses -- January 22, the New Hampshire primary. January 29, South Carolina Democrats vote, followed by South Carolina Republicans on February 2.

Then, February 5 could be super-duper Tuesday. Right now, eight states are scheduled to hold primaries or caucuses that day. But another 12 states are considering moving their contests to February 5, including big states, like Florida, New Jersey, Michigan, and the biggest one of all, California.

February 5, super duper Tuesday, could become, essentially, a national primary. So, the campaign could start on January 14 and end just over three weeks later, with two-thirds of the Democratic delegates and over 80 percent of the Republican delegates chosen by February 5.

SEN. BARACK OBAMA (D), ILLINOIS: I'm so glad to be here in Manchester in New Hampshire.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I want to start by thanking the people of Iowa.

SCHNEIDER: The big states want a cut of the action. But, to run in those big states, you need big money and national name recognition. Obscure contenders need not apply. But the new calendar could make Iowa and New Hampshire more important. You pull off a surprise win in one of the small states, and the news coverage propels you to victory in the big states. In 1984, Gary Hart upset Walter Mondale in New Hampshire, and then won the Florida primary a week later on sheer momentum, what President Bush's father once called the big mo'.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

SCHNEIDER: So, ironically, the best way to win a national primary may be to concentrate on Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, and just ignore the big states -- Wolf.

BLITZER: And -- and some of those states, though -- correct me if I'm wrong -- do allow early voting.

SCHNEIDER: Yes.

In California and Florida and several other potential super-duper Tuesday states, people can start voting weeks before the primary. So, a lot of voters in those states could be casting ballots even before Iowa and New Hampshire, and long before the campaign ever gets to their states -- Wolf.

BLITZER: This is going to be very, very exciting for all of us. Thanks very much for that.

New numbers in the race for the White House top our "Political Radar" today.

Hillary Clinton comes out on top in a new poll of Iowa voters. Thirty-five percent of Democrats questioned by the American Research Group picked Senator Clinton as the Democratic presidential nominee. Eighteen percent are backing former Senator John Edwards. Fourteen percent pick Senator Barack Obama. The Iowa caucuses, of course, kick off the presidential primary season next January.

Senator Clinton also comes out on top in New Hampshire. Thirty- nine percent of the Granite State support Senator Clinton as their presidential nominee in a new American Research Group poll there. Senator Obama stands a distant second, at 19 percent, followed by former Senator Edwards at 13 percent. New Hampshire holds the first- in-the-nation primary.

And Ralph Nader says he is not -- repeat, not -- ruling out another run for the White House. The Green Party candidate told me yesterday, on "LATE EDITION," he will consider another presidential bid later this year. Nader ran for president back in '96, 2000, and 2004. Some Democrats blame Nader's 2000 bid for helping George W. Bush win the presidency over Al Gore.

They say, if Nader hadn't run, Al Gore would have won Florida and taken the White House.

Yesterday, Nader had some tough comments about Senator Clinton -- more on what he said coming up in a few minutes in our "Strategy Session."

And, as Jack Cafferty mentioned earlier this hour, John Edwards is out with a new health care plan. The Democratic presidential candidate is proposing health coverage for all Americans. The 2004 vice presidential nominee says, he would raise taxes on families making more than $200,000 a year to pay for the plan's $120-billion-a- year price tag.

I will be speaking to Senator Edwards about his controversial plan. That's coming up, right here in THE SITUATION ROOM, in the next hour. You're going to want to see that.

Let's get some more on what is going on, as far as that plan is concerned.

DOJ_NMG_0128127

As with most aspects of presidential campaigns, former Senator Edwards is going online to promote his new health care plan.

Our Internet reporter, Jacki Schechner, has been examining this new proposal.

Jacki, what are you seeing?

JACKI SCHECHNER, CNN INTERNET REPORTER: Wolf, that's right.

The whole thing is online. Edwards is the first Democratic presidential candidate to put a detailed health care plan on his Web site. You can download it, and take a closer look for yourself.

Now, in addition to the tax hike, he is talking about the principle here of shared responsibility. Basically, it would be the responsibility that -- of businesses to either provide health care or help their employees pay for it. It would be the responsibility of the government to make insurance more affordable with things like tax credits, with things like fairer premiums, or an expansion of Medicaid.

And, then, it would be your responsibility, as an individual, to make sure that you have health insurance. The Edwards campaign tells us today that they know all Americans have their own health care stories. And they are planning on discussing these online. People are going to be able to share their stories. And they will help come up with some solutions.

They say they plan on having new health-care related content on their Web site every day this week -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Jacki Schechner, Bill Schneider, and, you saw earlier, Candy Crowley, they are all part of the best political team on television.

And, for all the latest political news at any time, check out our Political Ticker, CNN.com/ticker.

And, remember, CNN is a partner with WMUR Television and "The New Hampshire Union Leader" for the very first presidential debates of the campaign season. They are on April 4 and April 5 of this year. These are the first debates in the leadoff presidential primary state of New Hampshire.

In the next hour: John Edwards says he has a prescription for universal health care coverage in the United States, but also, raising taxes on the rich, good politics or good policy? He is here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

But up next in our "Strategy Session": Is America' mayor in the race for the White House? And, if so, will moderate views on social issues sink him with conservative voters?

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Democrats are urging Republicans not to block a vote on -- on the bipartisan resolution criticizing President Bush's plan to send thousands of additional troops to Iraq.

Joining us now to discuss that and other hot political issues in our "Strategy Session," CNN political analyst and Democratic strategist James Carville and Terry Jeffrey. He's the editor at large of "Human Events."

Well, the explorer, another explorer...

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: ... Rudy Giuliani, he took another step today, a procedural step. But he seems to be stepping up his activity to run for president.

Are you convinced he is in?

JAMES CARVILLE, CNN POLITICAL ANALYST: Why wouldn't he?

Why -- why would he go to all this trouble if he weren't? And what he does is, he does one thing. And, of course, we cover it, because he's an interesting guy and a lot of people are interested in what he does. And he does another thing. And why wouldn't he take as many bites at the apple as we give him?

And I -- I have for reason to believe that he's not in, that he is going to all of this trouble, and forming all these committees, and doing all of these paperworks, and going to all these places just for the fun of it. Yes, I assume that he's in.

BLITZER: Because -- because some analysts were saying that he might be a little coy. But, in the last few weeks, he has really become very active.

DOJ_NMG_0128128

TERRY JEFFREY, EDITOR, "HUMAN EVENTS": Well, basically, I think he's in, Wolf, because the race is on right now. As your last report indicated, 11 months from now, people are actually going to be going out and voting for the nominees of the party. Twelve months from now, it's likely to be all over. So, this campaign is on right now. And people are in it right now.

BLITZER: Here is the latest national, registered Republicans, CNN/Opinion Research Corporation poll: Giuliani with 32 percent, McCain at 26 percent.

But, if you take a look at registered Republicans in Iowa and New Hampshire, Giuliani is ahead in Iowa, 27-22 over McCain. He is behind McCain in New Hampshire, 27-20 percent, tied with Mitt Romney there, the former Massachusetts governor. He is doing very well among registered Republicans, even though, on many of the social issues, he's very moderate.

CARVILLE: Well, first of all, I -- I know that our network, which I dearly love, spends a lot of money on these polls. I have no idea why, because they're meaningless. And we could go...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: They're not meaning -- let me tell you why...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: ... they are not meaningless.

CARVILLE: OK. Tell me why.

BLITZER: Because -- you know this better than I do.

When -- when you're fund-raising, and you can point...

CARVILLE: Right.

BLITZER: ... to polls showing that you're doing really, really well, and you need millions of dollars, doesn't that affect the race?

(CROSSTALK)

CARVILLE: He's -- he's going to have -- no.

He is going to have a ton of money. And, then, somebody says: Look, I was at 5 percent in this poll and I was at 10 in the next one. I have doubled it.

It -- it -- it's not going to -- it doesn't mean a lot right now. Obviously, everyone has heard of Rudy Giuliani. There's -- there's hardly anybody in America -- everyone has heard of John McCain. Everyone has heard of Senator Clinton. Everyone has heard of -- of Senator Obama. All right?

So they are, obviously, going to do better, and they're going to suffocate the coverage, which is kind of a difficult thing for -- for -- for these lesser candidates. But these earlier trial heats, I don't think, are going to make a darn, because, once somebody wins Iowa, it -- it switches around. Look what Hillary did in one visit.

(CROSSTALK) BLITZER: Among registered Republicans, he is doing excellent right now, Terry. And I know that a lot of conservative Republicans, social conservatives, are not happy that he supports abortion rights, supports gay rights, gun control, affirmative action, which you would -- which you would regard as very liberal positions.

JEFFREY: Well, there's no question about it, Wolf.

I -- I -- I agree with James, in part. I think Giuliani's numbers are high now because he has national name recognition. Everybody knows who he is. And the basic persona he has is a guy who did a spectacular job on 9/11, when we had the terrorist attacks.

But, you know, there was another interesting poll, "USA Today"/Gallup poll that was released February 1, that showed -- that polled Republicans and Republican-leaning independents. And it showed that 75 percent of the people do not know Giuliani's position on marriage. Sixty-four percent of the Republicans did not know Giuliani's position on abortion.

And when they were told what they were, about 18 percent said they would never vote for him, and 25 percent said they would be less likely to vote for him.

When you narrow that down -- that was a national poll -- you narrow that down to states like Iowa and South Carolina...

BLITZER: Right.

JEFFREY: ... I think Giuliani is going to lose a lot of support when people find out where he stands.

CARVILLE: Let me tell why -- how meaningless these polls are.

Senator Clinton was 15 points down in Iowa. She made one visit. Now she is 20 points up. And -- and, I mean, and -- and we would think a lot of people were saying, well, everybody knows everything. These things are in concrete.

The -- the truth of the matter, they are going to shift a lot between now and Election Day.

BLITZER: Yesterday -- yesterday, I interviewed Ralph Nader on "LATE EDITION."

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Now, he did not have nice words to say about Senator Clinton.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: He also said he is leaving open the possibility he might run again...

(CROSSTALK) BLITZER: ... this time around.

CARVILLE: Right.

BLITZER: Listen to what he said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, "LATE EDITION WITH WOLF BLITZER")

RALPH NADER, FORMER PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: I -- I don't think she has the fortitude, actually. She's -- she's really a panderer and a flatterer. As she goes around the country, you will see more of that.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: And, certainly, if she were...

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: ... to get that Democratic nomination, I think that...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: ... will increase the possibility he might run.

CARVILLE: You know, only the American Green Party could stop Al Gore from being president.

(LAUGHTER)

CARVILLE: I mean, you have to sit there and say, here is the Green Party that has stopped the greenest candidate in the history of American politics from being president.

I -- it -- it's almost -- if he wouldn't be -- if the man would not have accomplished so much in his life, if -- if, for the first -- until 2000, one of the most influential -- I think made more contributions to American society than almost any non-president, and he's, like, turned into an old fool. And it -- it's kind of tragic to see it.

I would rather remember that -- the Ralph Nader of the -- the '60s or '70s, even the '80s and '90s, than what you see now.

JEFFREY: You know -- you know what Ralph Nader does that is getting increasingly rare in American politics? He says exactly what he thinks.

And it resonates with people. And, if he gets out there, and he tells the truth about Hillary Clinton, I know James won't like it.

CARVILLE: But...

JEFFREY: But -- and some voters may go out and vote for him, because he is speaking his mind about what he believes in.

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: And you have no doubt that -- he got about 90,000 -- more than 90,000 votes in Florida. Al Gore lost by 500 or so votes.

(CROSSTALK)

CARVILLE: That's not -- that's not...

(CROSSTALK)

CARVILLE: ... no one -- again, no, that is indisputable.

But it is just so ironic that the Green Party of the United States of America is responsible for defeating Al Gore. I mean, if it wouldn't be so sad, you would just want to bust out laughing at the stupidity of the whole thing.

(CROSSTALK)

CARVILLE: I mean, it really is.

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: And he is thinking -- he is thinking about doing it again. But he says he is going to need more time...

CARVILLE: Right.

BLITZER: ... before he makes his decision.

We will watch what Ralph Nader does.

Guys, thanks for coming in.

CARVILLE: Thank you, Wolf. Appreciate it.

BLITZER: And still to come in our next hour: the Reverend Al Sharpton. Does he have an eye on a 2008 presidential candidacy, or does he have an eye on not running again? We are going to ask Al Sharpton: Will he be a candidate this time around?

But next: "The Cafferty File." Can John Edwards be elected president by advocating raising taxes? Jack Cafferty has your e-mail.

That's coming up next, right here in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Here's a look at some of the "Hot Shots" coming in from our friends over at the Associated Press, pictures likely to be in your hometown newspapers tomorrow.

In Jakarta, Indonesia, children trek through flooded streets. Torrential rains and floods in Jakarta have already killed 25 people, left hundreds of thousands -- hundreds of thousands -- homeless.

In New Jersey, an ice-covered firefighter battles a blaze in a two-story condominium building.

In Pakistan, a child holds a toy gun at a rally for Kashmir day.

And, in Michigan, a man exits freezing cold water after taking a plunge during a polar bear challenge -- some of this hour's "Hot Shots," pictures often worth 1,000 words.

Let's go to Jack in New York.

These guys who like to jump in that cold water on freezing days, I don't get it.

JACK CAFFERTY, CNN ANCHOR: Do you understand why they would do that? There's some idiots in Brooklyn here that do that, too. They go...

BLITZER: I don't understand it.

CAFFERTY: They go running into the ocean when it's -- you know, when it's barely capable of supporting life outside.

BLITZER: Yes.

CAFFERTY: You would never do anything like that...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: No. And I grew up in Buffalo. And I don't -- I don't like the cold. You know, I go outside now -- it's cold in Washington -- I don't like it.

CAFFERTY: Do the people in Buffalo know what became of you?

BLITZER: Some of them.

(LAUGHTER)

CAFFERTY: John Edwards, Wolf, is proposing universal health care for every American by 2012. He says he would free up the $120 billion a year he would need to pay this by abolishing President Bush's tax cuts for people who make more than $200,000 a year.

So, the question is: Can John Edwards be elected president by advocating raising taxes?

Sal in Buffalo: "I don't mind paying more taxes when it's for something that benefits Americans, like universal health care. John Edwards is my front-runner right now."

Pat in Idaho Falls: "What are the other options? One, forget about health care. Two, print more money -- i.e., borrow from China. Or, three, rob Peter to pay Paul -- i.e., juggle the books." Denise in Honolulu: "John Edwards should go back to North Carolina and put a few more additions on his mansion. He has been wrong about everything since he was elected to the Senate. Maybe, if he spent a few years learning, rather than campaigning, he would be ready for prime time."

DOJ_NMG_0128131

Ed in New York: "It all depends on who Senator Edwards would like to tax. Everyone thinks universal health care is a good thing. However, if that means a bigger tax bill for the average American, then, I don't think his tax increases will be supported."

David in Ann Arbor, Michigan: "Absolutely. President Bush's tax cuts are the second biggest mistake of his presidency. I hope Edwards isn't the only Democratic hopeful with the chutzpah to go this route."

C. in Coppell, Texas: "These people are all idiots. Raise taxes? How much blood will you take from my body before I die?"

And Adam in Boyds, Maryland: "John Edwards is being very courageous in admitting that he will raise taxes. However, so was Mondale in 1984" -- Wolf.

BLITZER: Jack, thank you.

War Debate Goes To Heart Of Bush's Power (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, February 6, 2007

The Senate moved on Monday towards a historic debate on resolutions opposing President George W. Bush's troop "surge" in Iraq, the most significant sign of Congress reasserting itself against a powerful executive since the start of the war.

Even the prospect of the debate had stirred bitter exchanges, Senator John McCain accusing supporters of a resolution opposing the surge as "intellectually dishonest". John Edwards, a Democratic presidential hopeful said Congress would be guilty of "betrayal" if it did not exercise its constitutional powers to stop the war. Dianne Feinstein, a Democratic senator, charged Republicans with "obstructionism" amid weekend manoeuvres by Bush supporters to avert a vote on the issues.

The central resolution – a bipartisan text that would express disapproval of the surge – is non-binding. That has prompted some to dismiss it as inconsequential but for others it would be the first symbolic no-confidence vote in the president's handling of the Iraq war. "For the majority of Congress to resolve [that] the president is not doing the right thing is not a trivial matter in a time of war, even if it does not have a legal effect," says Cass Sunstein, a law professor at the University of Chicago.

The debate forms part of an intensifying battle over Mr Bush's exercise of executive power. Congressional concern has prompted a White House compromise over its terrorist surveillance programme. But when it comes to the conduct of the war and a more direct challenge to the commander-in-chief's power, this debate goes to the heart of the administration's philosophical view of its authority.

Mr Bush and Dick Cheney, the vice-president, have reacted to the congressional challenge with characteristic bluntness. Mr Cheney said a resolution was "not going to stop us". Mr Bush has used plainer language, arguing that he is the "decider," and invoking his constitutional authority as commander-in-chief. Last week, Senator Arlen Specter, the former Republican chairman of the Senate judiciary committee, took him on, noting Mr Bush "is not the sole decider, that the decider is a shared and joint responsibility". He said Mr Bush's expansion of power created "an atmosphere of confrontation".

His comments came during a hearing on "exercising Congress's constitutional right to end a war", initiated by Senator Russell Feingold, a Democrat and one of the most assertive critics of the war. Last week he introduced legislation to prohibit the use of funds to continue the deployment of forces in Iraq six months after the bill is enacted. "If Congress doesn't stop this war, it's not because it doesn't have the power. It's because it doesn't have the will."

Compared with previous occasions when Congress has asserted itself at a time of war, such as Vietnam, the political will is limited.

"The non-binding resolution seems palsied by comparison. It does not prevent the president doing anything. It is just optics and play-acting," said Bruce Fein, a former Reagan administration official.

The most meaningful – and constitutionally clear – power that Congress has in a time of war is the direct power of the purse. In 1970, Congress set a date to cut off funds to prevent combat troops entering Cambodia. In 1973 it passed amendments stating that after August 15, 1973, no funds could be used to finance combat activities in or over Cambodia, Laos, North Vietnam and South Vietnam. In 1987 Congress cut off military assistance to the Nicaraguan Contras, and in 1988 passed legislation to restrict funding for Bosnia unless the president agreed to certain assurances.

DOJ_NMG_0128132

“There are two reasons Congress is weaker now,” says Mr Fein. “There is still a post-9/11 fear factor. And they fear that if funds are not forthcoming in Iraq and it gets worse and the whole thing erupts, they will get blamed for it. What is worrisome is that Congress as an institution is becoming effete in challenging the president.”

Yet, as the death toll mounts in Iraq and the proposed budget for the war rises, dissent is building. Amid concern about whether the Senate would even get to a vote on a non-binding resolution, Ms Feinstein this weekend threatened: “If we can’t get this done, you can be sure a month or so down the pike, there’s going to be stronger legislation.”

Half Of Democratic Senators Regret Iraq Vote (POL)

By Christian Lowe And Daniel W. Reilly And Carrie Budoff

The Politico, February 6, 2007

Half of the current Democratic senators who backed President Bush's call to war in 2002 say they now regret authorizing the invasion of Iraq, according to a Politico survey.

But while nine of 18 Democrats who backed Bush now wish they had not, Republicans had fewer misgivings -- only three voiced regret. The lack of a similar GOP groundswell highlights the dilemma that some senators from the president's party face as they seek re-election amid sagging voter support for the war -- and, specifically, the president's plan to send 21,000 additional troops to Iraq.

From Maine to New Hampshire to Minnesota, potential Democratic challengers in the 2008 elections are already gearing up campaigns that will try to capitalize on the past and present congressional debates on Iraq.

"It is hard to see how Iraq does not remain a central issue," said Steve Marchand, the Democratic mayor of Portsmouth, N.H., and a potential challenger to Sen. John Sununu, R-N.H., next year.

As senators began a historic debate Monday on Bush's troop surge, a majority said they were wary of its success, with 58 telling The Politico that they opposed the plan. Yet, a core group of Republicans remained undecided on whether to express that discontent with a "yes" vote on a resolution critical of the president's plan.

The survey findings underscore the volatility of the debate at the outset of the 2008 Senate campaigns. The vote on a resolution opposing a troop boost will likely emerge as a defining moment, second only to the 2002 vote authorizing the Iraq invasion that for some senators has become the most painful episode of their public careers.

While the prospect of an up-or-down vote has left senators from across the country weighing public opinion against party loyalty and political prospects against national security policy, for more than 50 senators who held office in 2002, the Iraq war vote remains a matter of conviction.

"When I made up my mind to vote no, I went home and slept like a log," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt.

For others, the resolution is the chance to start righting a wrong. A dozen of the 100 senators surveyed by The Politico over the last week, including nine of the 18 Democrats who backed the war in 2002, said they regret their choice.

"I have apologized to my constituents and it will be something I will regret for as long as I live," said Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, who faces re-election next year and is supporting a non-binding, resolution crafted by Sen. John Warner, R-Va., and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., that opposes Bush's troop boost.

Critics of a congressional rebuke of Bush say it is wrong-headed, the latest misstep in a four-year odyssey through the shifting sands of the Middle East with no simple resolution. At least 30 senators -- all Republicans, with the exception of Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, I-Conn. -- told The Politico that the Bush plan should be given a chance.

Many of those senators also criticize the Warner-Levin measure as a feel-good resolution that offers little concrete direction about how to steer the nation through the mounting sectarian fighting in Iraq.

"The Democratic Party is making a huge mistake," said Sen. Lindsay Graham, R-S.C., also up for re-election next year. "We all embrace withdrawal at some point. But they will not talk in detail about what would happen in Iraq if we left in six months."

The senators facing the most excruciating decision in the coming days are the 20 Republicans and 12 Democrats -- particularly Sununu, Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. -- who are next in line to face voters.

DOJ_NMG_0128133

On the eve of a historic Senate debate on President Bush's surge strategy for Iraq, the Politico surveyed the offices of all 100 senators to compare the senators' views on the 2002 vote to authorize the war with their most current positions on Bush's plan to boost troop levels and whether U.S. troops should begin to come home.

Of those who voted for the war in 2002, 35 senators said they do not regret their vote, while 14 now wish they had not voted for it.

On the question of Bush's new plan, the survey shows the White House faces significant opposition. Fifty-eight senators oppose it, 35 support it, and six are undecided or would not comment. Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., remains hospitalized.

Most senators -- 65 -- oppose any timetable to withdraw U.S. forces, while 23 support a timetable and 11 are undecided or would not comment. Again, this tally does not include Sen. Johnson.

Some notes on the survey: Nineteen senators were not members of Congress in 2002. Current senators who were House members in 2002 and voted on the Iraq authorization in that body are noted with an asterisk. Five senators said they would support the president's surge strategy only if certain conditions were attached.

When senators or staff members did not respond to repeated requests for comment, Politico used public statements to attempt to establish the senator's position. The three Republicans are feeling intense pressure here and in their home states, as opposition researchers catalogue their moves. Democrats in New Hampshire, Minnesota and Maine say the war -- and how their Republican senators have voted on it -- will dominate their campaign strategies.

"It will be one of the litmus test issues for Senator Sununu," said Marchand, the Portsmouth mayor. "In New Hampshire, if you look at last November, it's pretty clear that people of New Hampshire have made a statement with regard to the war in Iraq."

Sununu can't escape the question.

Reporters chase him down in the Capitol hallways, and collar him near the Senate elevators. Antiwar activists cajole him with pickets outside his Portsmouth office and television ads in the state urge him to reject the troop buildup in Iraq.

Sununu's coyness might be expected: He is considered one of the most vulnerable senators.

Five years ago, Sununu was a three-term congressman, elected to the Senate by a slim margin in a state that puts a premium on independence. As divergent as Washington is from the North Country, the wooded territory of New Hampshire that hugs the Canadian border, the political climate was far different then.

Bush, who campaigned for Sununu, enjoyed a 72 percent approval rating in the state, nearly twice what it is now. A month before the election, Sununu, like many of his colleagues, urged the passage of the war resolution, saying Saddam Hussein had shepherded the development of weapons of mass destruction.

"If we wait until Iraq succeeds in achieving these goals, we will have waited too long," Sununu said in 2002, when he voted in the House to support the move to war.

These days, Sununu's position on Iraq is hard to categorize -- and his state's electorate increasingly impatient with the war.

Sununu voices discontent with Bush's policy. "We made significant mistakes after Saddam Hussein's fall in April of 2003," Sununu wrote in a column posted on his Senate Web site last month.

But he has not backed a resolution challenging Bush's policy, and he voted against the most critical one when it came before the Foreign Relations Committee -- although even then Sununu expressed concern about the buildup.

"John Sununu is looking at what happened in New Hampshire: the decapitation of the Republicans," said Ross K. Baker, a Rutgers University political science professor who has written several books on Congress. Voters ousted the state's two congressmen, both Republicans, and turned the statehouse Democratic.

Sununu and Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., "both feel the ground is shifting under them," Baker added.

As Sununu surveys his options, at least five of his fellow Republicans have signed on to Warner's compromise resolution. All are among those up for reelection next year. Coleman, who could face a Democratic challenge from liberal radio talk show host Al Franken, has been trying to carve out a middle ground, criticizing Bush in one breath, and raising questions about a quick troop withdrawal in the next.

The first-term senator grew testy with reporters last week, ruffled at the suggestion that politics was steering his decisions.

"This is not about the election, and a lot of us … find that offensive," Coleman said. "This is about the toughest decision you make in the Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0128134

He can expect the issue to dog him.

Jessica McIntosh, spokeswoman for the Minnesota State Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party, said Iraq would "absolutely" be the centerpiece of the party's campaign against Coleman. And like Sununu and Collins, Coleman has been targeted by VoteVets, a political action committee that began a national campaign last week arguing that those who decline to oppose the president's plan "don't support the troops." The group has raised about $500,000, which it has spent in four states and the District of Columbia.

Collins, who voted for the war in 2002, also faces the likelihood of running for re-election against an antiwar candidate in a state that favored Democrats for president and governor during the last two elections. At least three potential challengers have emerged.

Collins, however, has been one of the most vocal critics of Bush's surge plan, resisting softer resolutions crafted by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., in favor of those pushed by Warner.

While she says politics has nothing to do with it, others wonder. Next year's election "certainly will be a challenge for her," said Chellie Pingree, the former president of Common Cause who got drubbed by Collins in the 2002 Senate race, and is considering another run. "Now, Collins, like a lot of Republicans, (are) looking for ways to re-craft their stand. That's the politically unpredictable part. That didn't work for everybody in this cycle."

Jonathan Martin contributed to this report.

Join The Conversation

You need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

by Steve Slatten on 02.05.2007 at 11:37 PM

PolarBear -- Amen. I also supported Bush and the war back in 2003. Of course, that's before history proved him to be a blatant liar and the worst president in a hundred years.

by Show Me on 02.05.2007 at 11:26 PM

The Republicans are making a big mistake. The public wants a show of force from their Senators, they want push back to Bush and Cheney. The public understands that we can't just leave but we want the esclation to stop and we want the sabor rattling towards Iran to stop. If they block a debate on the subject they deserve the consequences.

by polarbear on 02.05.2007 at 11:03 PM

Mr. Badura, I suggest you take your argument door-to-door, like a real politician, and see how far you get. I can hear it now. "I'm here to tell you parents what to do with your children because, by God, I know what's best for you." Good luck, sir.

by tmlindsey on 02.05.2007 at 11:01 PM

As Pat Benator once put it: "It's a little too little, it's a little too late...

?Congress Makes Unprecedented Move: Actually Debate Iraq War!??

Nearly forty months after Congress approved the Iraq War Resolution, they?re prepared to make a bold, unprecedented move on the congressional floor: Hold a non-binding debate over the War in Iraq!?

If you remember, back in October of 2002 our Congress signed over their powers to President Bush, which granted the Commander in Chief the almighty power to authorize military intervention in Iraq if Saddam Hussein refused to give up weapons of mass destruction. All of this was done with little debate or dissent, other than Senator Byrd?s attempt to filibuster against the resolution -- arguing the resolution amounted to a ?blank check? for the White House (his attempt was cut off on a 75 to 25 vote). "This is the Tonkin Gulf resolution all over again," Byrd said. "Let us stop, look and listen. Let us not give this president or any president unchecked power. Remember the Constitution." (Wink, Wink*: the Senate voted overwhelmingly to repeal the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution on June 24th of 1970.)

Read more @ Political Fallout

by AntiState on 02.05.2007 at 10:50 PM only half? ha. big surprise there...

by jeff Badura on 02.05.2007 at 10:00 PM

point of recent history- the senate voted overwhelmingly in 02 to give bush support in his pending action in Iraq, the people were behind it, the press was behind it, and there was a national consensus from top to bottom to remove Saddam, from the "Iraq liberation Act" of 98 signed by Pres. Clinton and the congress to our national feeling of resolve after 9/11, we all (80%) were for this coarse of action!! now that the rating hungry press has flipped flopped and the Dem's have amnesia and are revising history with the Bush lied People died, rush to war slogans our national fecklessness and national cowardice is showing for all the world to see !! so we lost 3000 soldiers in 4 yrs, a total less than one day of causalities during the D-day invasion of WW II lets send the troops to war and refuse them reinforcements and tell them we think the mission is a failure and we will call it supporting the troops, to hell with our promises to the Iraqi people, to the US troops who already gave there life and limb it doesn't matter we will read the polls and act accordingly ??? this is what our Dem senate has become. I'm sorry to say Bin Laden might have been right ?? "bloody the nose of the Americans and they will run away" thank god there are GOP members in the senate still trying to do the right thing !!

by GGPSmith on 02.05.2007 at 09:01 PM

C'est la vie. We certainly can't get back the lives or money wasted on this debacle in the name of oil and neoconservatism. But staying the course appears to be the default option now for both parties, regardless of any rhetoric to the contrary. President Bush was given the power to execute this war by a now semi-regretful Congress and I don't see him ordering any troop withdrawals while he's in the White House. If the Democrats seriously want to leave Iraq, then they need to read their history books on how to instigate a Watergate: Investigate every instance of possible wrong-doing on the part of President Bush and Vice President Cheney; if found, indict Vice President Cheney and force his resignation; Bush can then pardon Cheney and choose his "Gerald Ford"; then the Democrats can impeach President Bush and/or make the GOP force the President's resignation; then President "Ford" can pardon then ex-President Bush; then the Democrats can force "Jerry" to get out of Iraq. But by then, it will be 2009! So, Big Oil be praised, the acquisition of Iraqi and Iranian oil marches on. C'est la vie.

by polarbear on 02.05.2007 at 08:44 PM

Well, myself and most of my neighbors supported President Bush at the time of the Iraq invasion. We believed he had access to intelligence, and we did not know that he and his administration were committed to this neoconservative nonsense.

Today, myself and my neighbors do not support President Bush, and regret having supported the Iraq invasion. The data we see, and the administrations' behavior indicates they lied about the WMDs, purposely exaggerating intelligence to favor what appears to be a predetermined strategy to invade. That, and the mismanagement of the war has voters frustrated, angry, and in a foul temperament.

It looks to me like the 9 Democratic Senators and 3 Republican Senators who have expressed regrets are representing their constituents.

by AH2 on 02.05.2007 at 08:23 PM

IF half the Democrats regret their original Iraq invasion vote in support of Presidebt Bush's plans IF they don't NOW go all out to defeat his latest "war" escalation (AKA expanded occupation) each should be forced to wear a sign around their necks with the old adage written on it .... "FOOL ME ONCE SHAME ON YOU FOOL ME TWICE SHAME ON ME"

by AH2 on 02.05.2007 at 08:21 PM

IF half the Democrats regret their original Iraq invasion vote in support of Presidebt Bush's plans IF they don't know go all out NOW to defeat his latest "war" escalation (AKA expanded occupation) each should be forced to wear a sign around their necks with the old adage written on it .... "FOOL ME ONCE SHAME ON YOU FOOL ME TWICE SHAME ON ME"

Before you start composing please note that you will need to be a registered user of Politico.com to "join the conversation". If you are not a member yet, what are you waiting for? Register Now!

A Detached Debate (WP)

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

THE ARGUMENTS on Iraq in Washington, as so often in the past, don't seem to have much to do with the realities in Baghdad. The Senate yesterday was debating -- or debating whether to debate -- a fistful of resolutions for and against President Bush's surge of U.S. troops into the capital, with the loudest voices belonging to those senators planning or contemplating a run for president or facing reelection in 2008. Nothing that has been proposed would help in any material way in Iraq; nor is any resolution likely to demoralize the troops or encourage the enemy, as some opponents claim.

DOJ_NMG_0128136

Most senators seem to be aiming to position themselves against their domestic competitors -- in the case of Democrats such as Barack Obama or Joseph R. Biden Jr. -- or cover themselves with voters who are angry about the reverses in the war, in the case of Republicans such as Gordon Smith or Susan Collins. The most overtly political posture may be that of Hillary Rodham Clinton, who petulantly called on President Bush and Congress to "end this war" -- whatever that means -- before the next president takes office, presumably so that it will not trouble the administration she hopes to lead.

But what of the actual situation in Iraq? As the horrific bombings in Baghdad over the past few days have all too graphically signaled, it is rapidly getting worse. Sunni insurgents have responded to President Bush's launch of a new counterinsurgency campaign with an offensive aimed at slaughtering as many innocent Shiites as possible. The Iraqi government, meanwhile, is already failing to live up to its commitments under the counterinsurgency plan. As Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates acknowledged last week, Iraqi army units that were supposed to arrive in Baghdad by the beginning of this month have shown up with about half of their troops, which "probably isn't good enough." Just four weeks ago, senior administration officials cited the arrival or non-arrival of those troops as a critical test for the new strategy.

These events reinforce the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq that was released last week. The unclassified summary of the document has bad news for all sides. It predicts that during the next 12 to 18 months, Iraq's "overall security situation will continue to deteriorate at rates comparable to the latter part of 2006." It is not optimistic that the surge strategy, which is aimed at providing a space for Iraqi political accords, can work: "Even if violence is diminished . . . Iraqi leaders will be hard pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation. . . ."

Yet the estimate also concludes that coalition troops "remain an essential stabilizing element in Iraq" and predicts dire consequences if they are "withdrawn rapidly" during the next 12 to 18 months. Among those are the dissolution of the Iraqi army, open intervention by neighboring countries, and the use of Iraq by al-Qaeda for "increased attacks in and outside the country." "Massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement," says the estimate, "would be probable."

What all this suggests is that, however much Ms. Clinton or other senators might wish it, the war in Iraq will not end before the next president takes office. Mr. Bush's surge is unlikely to produce a breakthrough toward peace; in fact the violence may continue to worsen. All the same, the United States may not be able to withdraw from Iraq without triggering worse consequences than those that might arise from remaining. In short, the country needs a strategy for defending its interests in Iraq for years to come. That perspective, and not the American political calendar, is what Congress ought to be focused on.

To Help Iraq, Let It Fend For Itself (NYT)

By Edward N. Luttwak

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

Chevy Chase, Md.

THE sooner President Bush can get his extra troops for a “surge” in Iraq, the sooner he will be able to announce that all American troops are coming home because of the inevitable failure of the Iraqi government to “live up to its side of the bargain.” In fact, in the run-up to the surge proposal, it is unlikely that there was any real two-sided bargaining before Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki was induced to issue promises — particularly in terms of government troops taking on Shiite militias — that he cannot possibly fulfill. Mr. Maliki, it seems, simply agreed to whatever was asked of him, to humor the White House and retain American support for a little while longer.

For the Iraqi Army and police to disarm the Shiite militias, the prime minister would have to be a veritable Stalin or at least a Saddam Hussein, able to terrorize Iraqi soldiers and policemen into obedience. Mr. Maliki, of course, has no such authority over Iraqi soldiers or police officers; indeed he has little authority over his own 39-person cabinet, whose members mostly represent sectarian parties with militias of their own.

Actually the situation is even worse than that, because only the Kurdish militias unfailingly obey their political leaders — one is the president of Iraq no less, Jalal Talabani — while for the rest, it may be more true to say that Iraqi militias have political leaders to represent their wishes. The largest and most murderous of the Shiite militias, the Mahdi Army, which is invariably described as belonging to the truculent cleric Moktada al-Sadr, is actually divided under a bevy of local commanders, some of whom obey Mr. Sadr some of the time.

DOJ_NMG_0128137

In sum, the most that Prime Minister Maliki can do is not to interfere when American troops arrest suspects and fight militias, as he has done in the past.

Nor can the Iraqi leader fulfill his other major promise: leading a new effort to reconcile the warring sects of Iraq. He is not another Gandhi, but a leader of the fiercely sectarian Dawa Party. It is very much as a militant Shiite that he speaks out; lately he has been threatening Sunni members of Parliament and accusing them of grave crimes. (It was not a coincidence that Saddam Hussein was tried, convicted and executed not for his greatest crimes, but for his 1982 reprisal killings for a failed attempt by Dawa members to assassinate him.) It would be remarkable if Mr. Maliki could even reconcile with his Shiite rivals, let alone the Sunni insurgents.

Fortunately, there is a promising, long-term policy ready and waiting for President Bush whenever he decides to call off the good old college try of his surge: disengagement. By this, I don't mean a phased withdrawal, let alone the leap in the dark of total abandonment. Rather, it would start with a tactical change: American soldiers would no longer patrol towns and villages, conduct cordon-and-search operations, or man outposts and checkpoints. An end to these tasks would allow the greatest part of the troops in Iraq to head home, starting with overburdened reservists and National Guard units.

The remaining American forces, including ground units, would hole up within safe and mostly remote bases in Iraq — to support the elected government, deter foreign invasion, dissuade visible foreign intrusions, and strike at any large concentration of jihadis should it emerge. This would mean, contrary to most plans being considered now, that United States military personnel could not remain embedded in large numbers within the Iraqi Army and police forces. At most, the Americans would operate training programs within safe bases.

What would be the result of disengagement along these lines? First, it would not be likely to increase the violence afflicting Iraqi civilians. The total number of American troops in Iraq — even including any surge — is so small, and their linguistic skills so limited, that they have little effect on day-to-day security. Nor have they really protected Iraqis from one another. At most, the presence of American soldiers in any one place merely diverts attacks elsewhere (unless they themselves are attacked, which is a sad way indeed of reducing Iraqi casualties).

Intelligence is to counterinsurgency what firepower is to conventional warfare, and we just do not have it or the capacity to gather information on our own. Thus the sacrifices of our troops on the ground are mostly futile.

Politically, on the other hand, disengagement should actually reduce the violence. American power has been interposed between Arab Sunnis and Arab Shiites. That has relieved the Shiite majority of responsibility to such an extent that many, notably the leaders of the Mahdi Army, feel free to attack the American and British troops who are busy protecting their co-religionist civilians from Sunni insurgents. For many Arab Sunnis, on the other hand, the United States must be the enemy simply because it upholds the majority of the heretical Shiites.

Were the United States to disengage, both Arab Sunnis and Shiites would have to take responsibility for their own security (as the Kurds have doing been all along). Where these three groups are not naturally separated by geography, they would be forced to find ways to stabilize relations with each other. That would most likely involve violence as well as talks, and some forcing of civilians from their homes. But all this is happening already, and there is no saying which ethno-religious group would be most favored by a reduction of the United States footprint.

One reason for optimism on that score is that the violence itself has been separating previously mixed populations, reducing motives and opportunities for further attacks. That is how civil wars can burn themselves out.

In any case, it is time for the Iraqis to make their own history.

The War To Save The Surge (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, February 6, 2007

When political opponents tell you that to prove your seriousness you need to pursue a strategy they know is doomed to failure, shouldn't you be skeptical of their advice?

DOJ_NMG_0128138

As the Senate considers a resolution to put itself on record opposing President Bush's escalation of the Iraq war through a "surge" of troops, Bush's backers are saying one thing and doing another.

They are saying that the resolution is meaningless and that true opponents of the war should prove their sincerity by cutting off funding altogether. But they are doing all they can to keep the Senate from even voting on a bipartisan anti-surge resolution that would send a powerful message to Bush that most Americans have lost faith in his bungled war policy.

If you doubt that the war's supporters would love its opponents to put all their eggs in the fund-cutoff basket, consider what it means for them to sound as if the administration's only serious foes were the likes of Dennis Kucinich and Cindy Sheehan.

"I don't think these resolutions, nonbinding resolutions, are going to accomplish anything," Sen. John Cornyn, a Texas Republican and a Bush loyalist, told Gwen Ifill on PBS's "NewsHour" last week. "If we really had the courage of our convictions," Cornyn said, the "we" referring to the war's opponents, "if people said, 'You know what? This is an immoral task we've asked our troops to do because we don't believe in the mission, we think they're going to fail.' They ought to cut off funds. But to have this sort of -- this debate without any real consequence, I just don't think is the best use of our time."

So Cornyn wants to block a vote on a supposedly unimportant anti-surge resolution, but he would be happy to entertain a debate on a funding cutoff. Does that not send a message to the war's critics?

And it's not just Cornyn. It is now a standard talking point for supporters of this war, from the editorial pages of the Wall Street Journal and the Weekly Standard to Vice President Cheney himself, to try to block any statement by Congress of its views, except through a vote to block funds for Iraq.

"The Congress has control over the purse strings," said Cheney, who on most other occasions insists upon the executive's supremacy over Congress. In an interview with CNN's Wolf Blitzer last month, Cheney added: "They have the right, obviously, if they want to cut off funding, but in terms of this effort the president has made his decision. . . . We'll continue to consult with the Congress. But the fact of the matter is, we need to get the job done."

In other words: Even if a substantial majority of Congress that includes many Republicans demonstrates a lack of confidence in the Bush-Cheney surge, the administration will feel free to ignore the other elected branch of our government -- and the more recently elected branch (remember November, anyone?) at that.

Oh, and if an anti-surge resolution were trivial, why would William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard and one of the war's most passionate advocates, devote a long and angry editorial in the latest issue of his magazine to attacking Sen. John Warner (Va.) and other Republicans as "ignominious" for their support of an anti-surge measure? Kristol knows that every Republican vote against escalation carries special weight in speeding this war to an end. So does the Senate's Republican leadership, which used a procedural vote yesterday evening to impede the majority's will on the surge.

Supporters of Bush's war policy would love a vote on a full funding cutoff right now because they know that, at this moment, they could win it. They would love responsibility for the failures in Iraq to fall not on an administration that planned its policy so badly and carried it out so incompetently. Far better for them to heap blame on the war's opponents for "losing faith."

And they know, as the war's opponents should, that in a democracy whose constitution accords so much power to the president, turning around even a failed war policy takes time, persuasion, organizing, legislative strategizing and pressure.

The impatience of the administration's critics is entirely understandable. But it would be a shame if impatience got in the way of a sensible long-term strategy to bring America's engagement in this war to as decent an end as possible as quickly as possible -- even if not as quickly as they'd like. The anti-surge resolution is a necessary first step, which is why those who are against a genuine change in our Iraq policy are fighting so hard to stop it.

postchat@aol.com

Democrats To Question Bremer On Iraq Contracts (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats begin their scrutiny of contracts in Iraq today by grilling the top civilian official in Iraq after the 2003 invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0128139

Paul Bremer, the former head of the Coalition Provisional Authority, testifies today before the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee about the billions of dollars his agency spent in Iraq. It will be his first appearance on Capitol Hill since he left office more than two years ago.

It's all part of the examination of the Bush administration's conduct in Iraq that Democrats promised after regaining control of Congress.

The committee's chairman, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., is a longtime critic of the administration's handling of the Iraq war and reconstruction contracts. As head of the committee, Waxman has the power to force officials to testify and hand over documents, as well as to decide what the panel will investigate.

The panel also will hold hearings this week on allegations of price-gouging by contractors and mismanagement by the Department of Homeland Security.

The stakes are high. Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania and other Democrats have criticized the reconstruction effort in Iraq as wasteful, suggesting that the money would be better spent to rebuild New Orleans or improve military readiness at home.

The president's 2008 budget proposal presented to Congress on Tuesday requests $3.4 billion in reconstruction funds, but Democratic leaders have said they would closely scrutinize the administration's spending requests for Iraq.

The committee cannot directly punish wrongdoing but can refer possible criminal conduct to prosecutors, publicize the faults and propose legislation to fix the problems.

The panel's hearing today will scrutinize spending and oversight by the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), which ruled Iraq from May 2003 to June 2004.

Audits by the United Nations and the U.S. Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction found the provisional authority under Bremer couldn't properly account for the billions of dollars it spent. Bremer has responded that he and other CPA officials did the best they could in dangerous and chaotic post-invasion Iraq.

The inspector general, Stuart Bowen, also is scheduled to testify. Two years ago, his office found that the provisional authority never released spending guidelines and relied on a questionable Iraqi bureaucracy in spending the $8.8 billion allocated under U.N. auspices. As a result, the report said, there was no assurance that the money was spent on legitimate projects.

Last week, Bowen reported to Congress that corruption and mismanagement continue to plague Iraqi ministries, and the sectarian violence there threatens to undo the rebuilding efforts.

That report also highlighted audits finding waste and mismanagement of hundreds of millions of dollars of U.S. government money, including a Baghdad police academy with serious construction defects and a State Department police training program that paid more than $48 million for a training camp that was never used but included an Olympic-size swimming pool.

House To Probe Management Of Iraq, Health Care Programs (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, February 6, 2007

Rep. Henry A. Waxman today opens a series of hearings promised by Democrats to look into Bush administration management of Iraq reconstruction efforts, homeland security projects and federal health care programs.

Mr. Waxman, California Democrat and chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, has said the four days of hearings will examine "waste, fraud and abuse."

The hearings by the new Democratic majority are not designed to embarrass President Bush but are "just fact-finding," a committee aide said.

Witnesses will include L. Paul Bremer, former administrator of the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) in Iraq; testimony by the family of private security workers killed by a Fallujah mob in 2004; and an examination of "fraudulent, abusive or wasteful" drug pricing in Medicaid and Medicare programs.

DOJ_NMG_0128140

Mr. Waxman last week conducted a hearing on charges of White House meddling in the work of government climate-change scientists. He vowed more hearings into what he described as the abuses of power and taxpayer money by the Bush administration.

White House officials say they welcome added oversight, but House Republicans said the hearings more closely resemble a botched firing squad than a fact-finding exercise.

"This is a classic example of 'ready, fire, aim' oversight," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia, the committee's ranking Republican. He said the committee organized a "slap-and-dash" judgment instead of the methodical oversight that war and security demand.

"The main value in revisiting past mistakes is to make sure the right lessons are learned and corrective actions put in place," Mr. Davis said. "Self-righteous finger wagging and political scapegoating won't make Iraq any more secure, won't rebuild that ravaged nation and won't bring U.S. troops home any sooner."

The hearing today will delve into the administration's decisions on Iraq reconstruction. Mr. Bremer is scheduled as the first to testify and will answer charges that he "filled positions with unqualified staff who were politically connected," according to committee briefing documents.

"He will answer questions about an audit report issued in 2005 by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction that concluded that more than $8.8 billion in cash was disbursed without adequate financial controls," the documents said.

Other officials scheduled to testify are Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the special inspector for Iraq reconstruction, and David Oliver, former CPA director of management and budget. The State Department refused a request for testimony by Timothy Carney, coordinator for economic transition in Iraq.

The hearing tomorrow will focus on four employees of security contractor Blackwater USA who were killed and mutilated by a mob in Fallujah in March 2004. Family members -- two mothers, a daughter and a wife -- are set to testify "about what they view as profiteering by Blackwater USA, including the company's alleged failure to provide armored vehicles and other critical safety equipment," the documents said.

The third day of hearings Thursday will look at the Department of Homeland Security's management of large projects, focusing on the Deepwater program to develop new Coast Guard ships and the Secure Border Initiative for high-tech border defense.

The committee Friday will explore whether more congressional oversight is needed to combat "fraudulent, abusive or wasteful" pricing by drug companies dealing with Medicare, Medicaid and other federal programs.

As New 'Cop On The Beat,' Congressman Starts Patrol (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, February 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5 — Halliburton? Tobacco executives? Vice President Dick Cheney? You've been warned.

Representative Henry A. Waxman, the California Democrat who is the new chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, is promising the sort of oversight that the Bush administration has not experienced before.

"There has been no cop on the beat," said Mr. Waxman, who accuses Congressional Republicans of having abdicated their responsibility for oversight in recent years. "And when there is no cop on the beat, criminals are more willing to engage in crimes."

Without constant policing by Congress, he said, "the bad actors feel they can get away with anything."

Returned to power when the Democrats took over Congress last month, Mr. Waxman has already made things difficult for the Bush White House. Last week, he held a televised hearing on accusations that the administration was interfering with the work of climate scientists to protect polluters.

On Tuesday, he has scheduled a hearing on reports of fraud in multibillion-dollar reconstruction projects in Iraq. The main witness will be L. Paul Bremer III, the former American civilian administrator in Baghdad, who is expected to be questioned about his role in awarding some of the most troubled contracts.

DOJ_NMG_0128141

Also testifying will be Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the government's special inspector general for Iraq, whose most recent quarterly report found that the government's reconstruction program was riddled with waste and corruption.

Mr. Waxman is 5-foot-5. He has a big, toothy grin and a bushy mustache. He has none of the glitz of some of his constituents in the 30th Congressional District, which includes Beverly Hills, Malibu and Santa Monica, some of California's richest and flashiest communities.

The congressman, a 67-year-old grandfather of four, would strike no one — at least no one meeting him for the first time — as a candidate for the role of Congress's most aggressive muckraker.

But the liberal Nation magazine has called him the Democrats' Eliot Ness, and Republicans who have tangled with him say the description is apt.

"The guy is partisan," said Representative Dan Burton of Indiana, a Republican who was the oversight committee's chairman during the Clinton administration and often accused Mr. Waxman of ignoring the misdeeds of that White House, including campaign financing abuses that led to the prosecution of some Democratic fund-raisers.

"But I admire his tenacity," Mr. Burton said. "If the administration were to ask me what to expect, I would tell them to expect one of the toughest investigatory committees you've ever faced."

Other Democratic committee chairmen in the House are expected to bring fresh scrutiny to the administration, notably Representatives John D. Dingell, returning as chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, and John Conyers Jr., reinstalled as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, both from Michigan.

But Mr. Waxman may be more feared, if only because he alone among House committee chairmen can issue subpoenas without a committee vote. House rules give the chairman of his committee unusually broad power to force witnesses to testify or turn over evidence; if Mr. Waxman wants a subpoena, out it goes. And he can look into almost anything he wants. His is the main investigative committee in the House, with virtually unlimited jurisdiction over federal agencies.

Mr. Waxman acknowledged it had been difficult to figure out just where to start, but he said, "I want to concentrate on the theme of waste, fraud and abuse of taxpayer dollars."

Aside from looking at large government contractors in Iraq, Mr. Waxman said he intended to look at businesses involved in the cleanup after Hurricane Katrina.

"I don't think we've ever seen the magnitude of money that's being wasted through fraud and abuse and just pure lack of competence," he said. "There are criminal investigations going on right now about fraud, about billions of taxpayer dollars."

A Halliburton spokeswoman, Cathy G. Mann, did not address Mr. Waxman's criticisms of the company and its major subsidiary in Iraq, KBR. Ms. Mann said in a statement that Halliburton "has always been forthcoming with information regarding KBR's government contracts, and we will continue to do so."

Despite concerns at the White House and in corporate boardrooms about a blizzard of subpoenas in the first months of Democratic control in Congress, Mr. Waxman said he had no plans to issue any for now.

"I'd prefer not to," he said in an interview, insisting that he hoped to work with Republicans to press the administration to cooperate. "I am determined to try to restore some stability and bipartisanship."

Mr. Waxman noted that many of his investigative successes when Democrats had control of the House in the 1990s had not resulted from subpoenas.

He has long pushed for regulation of the tobacco industry; it was his 1994 public hearing at which executives of the nation's big cigarette makers swore under oath that they did not believe smoking was addictive. The televised hearing created momentum for the flood of litigation against the industry that followed. Those executives appeared voluntarily, Mr. Waxman pointed out. Mr. Waxman, who first entered Congress in 1974 and once described himself as a "proud, self-confessed, unapologetic liberal," said he became a muckraker with some reluctance.

Until the Republican takeover of the House in 1995, he was considered one of the ablest legislators, responsible for landmark bills on the environment and health care. In 1988, he was the chief architect of the government's first comprehensive bill on AIDS. He was a primary author of the Clean Air Act in 1990.

"The thing I love to do," Mr. Waxman said, "is legislate."

DOJ_NMG_0128142

But when Republicans took control, he found another focus. “When the Republicans excluded me and other Democrats from legislating, we had to figure out something else to do,” he said. “So we did our own investigations.”

In recent years, Mr. Waxman and his team of Democratic investigators managed to embarrass the Bush White House repeatedly, most recently with a report that documented meetings between Karl Rove, President Bush’s political adviser, and the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

A repeated target of Mr. Waxman’s attention has been Vice President Cheney, both because of his ties to Halliburton, which he once ran, and Mr. Cheney’s refusal to discuss the workings of his energy task force.

Mr. Waxman has prodded other watchdog agencies, including the Government Accountability Office and the inspectors general at cabinet departments, to carry out the inquiries that he could not. Until now, that is.

With subpoena power, Mr. Waxman can demand answers from administration officials, even though he knows that may provoke lengthy court battles.

“Do they want to litigate this?” he asked. “If we’re doing our constitutional duty of oversight, how can they refuse to give us information? If they withhold information and try to get away with it, I think it will be very unfortunate for them.”

The Politico Interviews Bremer Prior To Testimony (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 6, 2007

L. Paul Bremer III, for 14 months the civilian administrator of the Coalition Provisional Authority in post-Saddam Iraq, will be the marquee witness Tuesday when House Democrats begin an intensive probing of administration spending in Iraq.

Bremer, who has said little publicly since publication of his memoir "My Year in Iraq: The Struggle to Build a Future of Hope," talked with The Politico ahead of his testimony. Some excerpts:

Q: You voluntarily agreed to testify after receiving a letter of invitation from Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee? Why?

A: I welcome the opportunity to go up and talk about it. In the letter of invitation, the committee spoke about their interest in lessons learned. Given the difficulty that we've encountered in reconstruction in Iraq, I think it's helpful to look at lessons learned. That's a good approach to have, and I look at it as a constructive opportunity for me to do that.

Q: Do you get the feeling that the committee members are genuinely inquisitive, or do you worry that this will be something of a show trial?

A: My experience with Congress is that congressmen tend to take their job seriously. It's kind of exciting to remember that this is the 110th American Congress. There are not a lot of countries in the world that can say they've been electing congress two years at a time, 110 times. There are times when they're not that way, but I think that generally congressmen try to do their job seriously, and I hope that will be what happens.

Q: You've given speeches in Pittsburgh and St. Louis and elsewhere. What's the main point you hope audiences will take away from these appearances?

A: I've been talking about the threat of Islamic terrorism. I've been involved in the war on terrorism now for more than 20 years, almost 30 years. I draw on my experience as chairman of the bipartisan National Commission on Terrorism, which reported to President Clinton in June of 2000. Our conclusions were that we face a new threat of Islamic extremists who, unlike old terrorists, intended to kill us by the hundreds and thousands if they could. It's very important in speeches to set the stage so people can understand what we're up against here in the beginning of the 21st century. I usually talk also about the situation in Iraq, the situation we encountered on the ground and how we tried to deal with it. But the important message I'm trying to get out is that much as the threat of international communism dominated American national security policy for almost half a century after World War II, we're, I think, at the beginning of a very long period where this Islamic extremism is going to be the dominant problem in American national security policy. We are really at a change point in our national security.

Q: Are you thinking decades?

A: Even perhaps generations, as it was in the Cold War.

Q: You've said you're supportive of the president's "new way forward."

DOJ_NMG_0128143

A. The president sort of looked around at the various alternatives: Baker-Hamilton, some of the Democratic proposals, some of the Republican proposals. And I think he correctly concluded that the strategy which has the best chance of success -- and it's certainly a risky strategy; it's by no means sure it will succeed -- was the one he chose, which was to augment our troops there. I agree with him. I think that is the strategy which has the best chance of success.

Q: You have long written and said that there should have been more U.S. troops, sooner.

A: I felt right from the start that we were the government of Iraq and the most fundamental response of any government is to provide security for its people. We, in my view, did not have sufficient troops to do that. It was protecting the people. It was guarding pipelines and electrical power lines and patrolling the border. All of the things that needed to be done, I thought we were stretched too thin.

Q: Did the lack of attention to your early call for more troops foreshadow other problems?

